
Under this power the 52,379 acres of land irrigated by the water of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, were taken into the larger district of 185,000 acres now comprising the Merced irrigation district. Whether it was set forth in the petition for the organization of the defendant irrigation district that it was the purpose of the larger district to acquire the water rights, etc., of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water system does not appear from the pleadings or transcript in this action, but from the fact the defendant irrigation district has purchased all the interests of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company subject to the provisions of their contract with the contract holders hereinbefore referred to we conclude that such was the purpose set forth in the petition for the organization of the defendant district, and that all the proceedings leading up to the present state of affairs were properly taken and had, and that in furtherance of the purposes just set forth the proposed agreement was negotiated. This brings us to a consideration first of the powers of the board of directors of irrigation districts. These powers, as they apply to the agreement under consideration, are found in section 15 of the irrigation laws of the state (St. 1919, p. 661, § 1). Omitting the provisions of that section not applicable, it is there specified:

> "Said board shall also have the right to acquire, by purchase, lease, contract, condemnation, or other legal means, all lands, and waters, * * * and other property necessary for the construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair and improvements of said canal or canals, and works, whether in this or in other states."

Section 61 of the same act (St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4), after setting forth certain prohibitions relating to the incurring of indebtedness, reads:

> "Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as limiting the right of the board to enter into any contract or lease for any lands, waters, water rights or other property as elsewhere in this act authorized and by such lease or contract to bind the district for the payment of the consideration specified in such lease or contract, but if the smallest payment to be made under such lease or contract in any year exceeds an amount equal to ten cents an acre for all the land in the district, such lease or contract shall not be valid unless approved by the commission authorized by law to approve the bonds of irrigation districts as legal investments for savings banks, or unless an assessment sufficient to meet all the payments to become due under such lease or contract shall have been or shall be authorized for that purpose in accordance with section fifty-nine of this act."

This provision of section 59 (St. 1919, p. 668, § 13), however, so far as material to the circumstances before this court, is not a grant of power additional to that contained in section 15 heretofore set forth, other than that in the purchasing of the property referred to in section 15 the lease or contract may be so drawn as to extend over a period of time, if the conditions therein set forth are complied with. It does not extend the power of the board so far as section 15 relates to purchasing water, water rights, and other property necessary for the construction, use, etc., of the canals and works of the district.

[1] The words "water and water rights" used in section 15 have a definite and certain meaning. They relate to the waters to be acquired by the district and distributed by it to the different landowners, and water rights, as they relate to the landowners, means, relates to and indicates the right of the landowner to have and use upon his lands, as occasion requires, the quantity of water called for in his contract or which may be beneficially used in the irrigation of his lands, and, so far as water rights are concerned in relation to the district, it embraces the right of the district to take certain waters and convey them through its systems of canals and irrigating ditches to the various points of use. The words "other property" appearing in the section we think mean other like property necessary for the construction, use, etc., of the works belonging to the district. The word "necessary," upon which considerable stress has been laid, we think has a broader meaning than that "which is absolutely indispensable," but includes that which is reasonable, convenient, and appropriate for carrying out the purposes expressed in the section following the use of that word. The word "use" as it appears in the section following the granting of power to acquire takes on a special signification; in other words, the waters and water rights and other property authorized to be acquired must be such as is used or may be used in the supply of water to be carried through the canals and irrigating ditches owned by the district. These words relate to the use and the right to the use of the waters to be acquired and not to any compensation to be paid therefor.

With this in view, let us consider again the provisions of the proposed agreement and ascertain what the district proposes to acquire. In the recital portion of the agreement it is set forth that the district desires to acquire the rights of the said contract holders to receive water at the price provided in said contract. In the granting portion of the agreement on the part of the contract holders, as set forth in paragraph 6 thereof, the contract holders release to the district all and any rights which they have to receive water at the rate specified in said contract, and then in paragraph 9 of the same agreement the conveyance made by them is specifically limited so as to include the right to receive the water at a particular rate, and that all their other rights are retained and ungranted. Does such an instrument, which has to do only with the price paid for the service, convey the water right which the district is authorized to purchase, under section 15 of the water law heretofore considered? The agreement expressly excludes such intention. It limits the agreement to the matter of compensation or the money to be paid for the article furnished, and not as to any interest in or right to or easement relating to either the use or the article itself. What are the water rights owned by the contract holders? The answer is found in the exhibits set forth in the transcript. Exhibit A grants a water right to the contract holders as follows:

> "All the water, not exceeding at any time 2½ cubic feet per second, which may be required for irrigating 455 acres of land."

Exhibit B conveys a water right as follows:

> "All the water, not exceeding at any time 7 81/100 cubic inches per second, which may be required for irrigating twenty-five acres of land."

Exhibit E is as follows:

> "All the water, not exceeding at any time 190.1 cubic inches per second, which may be required for irrigating the lot described in the district."

All the contracts are similar in their terms, varying only in amounts, and therefore need not be specifically set forth herein. These contracts establish the water rights owned by the contract holders, and are the water rights which are expressly retained by them by the terms and provisions of the agreement proposed to be executed with them by the district. It will thus be seen that the district is not acquiring any water rights whatever; it is simply negotiating with the holders of water rights as to the compensation that may be fixed for the service. That such an agreement or proposal does not come within the terms and provisions of the powers granted by section 15 and that the compensation to be paid for a water right is not a part of the water right itself is more clearly perceived when we consider the provisions of section 1 of article 14, relating to water rights, which is as follows:

> "The use of all water now appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereinbefore declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law."

The manner prescribed by law appears first in the act approved March 12, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 95), amended from time to time and now set forth in the act of March 23, 1912 (see St. Ex. Sess. 1911, pp. 18–64), as supplemented by the act of April 25, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 84). These various acts give the power first to the boards of supervisors of the respective counties to change the rate of water furnished for irrigation purposes where water was being furnished for a public use. Water for irrigation is declared to be a public use. The power of fixing rates as existing from that period of time was originally vested in boards of supervisors, and is now lodged with the railroad commission. The water rights of the respective parties remain the same; cost of service is a separate and distinct matter, being subject to regulation. By reason of the express limitations contained in the agreement, the water rights of the contract holders are exactly the same both before and after. They are all entitled to the specified quantity of water granted them under the terms and provisions of the contracts executed between them and the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company. None of these rights are proposed to be or would be acquired by the district in the event of the execution of the agreement now being considered.

By reason of these limiting provisions in the agreement withholding conveyance of water rights of the contract holders, and in view of paragraph 8 (assuming it means as alleged by respondents only a remission of the tolls agreed to be paid by the contract holders under their contracts), the proposed agreement stripped of its verbiage amounts to simply this: If the contract holders will pay all assessments levied upon their lands during the life of the agreement, then the district will refund to them the sum of $70,000 per annum, plus 85 per cent. of whatever amount of expenses the district may incur and levy taxes for in excess of $146,666 per year. We find nothing in the irrigation laws of California which authorizes or permits any such procedure.

Section 15 unquestionably, as we read it, authorizes the acquisition of the water rights owned and possessed by the contract holders herein referred to, if the acquisition of the same be found necessary for the use of the district in supplying its canals and irrigating ditches with water to be distributed to the various landowners within the exterior boundaries of the district. The necessity for so doing, we think, lies within the jurisdiction of the board of directors, and is not a matter to be determined by the courts unless impeached or attacked for fraud or in some manner other than that which simply alleges the lack of wisdon or understanding or incapacity of the board of directors.

Again, section 552 of the Civil Code fixes the water right of the contract holders as an easement to be enjoyed upon the payment of such rates and terms as may be established in pursuance of law. This is the easement which the district does not acquire and which the contract holders expressly retain. Also section 662 of the Civil Code defines such right to be incidental or appurtenant to the land when it is by right used with the land and for its benefit.

The second waiver on the part of the contract holders found in paragraph 6 of the proposed agreement does not furnish any consideration for its execution. It reads:

> "And hereby agree on their own behalf and on behalf of their successors in ownership of the land to which said contract is attached not to contest any assessment hereafter levied by said district in accordance with law by reason of dues, rights, privilege or immunity growing out of their rights under said contract."

We do not need to attempt to ascertain what this provision means, but it is manifest that if the assessment is levied "in accordance with law" no contest instituted by the contract holders would be of any avail, and an agreement on the part of the district to pay them $70,000 per annum for 17 years for waiving a right or privilege which they did not possess is an act not authorized by any of the provisions of the laws of the state relating to irrigation districts. However wise it might be to avoid litigation, the board of directors of an irrigation district is not empowered to pay landowners in order to induce them to pay their assessments. It is the duty, and the legal duty, which can be enforced against every landowner in the district, to pay all assessments which are levied in accordance with law. It appears from the briefs submitted in this cause that certain statements or promises were made to the contract holders in relation to the acquisition of their water rights by the district in order to induce them to enter into and become a part of the larger district at the time the proposal and the proceedings to create the larger district were under consideration and being had and taken, but does not furnish or give to the board of directors of the district any additional power than that contained in the statutes. If promises were made not warranted by the law, it would simply be an instance where enthusiasm had usurped knowledge of what might be done under the laws of the state, and in no sense either reprehensible or furnishing any reason for sustaining an act of the board which would otherwise be considered as ultra vires. Such promises furnish no grounds for an estoppel.

By reason of the adjusted compensation or arrangement of payments and credits provided for in the agreement, respondents argued that the contract holders released the property right to the district, and that the district thus acquired the right to deal with the property irrespective of the right which was thus released, and that the district obtains the release of its property from an easement or burden upon it, and as a result of the transaction becomes the actual owner of a greater property than it theretofore owned. The fallacy of this statement is made apparent by the following illustration: Under the terms of Exhibit E, for example, the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company conveys to one E. L. Reed 190.1 cubic inches of the water per second in consideration of a cash payment of $190 and the further payment on the first Monday in September, 1903, of $57.03, and on the first Monday of September thereafter a certain specified sum gradually reduced until the payment is the sum of $19.01. After entering into this agreement the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company conveys its canal system, water, and water rights to the Merced irrigation district, and after this conveyance the Merced irrigation district enters into negotiations with E. L. Reed or his assigns changing the terms of the annual payments. The quantity of water, to wit, 190.1 cubic inches, constituting the water right possessed by Reed and his grantors, is expressly eliminated from the agreement. That is to say, both before and after the execution of the proposed agreement, the water right possessed by Reed and his grantors is 190.1 cubic inches. The quantity of water that must be furnished by the district is neither increased nor diminished by the agreement. The contract holders' rights remain actually the same, from which it follows that the district has acquired no additional property rights whatsoever. The difference in the price of the service does not change the quantity of water included in the contract holder's water right. He is entitled to the 190.1 cubic inches both before and after the execution of the agreement. In other words, the contract holder has sold nothing and the district has bought nothing. From which it follows that the expenditures of money about to be incurred by the district under the arrangement is not authorized by any of the provisions of the law governing irrigation districts empowering them to make purchases.

[2] Section 55 of the California irrigation laws (St. 1911, p. 516, § 11) authorizes the board of directors of irrigation districts, instead of levying assessments, to fix rates of toll charges for irrigation or other public uses declared by the act and collect the sum from all persons using the canal for irrigation or other purposes. As this is a legislative grant and a continuing power, we think the provisions of paragraph 8 purporting to waive the right to exact tolls without the power of the board of directors, are therefore void. This paragraph of the proposed agreement may be read out of the instrument without affecting other portions thereof, and although void in itself does not, we think, bear upon the validity or invalidity of the agreement as a whole.

Although elaborately argued, the rights of the contract holders and the district arising out of any assessment that might be levied are not really before us for determination. In some of the states the statutes provide for a hearing whenever an assessment is levied to determine the benefits to the lands assessed, but there is no such provision in our irrigation law. Some of the cases hold that these questions are all presumed to have been taken into consideration and settled at the time the district is formed. Thus, in the case of Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, the court says:

> "The Legislature, when it fixes the district itself, is supposed to have made proper inquiry, and to have finally and conclusively determined the fact of benefits to the land included in the district, and the citizen has no constitutional right to any other further hearing upon that question."

To the same effect is the case of Board of Directors of Modesto Irrigation District v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237. See, also, People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 Pac. 86; an opinion on rehearing in the case of Knowles v. New Sweden Irrigation District, 16 Idaho, 217, 101 Pac. 87. The holding in the Knowles Case is followed in the case of Nampaand Meridian Irrigation District v. Briggs, 27 Idaho, 84, 147 Pac. 75. A somewhat different view of this question is taken by some of the courts, as appears in the case of In re Harper Irrigation District (Or.) 216 Pac. 1020, and the cases cited in that opinion. As any opinion we might express on this question would be pure obiter, we pass it by without expressing any views thereon as not an issue involved in this case.

[3] It is finally insisted that injunction will not lie in this case by reason of the provisions of the latter portion of section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure setting forth instances in which an injunction cannot be granted. We find nothing in the section referred to which inhibits the issuance of an injunction herein. We have found that the board of directors are not executing any public statute, nor are they, in proposing to enter into the agreement referred to, exercising a public office in a lawful manner. Abbott on Municipal Corporations, § 1134, states the law on this question as follows:

> "A court of equity will interfere and restrain by injunction the execution of a contract by a public corporation where the same involves the illegal use of public moneys or property, where it is ultra vires or illegal because of irregularities in conditions precedent, or where the effect of the contract would be a waste, misappropriation or misuse of public funds or property."

The payment of money proposed to be made under the agreement not being in accordance with law, as we construe the irrigation statutes, it follows that the expenditure of the funds of the district in such a manner would amount to a misappropriation or misuse thereof. This we hold will be enjoined upon the application of a property owner and taxpayer within the district.

We think the trial court should have overruled the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court herein be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with directions to overrule the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint and proceed with this cause in accordance with the views expressed herein.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 6, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1924.)

Appeal and error ⚿518(3)—Ruling on demurrer to complaint in intervention, held not required to be presented by bill of exceptions.

Reviewing court may consider ruling sustaining demurrer to complaint in intervention, though not presented by bill of exceptions, where intervention was allowed and judgment of dismissal entered, making a complete judgment roll.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by H. G. Kelsey and others against the Merced Irrigation District and others, in which L. E. Danley intervened. From an adverse judgment, intervener appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court 226 Pac. 854.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, for appellant.

A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action was begun by the above-named plaintiffs against the above-named defendants to determine the rights of the plaintiffs, as contract holders, to certain water rights obtained by them from the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, the water rights of which company had been purchased by the defendant Merced irrigation district. L. E. Danley, the appellant in this action, after obtaining leave therefor, filed a complaint in intervention. This complaint set out the necessary jurisdictional facts as to his being a landowner and taxpayer within the exterior boundaries of the Merced irrigation district. To this petition in intervention the defendants demurred. This demurrer of the defendants to the appellant's complaint in intervention was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal thereafter entered. From this judgment the intervener, L. E. Danley, appeals. All the matters considered in the case of L. E. Danley v. Merced Irrigation District et al. (No. 2774) 226 Pac. 847, are presented for consideration in this case, but, as we have gone into them quite fully, it is unnecessary to again set them forth. The further objection is made that this court cannot consider the merits of the controversy by reason of the fact that the ruling of the trial court upon the defendants' demurrer is not presented by a bill of exceptions. Respondents base this contention upon the holding in the case of Stich v. Goldner, 38 Cal. 608. That case, however, differs from this. There the intervener had been denied the right to file a petition in intervention, and consequently there was no judgment entered against him from which he could appeal. In the present case the petitioner was allowed to intervene, defendants' demurrer to the petition or complaint in intervention was sustained, and judgment of dismissal entered. We thus have a complete judgment roll so far as ruling and judgment on the appellant's petition for intervention is concerned. There being no other points involved in this case that have not been considered in the Danley Case we therefore, upon the authority of that case, hold that the ruling of the trial court in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the intervener's complaint in intervention was erroneous, and that the judgment entered thereon should be, and the same is hereby, ordered reversed, with leave to the defendants to file answers to the appellant's complaint in intervention within such reasonable time as may be allowed by the trial court.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

Waters and water courses 🔑228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Rights of contract holders purporting to be waived held not property which could be acquired by irrigation district; "other property."

Rights of contract holders purporting to be waived, released, or extinguished by contract with irrigation district held not included within either class of property enumerated in Irrigation District Act, § 15, as amended by St. 1919, p. 661, § 1, which the district is thereby empowered to acquire; words "other property" appearing therein meaning other property necessary for construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair, or improvements of system or works belonging to district.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Actions by L. E. Danley against the Merced Irrigation District and others, and by H. G. Kelsey and others against the Merced Irrigation District and others, in which L. E. Danley intervened. Judgments adverse to L. E. Danley in each case were reversed by the District Court of Appeal (226 Pac. 847, 853), and application is made for hearing. Hearing denied.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, for intervener and appellant.

A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition for transfer of the above entitled causes to this court after decision in the District Court of Appeal is denied. We are satisfied with the conclusion of that court to the effect that the "rights" of the contract holders purporting to be waived, released, or extinguished by the proposed contract are not included within either of the classes of property enumerated in section 15 of the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 258, as amended by St. 1919, p. 661, § 1), which the said board is thereby empowered to acquire. We agree with the conclusion that the words "other property" appearing in this section mean other property necessary for the construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair, or improvements of the system or works belonging to the district. We do not understand that such "other property" is limited to other like property under the rule of ejusdem generis. We withhold our approval from what is said in that opinion respecting the applicability of section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution, and sections 552 and 662 of the Civil Code, and the authority of the railroad commission to fix rates in such a situation as is discussed herein, and also from the conclusion that the provisions of paragraph 8 of the proposed contract, purporting to waive the right to exact tolls, is a separable covenant which, although void in itself, does not bear upon the validity of the agreement as a whole. The determination of these questions we do not deem necessary to the judgment herein.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑24(1½)—Action held one sounding in tort.

Complaint for damages from surgical operation held to set forth cause of action in tort; whatever was said as to engagement of defendant as surgeon and dermatologist and as to representations made by defendant as to effect of operation upon plaintiff's face being mere matters of inducement and not averments of breach of contractual relation.

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑14(3)—Surgeon not warrantor of cures.

In an ordinary action for malpractice, physician or surgeon is not to be held as warrantor of cures or of consequences, other than those arising from breach of duty to skillfully perform operation.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(8)—Verdict of negligence in operating on lip held warranted.

Verdict of negligence and unskillfullness in performing operation to thin lip held warranted under evidence.

4. Trial 🔑296(3)—Instruction held erroneous but not prejudicial.

In action for negligent operation to thin lip, it was error but not prejudicial, in view of other instructions, to instruct that, if jury found from evidence that shape of lower lip was changed by operation and plaintiff suffered damage thereby, jury should find for plaintiff, unless condition was result of own contributory negligence, since it ignored question of defendant's negligence.

5. Trial 🔑228(1)—Court not required to embody all of issuable elements of case in single instruction.

Trial court is not required to embody all of issuable elements of case in any single instruction, and its failure to do so will not be held prejudicial error if, from consideration of all instructions, it appears that jury was fairly and fully instructed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Pauline Hall against Gertrude Steele. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Dominguez and W. H. Dehm, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George W. Bush and James A. Houlahan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was one wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendant for injuries received as the alleged result of the negligence of the defendant in the performance of a surgical operation. The plaintiff headed her complaint with the caption "Damages for Negligence," and then proceeded to allege:

"(1) That in and about the month of October, 1920, and at all times herein mentioned, at Los Angeles, Cal., the defendant Gertrude Steele held herself out to the general public, and particularly to this plaintiff, as a surgeon and dermatologist, skilled in the art of such profession, and as such, able with skill to treat the plaintiff for the ailment hereinafter mentioned.

"(2) That plaintiff was at the times herein mentioned a motion picture actress, earning her living by employment from various motion picture companies as an actress on the screen.

"(3) That at the time heretofore mentioned, plaintiff's lower lip was too large and full to correspond with her face in general, in the work which she was performing. That plaintiff consulted with defendant, believing defendant to be a surgeon and dermatologist, skilled in the art of such profession. That defendant represented to plaintiff that by removing a slight or small strip of skin from the lower lip of plaintiff, that said lip would be narrowed and the shape would not be changed, and that said lip would then correspond with the face of plaintiff in general, and would add largely to the harmony of plaintiff's face, and in this way make plaintiff a better subject for the screen, thereby enlarging her earning power.

"(4) That plaintiff believed the representations of defendant and employed defendant as such surgeon and dermatologist to perform the operation of removing a slight or small strip of skin from the lower lip. That on or about the 11th day of October, 1920, defendant performed the operation aforesaid. That defendant so negligently and unskillfully performed said operation that the lower lip of plaintiff, instead of being narrowed and made more sightly, was caused to droop on each side, revealing the teeth of plaintiff when plaintiff endeavored to close her lips, and making plaintiff's lips and mouth ugly and unsightly, and disproportionate to plaintiff's face.

"(5) That through and by the negligence and unskillfulness of defendant, plaintiff's face has become permanently disfigured and made unsightly, and her earning capacity as a motion picture actress is greatly lessened and impaired, if not altogether destroyed, to her damage in the sum of $15,000. * * *"

[1, 2] From the foregoing averments of the plaintiff's complaint it indubitably appears that the action is one sounding in tort the gravamen of which is the alleged negligent and unskillful performance of a surgical operation; and that whatever is said therein as to the engagement of the defendant as a surgeon and dermatologist to perform said operation, and as to representations made by the defendant as to the probable effect of said operation upon the plaintiff's features, are to be considered as mere matters of inducement to the main cause of action and not as averments of the breach of a contractual relation forming the basis of the present action. This case in that regard falls within the rule laid down in Harding v. Liberty Hospital Corp., 177 Cal. 520, 171 Pac. 98; Basler v. Sacramento, etc., Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 33, 134 Pac. 993; Krebenios v. Lindauer, 175 Cal. 431, 166 Pac. 17; Marty v. Somers, 35 Cal. App. 182, 169 Pac. 411. It is true that in the foregoing cases the doctrine was applied in relation to the plea of the statute of limitations, but the like principle is applicable to cases wherein the plaintiff is not suing for breach of warranty made in connection with the contract of employment of the surgeon, but solely for the unskillfulness of the operation performed. In such cases whatever representations the physician, surgeon, or dermatologist may have made as an inducement to the performance of the operation are not essential to the plaintiff's alleged cause of action for negligence; the sole actionable issue being as to whether or not the operation was skillfully or unskillfully performed. In an ordinary action for malpractice the physician or surgeon is not to be held as a warrantor of cures or of consequences other than those arising from a breach of his duty to skillfully perform the operation, and if, as the individual cases show, through no unskillfulness on the part of the surgeon, the plaintiff's broken arm was permanently impaired (Houghton v Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 Pac. 128; McGraw v.

Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 163, 128 Pac. 870), or the patient's nervous system shattered (Booth v. Andrus, 91 Neb. 810, 137 N. W. 884), or if the patient fails to recover (Wurdemann v. Barnes, 92 Wis. 206, 66 N. W. 111), or even if, as in this case, the facial expression of the plaintiff is altered to an extent amounting to a disfiguration, the plaintiff cannot recover in this form of action without being able to show that the specific operation which the surgeon was engaged to perform was negligently and unskillfully performed.

In the discussion of the legal principles applicable to this, the interesting inquiry is suggested as to whether a mere naturopath or so-called "beauty doctor" is entitled as such to be placed in the same category or to claim the same immunity from liability as is applied by law to regular medical practitioners and surgeons whose mission it is to minister to those who are ill or injured or afflicted with diseases or physical injuries which medicine or surgery skillfully applied may cure; while a naturopath or "beauty doctor" does none of these, but merely assumes or undertakes to remove physical or facial deformities not due to disease or injury but existing as natural deficiencies or defects of form or countenance which for the comfort, convenience, or vanity of the individual it is deemed desirable to have removed. The question as to whether the practitioner undertaking to remedy by a surgical operation such deformities or defects and who, while performing with skillfulness the proposed alteration, does not remove the particular physical defect, or, doing so, produces another and perhaps more objectionable deformity, can rely upon the rule which protects the regular practitioner or surgeon from liability for the effect of an operation skillfully performed is, as we have observed, an interesting one; but we do not think it arises in the present case, in view of the state of the pleadings, which sound in tort and count upon an alleged unskillful surgical operation. A different issue involving this very question would have been presented if the action had been one for the breach of warranty as to the result of the operation performed. Another question which is presented upon the face of this record, but which has not been discussed in the briefs of counsel, is as to the defenses which are available to a naturopath who undertakes to perform a surgical operation which his license as such naturopath does not entitle the holder to perform. In the case of In re Gerber, 57 Cal. App. 141, 206 Pac. 1004, it was held that the holder of a license to practice naturopathy, issued in accordance with the statutes regulating the practice of naturopathy as they existed prior to 1909 or issued in accordance with the terms of the statute passed during the latter year, was entitled to practice medicine and surgery. In the case of Millsap v. Alderson (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 469, it was held that one holding a certificate to practice neuropathy was without any right or authority thereunder to engage in the general practice of medicine; and the court in so holding expressly disapproves In re Gerber, supra. Upon petition for hearing in the Supreme Court of the case of Millsap v. Alderson, supra, this court in denying said petition expressly disapproved the decision in the Gerber Case. The bearing which these cases may have upon the case at bar is not at this time discussed or decided for the reason that this subject has not been touched upon in the briefs of counsel upon the present appeal.

[3] The first question urged by the appellant as a ground for reversal of the judgment herein is that of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of the jury in the plaintiff's favor. It is true that from a reading of the complaint of the plaintiff herein it would seem that the injury of which she complained was that of the alleged unskillfulness of the operation performed by the defendant upon the plaintiff's lower lip in an attempt to thin said lip. During the trial of the cause, however, there was considerable controversy over the precise nature of the operation to be performed or that was actually performed upon the plaintiff, which controversy turned upon the question as to whether the defendant had engaged to thin the plaintiff's lower lip only, or to perform such an operation as would have the effect of narrowing the mouth. This was apparently treated by both court and counsel as the issue in the case, and upon that issue the testimony of the plaintiff herself bore most strongly, and if believed by the jury would have justified a verdict to that effect. Much of the plaintiff's testimony in the case consisted of ocular demonstrations to the jury as to the nature of the operation which was to be, and which was, performed upon her, and of this type of evidence none, of course, has been or could be produced before us, and we are therefore left in a state of doubt as to whether the whole effect of the plaintiff's testimony and demonstrations before the jury would be reasonably sufficient to have induced the belief in the minds of the jurymen that the operation to be performed and that was attempted was that of narrowing the plaintiff's mouth. If such was their conclusion, the testimony of the expert witnesses in the case would have substantiated their further conclusion that the operation which was actually performed was not the suitable one from a surgical viewpoint to accomplish that result, and hence that the defendant in performing it acted unskillfully. Such was the conclusion of the jury as manifested in their verdict, and in the state of the record before us we are unable to say that it was not justified by the evidence.

[4, 5] The appellant insists that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving the following instruction:

"The jury is instructed that if you find from the evidence that the shape of the lower lip of plaintiff has been changed by the operation, and that she has suffered damage thereby, you will find for the plaintiff, unless you find that plaintiff's condition is the result of her own contributory negligence."

This instruction was obviously erroneous. It entirely ignored the question of the defendant's negligence and directed the jury that it might find a verdict for the plaintiff if the shape of her lower lip had been changed by the operation, no matter how skillfully performed. The trial court, however, gave a number of other instructions, apparently prepared and presented in support of the defendant's view of the case, and wherein the jury is clearly and expressly instructed that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff it must find from the preponderance of the evidence not only that the defendant was guilty of the negligence complained of by the plaintiff, but that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury for which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages in the action. There are a number of these instructions, all emphasizing the direction to the jury that the defendant was only required to exercise the ordinary skill of her profession in the performance of the operation in question, and that the jury was not to take into consideration the condition of the plaintiff at the time of the trial unless they found that her said condition was caused by the negligence of the defendant. It is a well-recognized rule, applicable to instructions, that the trial court is not required to embody all of the issuable elements of the case in any single instruction, and that its failure so to do will not be held to be prejudicial error if, from a consideration of the whole body of the instructions, it appears that the jury was fairly and fully instructed. When the instruction complained of here is read in connection with and in the light of the other instructions in the case, of which the defendant does not complain, it cannot be said that the instruction, though manifestly erroneous, was prejudicial to a degree which would require a reversal of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

STREET v. BERTOLONE et ux.

1. Husband and wife ⚷268(2)—Wife's earnings not liable for "debts of the husband," though incurred for benefit of community.

Under Civ. Code, § 168, earnings of wife are not liable for "debts of husband," which include those incurred by husband for benefit of community, in view of sections 169, 171.

2. Husband and wife ⚷149(1), 268(2)—Earnings of wife preserved separate from rest of community property cannot be reached by creditors of husband.

When earnings of wife are preserved separate and distinct from rest of community property, they cannot be reached by creditors of husband, regardless of whether debts contracted with creditors are community debts, or separate debts of husband, under Civ. Code, §§ 168, 169, 171.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by E. C. Street, as trustee in bankruptcy of G. Bertolone, against G. Bertolone and Clara Bertolone, his wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reuben G. Hunt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Max Mayer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. [1] In this action for an accounting and the delivery of personal property, the demurrer to the complaint was sustained with leave to amend. The plaintiff having failed to amend, judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom. The complaint alleges, in substance, that, pursuant to petition duly filed, defendant G. Bertolone was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 1st day of July, 1922, by the District Court of the United States; that plaintiff is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting trustee of the estate of said bankrupt; that the total liabilities of said bankrupt's estate amount to $9,000, due unsecured creditors; that the total amount of the assets of said estate, with the exception of the claim herein sued upon, equals $2,125 when reduced to cash; that defendants G. Bertolone and Clara Bertolone were married in 1902 and ever since that time have been and now are living together as husband and wife. The complaint further alleges, and therein lies the cause of the present controversy, that the defendant Clara Bertolone is now in the possession or control of certain personal property which was "acquired by the defendant Clara Bertolone, as the result of her earnings from her personal service during her said marriage with the defendant G. Bertolone, and no part of said personal property was acquired by defendant Clara Bertolone, by gift, devise, bequest, or descent." There follows an allegation of demand and refusal and a prayer for an accounting and the delivery of the property. The demurrer was sustained upon the ground that it appeared upon the face of the complaint that the property sued for on behalf of the creditors of the husband consisted of the earnings of the wife, and that section 168 of the Civil Code provides that "the earnings of the wife are not liable for the debts of the husband." The correctness of this ruling is the only point presented on this appeal. Appellant advances four propositions in support of his position: (1) That the section of the Code above quoted merely exempts the earnings of the wife from liability for the separate debts of the husband; (2) earnings of the wife while living with her husband are community property; (3) debts contracted during the marriage are presumed to be community debts; and (4) it appears from the complaint that the debts were contracted during the existence of the marriage. We cannot concede the correctness of the first proposition, which is fundamental to appellant's case. Section 168 appears in a chapter of the Civil Code wherein the distinction between obligations of a community nature and those which pertain separately to husband or wife is of vital significance, and the other sections, among which it is placed, were evidently carefully drawn with this distinction uppermost in mind. The language of section 168 is clear and explicit, and appellant's contention in so far as it involves the proposition that money earned by the wife may be taken for the debts of the husband is answered by the very language of the section itself. Finnigan v. Hibernia, Savings & Loan Society, 63 Cal. 390. To hold that it provides that the earnings of the wife are not liable for the separate debts of the husband would require an unwarranted reading into the law of language not put there by the Legislature and not necessitated either by reason of ambiguity or obvious error. The term "the debts of the husband," unless otherwise qualified, includes debts incurred by the husband for the benefit of the community as well as his own separate debts. This is so for the reason that the greater term includes the lesser. It is the husband who has charge of the incurring of community obligations, and, in contemplation of law, such obligations are therefore the debts of the husband. That this is the meaning intended by the Legislature is evidenced by the language of section 171 of the same Code, which provides that—er her marriage, but is not liable for her husband's debts; provided, that the separate property of the wife is liable for the payment of debts contracted by the husband or wife for the necessaries of life furnished to them or either of them while they are living together. * * *"

This proviso expressly excepts from the "husband's debts," for the purposes of that section, the debts contracted by the husband for the necessaries of life furnished to them, the husband and wife. Had such debts, which are an important class of community obligations, not been included in the term "husband's debts," they would not have been inserted in the proviso. Appellant calls attention to section 169 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "The earnings and accumulations of the wife, and of her minor children living with her or in her custody, while she is living separate [and apart] from her husband, are the separate property of the wife."

It is urged that the provisions of this section, concerning the earnings of a wife living separate and apart from her husband, will be meaningless if the construction given by the trial court to section 168 is upheld, for the reason that earnings of the wife will be her separate property irrespective of whether she is living with or apart from her husband. This result does not follow. Section 168 does not provide that the earnings of the wife are her separate property, but that they are not liable for the debts of her husband. They continue to be community property for the purposes of administration and for the purposes of investment and other management by the husband. In other words, the earnings of the wife living with her husband are subject to the rules governing community property except in the single respect mentioned in section 168; whereas, the earnings of a wife living separate from her husband are not subject to any of the rules governing community property.

[2] Likewise without foundation is appellant's contention that, even though the earnings of a wife be incorporated with the other community property, a sum equal to the amount of these earnings will always remain exempt from the community creditors. For the purposes of this case it is only necessary to hold that when the earnings of the wife are preserved separate and distinct from the rest of the community property, as is alleged in the present complaint, they cannot be reached by the creditors of the husband regardless of whether the debts contracted with these creditors are community debts or separate debts of the husband. Nor is it necessary to decide in this case whether or not the income from those earnings is liable for the debts of the husband. Had it not appeared upon the face of the complaint that the community property sought to be reached consisted of the earnings of the wife, the manner in which the property was acquired and the amount thereof thus acquired would perhaps have been a matter of special defense. However, inasmuch as it is conceded by plaintiff, by the allegations of the complaint and the refusal to amend, that the entire property herein involved consists of property earned by the wife, the property was not subject to the claims of the creditors in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1924.)

1. Aliens 🔑17—Constitutional law 🔑250—Statute prohibiting aliens from owning or carrying weapons that may be concealed does not deny equal protection of law.

St. 1923, p. 695, § 2, prohibiting unnaturalized foreign-born person from owning or carrying weapons that may be concealed, does not violate Const. U. S. Amend. 14, guaranteeing equal rights and protection of laws, being valid exercise of police power of state.

2. Constitutional law 🔑81—"Police power" defined.

"Police power" is power inherent in a government to enact laws to protect order, safety, health, morals, and general welfare of society.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Police Power.]

3. Weapons 🔑2—Within police power to restrain dangerous practices and use of firearms.

In exercise of police power, Legislature may restrain dangerous practices and regulate carrying and use of firearms and other weapons in interest of public safety.

4. Weapons 🔑2—Federal constitutional provision as to bearing arms inapplicable as against state.

Const. U. S. Amend. 2, regarding right to bear arms, applies only to federal government.

5. Weapons 🔑2 — Absence of constitutional provision relative to bearing arms leaves Legislature free to deal with subject.

Absence in state Constitution of a guaranty of right to bear arms leaves Legislature entirely free to deal with subject.

6. Constitutional law 🔑87—Rights of private property not infringed by statute prohibiting owning and possession of weapons by aliens.

Stats. 1923, p. 695, § 2, prohibiting unnaturalized foreign-born persons from owning or possessing weapons capable of being concealed upon persons, does not infringe rights of private property under Const. art. 1, § 17.

Application for writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Gevino Rameriz, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Kings County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for petitioner.

William R. McKay, Dist. Atty., of Hanford, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and Ben P. Tabor, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, amici curiæ.

LAWLOR, J. On application of his attorneys a writ of habeas corpus was issued on behalf of Gevino Rameriz, whom we shall refer to as petitioner. The record before us shows that he was charged, tried, and convicted in Kings county, and sentenced to serve a term of from one to five years in the state prison at San Quentin for violation of a new statute (Stats. 1923, p. 695) in having on and about his person and in his possession a certain automatic revolver about four inches in length of 25 caliber and loaded with powder and ball, the petitioner then and there being an unnaturalized foreign-born person. After judgment was pronounced, a certificate of probable cause was issued pending appeal, and at the time of the issuance of the writ the petitioner was in the custody of respondent, W. J. Hime, sheriff of Kings county.

The petitioner was charged under section 2 of the said statute, which reads as follows:

> "On and after the date upon which this act takes effect, no unnaturalized foreign-born person and no person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or against the government of the United States or of the state of California or of any political subdivision thereof shall own or have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person. The terms 'pistol,' 'revolver,' and 'firearms capable of being concealed upon the person' as used in this act shall be construed to apply to and include all firearms having a barrel less than twelve inches in length. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for not less than one year nor for more than five years."

It is contended that this statute is unconstitutional (a) in that it violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, (b) because it violates article 2 of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, and (c) for the reason that it violates section 17, article 1, of the Constitution of the state of California.

[1] (a) It is contended that this statute violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, in that it denies to aliens the equal rights and protection of the laws. In other words, that aliens have been unjustly discriminated against within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. It is argued on behalf of the petitioner that the deprivation of the right to unnaturalized foreign-born persons to have the possession of such firearms as are described in the statute is an unconstitutional exercise of the police power of this state. It is admitted by amici curiæ that the Legislature has the unquestioned power to enact, as a proper police regulation designed to promote the public safety and welfare, a law absolutely prohibiting any and all persons within its jurisdiction the possession or use of weapons of the character described in the act under consideration, but "that so long as the Legislature expressly recognizes the class of firearms described in section 2 of the act as the subject of property, ownership and possession by citizens of the United States, it cannot deny to resident foreigners the absolute right to acquire and own and, as a corollary to such ownership, the right to possess, under proper regulation, firearms of the same description."

Respondent does not claim that the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment does not extend to aliens within the territorial jurisdiction, but contends that within the exercise of the police power they may be classified for purposes of legislation. It is argued, on the other hand:

> Firstly, that unlawful discrimination is shown in the proviso contained in section 6 that nothing in section 5 "shall be construed to apply to or affect sheriffs * * * nor to the possession or transportation by any merchant of unloaded firearms as merchandise," and that, consequently, "no unnaturalized foreign-born merchant, who happens to be engaged in business in the state of California, is permitted to possess or tranport a certain kind of property if it consists wholly or partly of firearms capable of being concealed on the person." Secondly, it is argued, "there is no provision in the law whereby an unnaturalized foreign-born person, no matter what his status may be, can secure a license or permit to own or possess any firearms or stock in trade consisting of firearms. The mere fact that he is an unnaturalized foreigner absolutely precludes him from owning or possessing this species of property. * * * Interpreted according to their ordinary signification, the words of the statute prohibit even the owning by an unnaturalized foreigner of any firearms capable of being concealed on the person. In other words, every unnaturalized foreign-born person, resident of the state of California, was required, the instant this statute took effect, to rid himself of the ownership of any such firearm which he theretofore owned, and was prohibited from acquiring the ownership of any such firearm in the future."

Petitioner further complains in his brief that section 5 of the act, which makes it a misdemeanor only for any person to carry such weapons as are described without a license is added evidence of unlawful discrimination. The following is quoted from the brief:

> "A penal statute which makes arbitrary distinctions between different persons or classes or persons, either by making certain acts criminal offenses when committed by some persons but not when committed by others, or by prescribing different penalties for the commission of the same acts by different persons, has been declared unconstitutional as class legislation. Peonage Cases (D. C.) 123 Fed. 67; 12 C. J. 1141."

The Attorney General contends that the legislation does not violate the equal protection clause of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and cites section 1, article 19, of the state Constitution, that "The Legislature shall prescribe all necessary regulations for the protection of the state, * * * from the burdens and evils arising from the presence of aliens who are or may become * * * criminals, * * * and from aliens otherwise dangerous or detrimental to the well-being or peace of the state, * * *" as additional authority for such legislation as contained in section 2 of the act in question. We quote:

> "It also appears to us that in order to hold the act in question unconstitutional, it will be necessary for this court to hold that section 1 of article 19 of our state Constitution violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Petitioner has cited a number of authorities to the effect that certain statutes and ordinances which discriminated against aliens were repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment: Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 36 Sup. Ct. 7, 60 L. Ed. 131, L. R. A. 1916D, 545, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283; In re Parrott (C. C.) 1 Fed. 481; and In re Opinion of Justices, 207 Mass. 601, 94 N. E. 558, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 604. In the Yick Wo Case a municipal ordinance to regulate public laundries and requiring the consent of the board of supervisors to their establishment when the building was not made of brick and stone was held unconstitutional and not a valid exercise of the police power for the reason that it allowed arbitrary and unjust discrimination to be made by such board founded on differences of race, between persons otherwise in similar circumstances. In Barbier v. Connolly, supra, the ordinance fixing certain hours when laundries were not to be operated was held to be a reasonable police regulation. Truax v. Raich, supra, dealt with a statute which required that employers employ only a specified number of alien employees and fixing a penalty. The statute was declared unconstitutional as involving the right to earn a livelihood. In re Parrott, supra, involved an article of the state Constitution which authorized restrictive legislation relating to the employment of Chinese. It was held invalid as violative of the Fourteenth Amendment and not within the police power of the state. A criminal statute in Re Opinion of Justices, supra, attempted to prevent Chinese from admitting into hotels and restaurants conducted by them or their serving with food and drink therein girls under the age of 21 years. It was held such restrictions denied to persons of the Chinese race the equal protection of the laws. The case of Commonwealth v. Hana, 195 Mass. 262, 81 N. E. 149, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 799, 122 Am. St. Rep. 251, 11 Ann. Cas. 514, also cited by petitioner, held a statute which required that a license as a hawker and peddler shall be granted only to a person who is or has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, a valid exercise of the police power. The following cases are cited as instances of the denial of the equal protection of the laws: Pearson v. City of Portland, 69 Me. 278, 31 Am. Rep. 276; In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. Ed. 664; McCabe v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151, 35 Sup. Ct. 69, 59 L. Ed. 169; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604; In re Kotta, 187 Cal. 33, 200 Pac. 957; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 35 Sup. Ct. 99, 59 L. Ed. 265. In Pearson v. City of Portland, supra, a statute which precluded the recovery by a nonresident of damages for injury to person or property under circumstances sanctioned by another state law if a similar remedy was not provided in the place of residence of the injured party was held to deny him the equal protection of the laws. In re Kemmler, supra, involved a state electrocution law. The court held that no federal question was presented because the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has reference to the law of the land in each state, and so long as the law is equal in its operation it does not violate due process. The legislation in Strauder v. West Virginia, supra, which denied to negroes the right and privilege of participating in the administration of the laws as jurors, was held unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment as being a discrimination against negroes on account of race and color. In McCabe v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, a statute requiring separate, but equal, accommodations on railways for white and African races was held not to be an infraction of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra, it was held that a statute which required cities of the fifth and sixth classes to make an effort to agree with the owners of land sought to be condemned before instituting condemnation proceedings was a special law making a forbidden discrimination against two classes of municipal corporations and denying them the equal privileges with other cities in the exercise of the right of eminent domain. In re Kotta, supra, was a case where a statute imposed a poll tax upon unnaturalized foreigners. This was held unconstitutional on the ground that the enforcement would deprive the persons so burdened of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, supra, a statute imposed an annual franchise tax upon the right to exist as a corporation, and the court said it was not within the Fourteenth Amendment, since nothing therein prevents double taxation or any other form of unequal taxation so long as the inequality is not based on arbitrary distinctions. The following cases are cited as instances where statutes deprived persons of property without due process of law: In Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 68 Pac. 481, 57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116, the statute provided that mechanics' liens except as to contractors be payable in money; Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 35 Sup. Ct. 240, 59 L. Ed. 441, L. R. A. 1915C, 960, a statute making it unlawful for an employer to require an employee to agree not to become a member of any labor organization during the time of employment; Hannah v. People, 198 Ill. 77, 64 N. E. 776, dealt with restrictions on the conduct of public warehousemen; in Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. Ed. 989, a constitutional amendment and state statute adjusted the appellate jurisdiction of the courts in the various counties of the state, and this was held not to violate any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment; Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 45 N. E. 15, 34 L. R. A. 408, held that certain legislation which made party affiliations a requisite to eligibility to an office violated the state Constitution. The following cases cited by petitioner involved the police power of the states: Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205, held that a state statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, as that guaranty does not deprive the states of any police power; Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 25 Sup. Ct. 539, 49 L. Ed. 937, 3 Ann. Cas. 1133, a law which fixed the hours of labor in a bakery, was held unconstitutional as not constituting a valid exercise of the police power, the health of the individual following the occupation not being jeopardized by the employment in question; in Lacey v. Palmer, 93 Va. 159, 24 S. E. 930, 31 L. R. A. 822, 57 Am. St. Rep. 795, a statute regulating pool selling was held to be within the police power of the state; Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 82 Pac. 315, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183, passed on a statute requiring all fruit shipped to be labeled with the county and locality where grown—held an unconstitutional invasion of liberty and not a proper exercise of the police power under the guise of a health regulation; Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 137, 33 Sup. Ct. 76, 57 L. Ed. 156, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 192, involved a municipal ordinance requiring the establishment of building lines on the request of two-thirds of the owners of abutting property. It was held the ordinance did not constitute a valid exercise of the police power, as it could not serve the public safety, convenience, or welfare. It will serve no purpose to discuss Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Garrott, 42 Cal. App. 152, 183 Pac. 470, and Ex parte Bailey, 155 Cal. 472, 101 Pac. 441, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534, 132 Am. St. Rep. 95.

The foregoing authorities have been described somewhat in detail by way of making clear their inapplicability to the legislation here involved. In other words, we have found nothing in any of them that supports the contention that section 2 of the act is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. Correct principles are stated as applied to the legislation to which these cases were addressed, and they furnish the tests by which the constitutionality of legislation may be determined under the Fourteenth Amendment, but there were involved in none of them the subjects of public peace, public safety, public security, or collateral subjects as affected by the possession of firearms. One of these tests is whether the legislation comes within the police power, and several of the cases are authority for the proposition that the Fourteenth Amendment was not "designed to interfere with the power of the state sometimes termed its police power. * * *" Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 359 (28 L. Ed. 923). The precise question presented here is whether section 2 is a valid exercise of the police power.

Respondent urges that the legislation represents a proper exercise of the police power for the reason that it tends to safeguard the public peace and security. The argument is twofold: (1) Allegiance to the government, that is, the "danger of permitting aliens to arm themselves, and thus place themselves in a position to dispute, with force of arms, the sovereignty of our nation and our people. While such a danger may seem improbable at the present time, yet, in time of war, it becomes a very real danger indeed, particularly as a few thousand organized aliens, in the course of a few hours, could so cripple our basic industries and our transportation facilities as to make us practically powerless in conducting war. * * * On the other hand, firearms, and particularly firearms capable of being concealed upon the person, are capable of being put into active and immediate use. * * * Thus, even though the possession of firearms by any person may be harmful to the public welfare, yet as the possession of such weapons by an alien is doubly harmful, * * * it is within the province of the Legislature to confine its restrictions to aliens." (2) Here follows an argument in favor of the legislation, giving illustrations of the need of guarding against aliens, which concludes thus:

> "There is yet another reason for the classification: The additional difficulty in apprehending and securing evidence against aliens."

Amicus curiæ for respondent makes a similar argument and concludes that the classification is not unreasonable.

Among the cases relied upon by respondent are Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 139, 34 Sup. Ct. 283 (58 L. Ed. 539), and State v. Rheaume (N. H.) 116 Atl. 758. The former case upheld the constitutionality of an act which made it unlawful for any unnaturalized foreign-born resident to kill any wild bird or animal except in defense of person or property, and "to that end" made it unlawful for such foreign-born person to own or be possessed of a shotgun or rifle. It is sought on behalf of petitioner to distinguish this case on the ground that the decision "seemed to hinge upon the provisions of the act and especially of the phrase 'to that end,' that is, to the protection and preservation of wild game." It is claimed the federal court did not squarely decide the question of whether or not ownership of shotguns and rifles by foreigners could be prohibited for other purposes, and the following excerpt from the opinion is quoted:

> "It will be time enough to consider whether the statute can be construed or upheld as precluding Italians from possessing a stock of guns for purposes of trade when such a case is presented. The act was passed for an object with which possession in the way of trade has nothing to do and well might be interpreted as not extending to it."

Concerning the question of discrimination, the decision in Patsone v. Pennsylvania, supra, declared:

> "The discrimination undoubtedly presents a more difficult question. But we start with the general consideration that a state may classify with reference to the evil to be prevented, and that if the class discriminated against is or reasonably might be considered to define those from whom the evil mainly is to be feared, it properly may be picked out. A lack of abstract symmetry does not matter. The question is a practical one dependent upon experience. The demand for symmetry ignores the specific difference that experience is supposed to have shown to mark the class. It is not enough to invalidate the law that others may do the same thing and go unpunished, if, as a matter of fact, it is found that the danger is characteristic of the class named. * * * The question therefore narrows itself to whether this court can say that the Legislature of Pennsylvania was not warranted in assuming as its premise for the law that resident unnaturalized aliens were the peculiar source of the evil that it desired to prevent. * * *
> "Obviously the question so stated is one of local experience on which this court ought to be very slow to declare that the state Legislature was wrong in its facts."

This well-established principle was applied in Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 35 Sup. Ct. 342, 59 L. Ed. 628, L. R. A. 1915F, 829, where a California statute limiting hours of employment of women in specified occupations, including those in hotels, was upheld. The court said:

> "Dealing with practical exigencies, the Legislature may be guided by experience. * * * It is free to recognize degrees of harm, and it may confine its restrictions to those classes of cases where the need is deemed to be clearest. * * * If the law presumably hits the evil where it is most felt, it is not to be overthrown because there are other instances to which it might have been applied."

State v. Rheaume, supra, sustained as constitutional a statute requiring persons not citizens of the United States to make application for a permit to possess firearms. Petitioner, referring to the differentiation in the respective statutes as regulatory and prohibitory, says:

> "It will be noticed that in two essential respects it is radically different from the California law. In the first place, no attempt is made to deny to foreign-born residents of the state of New Hampshire the right to acquire or own property in firearms; and, in the second place, no attempt is made to prohibit such unnaturalized foreign-born residents from possessing such firearms provided they comply with certain regulations and procure permits therefor. * * * From the foregoing it will be seen that the New Hampshire law merely regulates the possession and use of firearms. It makes no attempt to deny to any one, resident within the state, the right to acquire or own property in such firearms. It does not even prohibit the possession of firearms by foreigners, but merely provides that any foreigner desiring to possess the same shall first submit to certain regulations and procure a permit for such purpose. The law, moreover, makes no attempt to disturb the ownership of firearms by any class of persons who owned the same at the time the law took effect. The California law, on the other hand, at its very inception, seeks to deprive persons who owned firearms at the time of such enactment, of their property in such firearms. In this phase it is retroactive in its effect and unquestionably deprives persons resident in the state of California of their property without due process of law. * * * Under no circumstances does it permit any unnaturalized foreigner either to own or possess a firearm or firearms of the description denounced by the statute, and, in this respect, it unjustly, oppressively and without reason, deprives the class of the population of the rights guaranteed them by the federal Constitution."

The point to that case is not whether the legislation was merely regulatory or prohibitory. It is conceded by amici curiæ for petitioner that firearms are the proper subject of the exercise of the police power. The question presented here is whether, in the exercise of the police power, the segregation of aliens constitutes an unlawful discrimination against that class. It was said in State v. Rheaume, supra:

> "Classifications distinguishing between citizens and aliens have not infrequently, been the basis of regulations under the police powers of the states. * * *
> "Aliens are under no special constitutional protection which forbids a classification otherwise justified simply because the limitation of the class falls along the lines of nationality. That would be requiring a higher degree of protection for aliens as a class than for similar classes of American citizens. * * * It therefore remains to be considered whether there is such a relation between the restriction as to the alien and the public safety as to warrant the classification in the present case. * * *
> "That explosives and firearms are proper subjects of regulation is self-evident. The Legislature was dealing with subject-matters of great inherent danger to the public. * * * It was an incident to such a system that a classification should be made based on domicile, allegiance, duty, habit, temperament, and other characteristics which distinguish the citizen and applicant for citizenship from the alien who has manifested no desire or intention to bind himself to support the government.
> "Citizens as a class have more settled domiciles, and are better known to the local police officials, while the sojourn of aliens in this country, in theory, and usually in practice, is temporary, and their abode, while here, capricious and uncertain. Citizens by means of taxation bear the expense of the government and of police protection, while the alien does not necessarily pay taxes or share any part of the public burden. Native citizens are justly presumed to be imbued with a natural allegiance to their government which unnaturalized aliens do not possess. The former inherit a knowledge and reverence for our institutions, while the latter as a class do not understand our customs or laws, or enter into the spirit of our social organization. Or, passing more directly to the use of firearms, the citizen has an obligation to defend the state, while the alien has none. The citizen is required to assist in maintenance of order, the enforcement of law, and the arrest of wrongdoers in some instances. It is clear that there exists a reasonable and substantial basis for the classification."

Moreover, it is not strictly true that the legislation here in question is prohibitory to every class of firearms. Under the statute aliens may own or have in their possession firearms, provided they are not of a size capable of being concealed on the person. This would permit aliens to have shotguns, rifles, or other large weapons for all lawful purposes.

The case of People v. Crane, 214 N. Y. 154, 108 N. E. 427, L. R. A. 1916D, 550, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1254, approves a similar classification of aliens. The statute there, known as the New York Labor Law (Consol. Laws, c. 31), provided that in the construction of public works by a state, municipality, or by contractors, only United States citizens shall be employed and that citizens of the state should be given perference. Numerous cases are cited therein in which the power of a state to discriminate in favor of citizens was sanctioned. Among these are McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. Ed. 248, where a state denied to aliens, and even to citizens of another state, the right to plant oysters or to fish in public waters, and Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 Sup. Ct. 600, 40 L. Ed. 793, where the state restricted to its own citizens the enjoyment of its game. The principle that justified the discrimination in all these cases was held to be "that the common property of the state belongs to the people of the state and hence that in any distribution of that property, the citizen may be preferred." It was said in People v. Crane, supra:

> "If the calling is one that the state, in the exercise of its police power, may prohibit either absolutely, or conditionally by the exaction of a license, the fact of alienage may justify a denial of the privilege. * * * There must, however, be some relation in such cases between the exclusion of the alien and the protection of the public welfare."

In Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129, a writ of habeas corpus was issued. The petitioner was held in custody on a complaint charging him with a misdemeanor under section 626 of the Penal Code in unlawfully selling a quantity of deer meat, the meat having been cut from the carcass of a deer killed in Texas and brought into this state. Petitioner contended that as the above section did not prohibit the sale of deer meat lawfully taken without the state the charge did not come within the terms thereof. It was also argued that the act violates the Constitution of the United States in that it is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. It was held in discharging the writ and remanding the prisoner that it is within the police power of the state, in the protection of the wild game thereof, to prohibit the sale of the meat of any wild game within the state, and that such a police regulation making it a public offense to buy and sell deer meat within the state, which was cut from an entire carcass brought from without the state, is not a violation of the Constitution of the United States as an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. "The fact that a regulation may incidentally, and to a certain extent, affect commerce between the states, does not affect its validity * * * The authority of Congress over any article of commerce imported into a state ceases 'when the importer has so acted upon it, that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, which happens when the original package is no longer such in his hands,' and that thereupon the property becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the state, and affected and controlled by its regulations."

A classification of aliens has been made with respect to procuring a license to hunt and fish upon payment of a fee. The Statutes of 1909, page 663, amending a similar act (Stats. 1907, p. 247), requires every person in the state, who hunts, pursues, or kills any of the wild birds or animals, excepting predatory birds or animals, to first procure a license therefor. A license to citizens of the United States and resident in this state may be issued on the payment of $1; to any citizen of the United States and not a resident of this state on the payment of $10; to any person not a citizen of the United States upon the payment of $25. In the Statutes of 1919, p. 119, a further classification was made allowing a license to be issued to a person who shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and who is a resident of this state, on the payment of $10, provided that the applicant take an oath that he has not claimed his citizenship in a foreign country as a basis for avoiding service in the armed forces of the United States. Fishing licenses, by Statutes 1913, p. 986, may be granted to citizens and residents of this state on the payment of $1, to citizens of the United States and not residents of this state, on the payment of $3, and to persons not citizens of the United States on the payment of $3. We do not find that these provisions have been made the subject of attack on the point of differentiation in the amount of the fee required.

In Commonwealth v. Hana, supra, in holding constitutional that part of the act which provided that a license as a hawker and peddler shall be granted only to a person who is, or shall have declared his intention to become, a citizen of the United States, and referring to State v. Montgomery, 94 Me. 192, 47 Atl. 165, 80 Am. St. Rep. 386, which delared a similar statute unconstitutional, the court said:

> "There is, however, an important question which was not much discussed in that case, whether the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, could discover a reason for withholding peddlers' licenses from aliens. The business of peddling furnishes such opportunities for the practice of fraud that it is a proper subject for legislative regulation. * * * If, in the same interest [protection of the public], the Legislature deems it important that licenses shall be granted only to citizens of the United States, or to those who have declared their intention to become citizens, it can hardly be said that they have exceeded their constitutional right in passing a law to that effect. * * * Indeed, the nature of their business is such that their possession of a domicile and citizenship in this country might be important to those seeking remedies for wrongs done in their business."

Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 44 Sup. Ct. 15, 68 L. Ed. —, involved the Alien Land Law of the state of Washington (Laws 1921, c. 50), prohibiting the purchase or lease of land by any alien who has not declared his intention to become a citizen. In holding that the legislation was not repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment, the court approved the following statement from the decision of the district court in that case (274 Fed. 841):

> "It is obvious that one who is not a citizen and cannot become one lacks an interest in, and the power to effectually work for the welfare of the state, and, so lacking, the state may rightfully deny him the right to own and lease real estate within its boundaries. If one incapable of citizenship may lease or own real estate, it is within the realm of possibility that every foot of land within the state might pass to the ownership * * * of noncitizens."

In Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U. S. 225, 44 Sup. Ct. 21, 68 L. Ed. —, the court considered the right of a citizen to lease his land to a Japanese subject under the Alien Land Law of this state (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii), forbidding aliens ineligible to citizenship to acquire, possess, or enjoy agricultural land. It was said in upholding the legislation that "Our decision in Terrace v. Thompson, supra, controls the decision of all questions raised here."

Webb v. O'Brien, 263 U. S. 341, 44 Sup. Ct. 112, 68 L. Ed. —, dealt with the right of a citizen to enter into a cropping contract with a Japanese subject living in California as affected by the Alien Land Law. The court said:

> "The provision of the act which limits the privilege of ineligible aliens to acquire real property or any interest therein to that prescribed by treaty is not in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment. Terrace v. Thompson, supra; Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U. S. 225, 44 Sup. Ct. 21, 68 L. Ed. —."

Another case under the Alien Land Law is Frick v. Webb, 44 Sup. Ct. 116, which involved the ownership of stock by a Japanese subject in the Merced Farm Company, a corporation of this state. The court held that—

> "The state has power, and the act evidences its purpose, to deny to ineligible aliens permission to own, lease, use, or have the benefit of lands within its borders for agricultural purposes. * * * It may forbid indirect as well as direct ownership and control of agricultural land by ineligible aliens."

It may safely be assumed that in a general sense the reasons that induced legislation involved in the case at bar exerted an influence in the adoption of the enactments considered in the foregoing authorities. If rights in land may be denied to aliens by the state, there would seem no reason why in the exercise of its police power it might not also protect itself against the ownership, traffic in, and use of firearms by aliens. This inhibition might well tend to conserve peace and quiet, and in times of war as well as of peace serve to avoid the injection of such issues into the international relations of the federal government.

[2, 3] "Police power is the power inherent in a government to enact laws within constitutional limits to protect the order, safety, health, morals and general welfare of society." 12 C. J. 904. It is a well-recognized function of the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to restrain dangerous practices (Id. 916) and to regulate the carrying and use of firearms and other weapons in the interest of the public safety (Id. 917).

In our opinion the legislation constitutes a proper exercise of the police power and is not invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment. The purpose of the act is to conserve the public welfare, to prevent any interference with the means of common defense in times of peace or war, to insure the public safety by preventing the unlawful use of firearms. It cannot be assumed that the Legislature did not have evidence before it, or that it did not have reasonable grounds to justify the legislation, as, for instance, that unnaturalized foreign-born persons and persons who have been convicted of a felony were more likely than citizens to unlawfully use firearms or engage in dangerous practices against the government in times of peace or war, or to resort to force in defiance of law. To provide against such contingencies would plainly constitute a reasonable exercise of the police power.

As to the point that different and more severe punishment is provided for the same offense by section 2 than section 5 of the act, it is to be noted that the respective sections prescribe different offenses. Section 5 provides it shall be a misdemeanor for any person within the state to carry concealed on his person or within any vehicle which is under his control or direction any pistol, revolver, or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person without having a license to carry such firearm. The gravamen of that offense is for any person, citizen or otherwise, to have the possession of the kind of fire arms described without a license. In Pace v. Alabama, 106 U. S. 583, 1 Sup. Ct. 637, 27 L. Ed. 207, the court said: "Equality of protection" means that persons "shall not be subjected, for the same offense, to any greater or different punishment." In that case a heavier penalty was prescribed when the crime of adultery was committed by a white person and a negro than in a case where the crime was committed by persons of the same race and color. It is apparent that the respective criminal acts in sections 2 and 5 are not of the same import, and so far as the penalty is concerned it may be assumed that the Legislature regarded the possession of concealed weapons by aliens of graver consequence than in the case of citizens having such possession without a license.

[4, 5] (b) The second point is that the right of the people to bear arms is infringed upon by this statute. The Second Amendment of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

> "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed."

It will suffice to state that this point is without merit, since this amendment offers no protection against the state governments, but applies only to the federal government. "The right of the people to keep and bear arms" is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence. The Second Amendment declares that this right shall not be infringed, but this means no more than that it shall not be infringed by Congress. This amendment is one of those that has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government, and not those of the state. U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 553, 23 L. Ed. 588. See, also, Miller v. Texas, 153 U. S. 535, 14 Sup. Ct. 874, 38 L. Ed. 812. It was said in Ex parte Spies, 123 U. S. 131, 8 Sup. Ct. 21, 22, 31 L. Ed. 80:

> "That the first ten articles of amendment were not intended to limit the powers of the state government in respect to their own people, but to operate on the national government alone, was decided more than half a century ago, and that decision has been steadily adhered to since."

See, also, Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 265, 6 Sup. Ct. 580, 29 L. Ed. 615.

If there is an inhibition upon the Legislature, it must be found in the state Constitution, and not in the Second Amendment of the federal Constitution. The Constitution of this state contains no provision on the subject. An examination of the numerous authorities in various states will show that the right to keep and bear arms as guaranteed by a state constitutional provision similar to the federal amendment refers only to the bearing of arms by the citizens in defense of a common cause, and not to their use in private broils and affrays. Thus, it is not an invasion of the right to make it unlawful for any person to carry a dirk, sword cane, Spanish stiletto, or other similar weapon. Aymette v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 154; State v. Wilburn, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 57, 32 Am. Rep. 551; Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 165, 8 Am. Rep. 8; English v. State, 35 Tex. 473, 14 Am. Rep. 374; State v. Workman, 35 W. Va. 367, 14 S. E. 9, 14 L. R. A. 600. It may be remarked that an absolute prohibition of such right might be held to infringe a fundamental right.

In Nunn v. Georgia, 1 Ga. 243, the court said:

> "We are of the opinion, then, that so far as the act of 1837 seeks to suppress the practice of carrying certain weapons secretly, that it is valid, inasmuch as it does not deprive the citizen of his natural right of self-defense, or of his constitutional right to keep and bear arms. But that so much of it, as contains a prohibition against bearing arms openly, is in conflict with the Constitution, and void, and that, as the defendant has been indicted and convicted for carrying a pistol, without charging that it was done in a concealed manner, under that portion of the statute which entirely forbids its use, the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the proceeding quashed."

It appears, therefore, that, although state Constitutions declare that every citizen has the right to bear arms, in defense of himself and the state, and do not expressly or by implication deny to the Legislature the right to enact laws in regard to the manner in which arms shall be borne, this can be done, and the absence of such a guarantee in the state Constitution leaves the Legislature entirely free to deal with the subject.

[6] (c) The conclusions that the legislation comes within the police power, and that it is a reasonable exercise thereof, render unnecessary any discussion of the last point that rights of private property under section 17, art. 1, of the state Constitution, are infringed by the statute in question, since the principle of law that private property rights of individuals are required to yield when in conflict with reasonable police regulations is applicable. 5 Cal. Jur. 882.

IDEMOTO et al. v. SCHEIDECKER et al.

1. Parent and child 🔑13(2)—Cause of action against parents for negligence of child in driving automobile held not stated.

In action for injuries caused by operation of automobile by minor son of defendants, allegations that automobile was purchased for pleasure and use of defendants and son, that latter was at all times authorized to drive machine, and that at time of injury he was driving it with defendants' consent held not to state cause of action.

2. Pleading 🔑8(2)—Allegation in action against parents for negligent operation by son of automobile held conclusion.

In pedestrian's action against parents for injuries when struck by automobile driven by son, allegation that son "was acting in furtherance of and not apart from service and control of defendants, and within purposes for which automobile was purchased," held pure conclusion.

3. Parent and child 🔑13(1) — Liability of father, procuring license for son, for latter's negligence in driving automobile stated.

Where defendant's son was in possession of an operator's license which had been issued to him upon his father's application under Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, father was jointly and severally liable for actionable negligence on part of such minor while operating a vehicle upon public highway.

4. Appeal and error 🔑883—Theory pursued below held to preclude raising objection that evidence was outside issues.

Where both parties on trial treated certain evidence as properly within issues, and it was received pursuant to stipulation appellant could not complain on appeal that evidence was outside issues.

5. Highways 🔑184(2)—In automobile accident case evidence held to show defendant's negligence and plaintiff's freedom from negligence.

Evidence that plaintiff while walking along a highway was struck from the rear by an automobile driven by defendant's son, while a foot and a half to two feet off the traveled portion of the roadway, held sufficient to support an implied finding of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1052(2)—Error in admission of opinion evidence held cured by subsequent testimony as to facts.

If court erred in admitting opinion evidence of deputy sheriff based on wheel tracks, that car which struck plaintiff was a Ford, she having been struck by a Ford, such error was not prejudicial, where witness proceeded to testify to certain facts, which if believed would show conclusively that defendant's car made such tracks.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1066—In automobile accident case based on wanton negligence instructions defining forms of negligence generally held not prejudicial error.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, with an averment of reckless and wanton negligence, that court generally defined and differentiated between different forms of negligence without an application to the facts, did not constitute prejudicial error, where evident purpose was to clarify jurors' minds upon subject to which they related.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—In automobile accident case error in instruction on law of road held not prejudicial in view of evidence.

In automobile accident case instruction that motor vehicle approaching behind pedestrian walking in same direction, in order to pass such pedestrian should turn to the left, did not constitute prejudicial error where evidence showed that automobile could not have passed plaintiff except upon her left.

9. Highways 🔑184(4)—Instruction on pedestrian's duty to watch for cars approaching from rear held not inapplicable.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, instruction that pedestrian was under no legal duty to look back to see whether she was in danger of being struck was not inapplicable, where defendant's son testified contrary to plaintiff that she never looked back towards his machine, since jury may have believed his testimony.

10. Highways 🔑184(4)—Instruction on automobile driver's duty to warn pedestrian held not inapplicable.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, instruction as to driver's duty, on approaching pedestrian from behind, to give warning, held not inapplicable under the evidence.

11. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction held not to withdraw all question of plaintiff's contributory negligence from jury.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, instruction that question for jury was whether defendant's son was guilty of negligence did not withdraw from jury all questions as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, since its utmost intendment was that primary question to be determined was negligence of car driver.

12. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction held not to withdraw question whether defendant's negligence proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, instruction that question for jury was whether defendant's son was negligent, held not to withdraw question whether his negligence was proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, in view of an instruction given at defendant's request that negligence in manner stated in complaint must be shown.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Kankichi Idemoto and another against Mary L. Scheidecker and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to named defendant, and affirmed as to other defendants.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Wallace L. Ware and Geo. W. Murphy, both of Santa Rosa (A. W. Hollingsworth, of Santa Rosa, of counsel), for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for personal injuries suffered by Toki Idemoto as the result of an automobile accident upon the public highway. Plaintiff Toki Idemoto, while walking in a northerly direction upon the easterly or right-hand portion of the Russian river road in Sonoma county, was struck and injured by an automobile driven by the defendant Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., while in the act of overtaking and attempting to pass her.

[1-4] In behalf of the defendants Albert F. Scheidecker, Sr., and Mary L. Scheidecker, as distinguished from their codefendant Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., it is urged upon this appeal that the court erred in overruling their demurrer to the complaint and in denying their motion for nonsuit, and that the verdict as against them is totally unsupported by the evidence. These two defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action against them, and that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant, in that they were improperly joined with their codefendant. The allegations of the complaint which were designed to connect these two defendants with the cause of action were, in brief, that Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., who was operating the automobile at the time of the injury was the minor son of these defendants; that the automobile had been purchased by them for the pleasure, comfort, enjoyment and use of said defendants and their said minor son; that said minor son was at all times authorized and permitted by said defendants to drive said automobile; and that at the time of the injury he was driving the same with their consent, knowledge, and permission, and was acting in furtherance of and not apart from the service and control of said defendants, and within the purposes for which said automobile was purchased. These allegations were evidently designed to bring the case within the rule in Crittenden v. Murphy, 36 Cal. App. 803, 173 Pac. 595, and Walsh v. Flatland, 36 Cal. App. 819, 173 Pac. 596. The rule stated and applied in those cases was, however, definitely repudiated by this court in the later case of Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083, and is no longer to be regarded as a correct statement of the law in this state. Respondents suggest that the case at bar is to be distinguished from Spence v. Fisher by the circumstance that the driver of the car here in question was a minor. In the opinion in that case it was said that—

> "No authority sustaining the doctrine of liability under such circumstances that we have seen puts the decision on any other ground, even when the driver was a minor child, in the absence of a statute creating it, it being recognized that there is nothing in the nature of the automobile itself or in the relationship of parent and child, aside from the fact that the latter is a member of the family of the parent, to create such a liability."

It may be conceded that this passage, in so far as it referred to the case of a minor child, was obiter dictum; but respondents have not suggested any good reason why the rule of that case should not be applied to the facts of this case, nor has any such reason suggested itself to our minds. The allegation that the minor defendant "was acting in furtherance of and not apart from the service and control of said defendants and within the purposes for which said automobile was purchased" was a pure conclusion of the pleader. In the absence of any allegation of facts which would have the legal effect of fastening a liability upon these defendants for the negligence of their minor son, the allegation last quoted would be ineffectual for any purpose. It follows that the demurrer of these two defendants should have been sustained. No facts were developed at the trial which would serve in any way to render the defendant Mary L. Scheidecker answerable for the negligence, if any, of the defendant Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., and the judgment as to her must therefore be reversed. It was established at the trial that Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., was in possession at the time of the accident of an operator's license which had been issued to him upon the application of his father, Albert F. Scheidecker, Sr., pursuant to section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14), then in force, the effect of which was to charge the father with joint and several liability for actionable negligence on the part of such minor while operating a motor vehicle upon the public highway. Whitworth v. Jones, 58 Cal. App. 492, 209 Pac. 60; Buelke v. Levenstadt (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 42. This evidence was not, strictly speaking, within the issues as framed by the pleadings, but both parties treated it at the trial as a matter properly within the issues, and the evidence upon this point was received pursuant to a stipulation of both parties entered into at the suggestion of counsel for defendants. Under such circumstances defendants would not be heard to complain upon appeal that this matter was outside of the issues and, indeed, they have not done so. The result is that the case as against the father must stand or fall with the case as against the son. Hereinafter, for brevity's sake, the word "defendant" will be used to indicate the defendant Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., and the word "plaintiff" will be used to indicate the plaintiff Toki Idemoto, unless otherwise specified.

[6] The appellants contend that the trial court committed prejudicial error in permitting the witness Zanolini to give certain opinion evidence to the effect that certain automobile tracks which were seen by him immediately after the accident along the easterly side of the roadway, where the plaintiff testified she was walking at the time she was struck by the defendant's Ford machine, had been made by a Ford automobile. The following is the state of the record touching that subject: The witness Zanolini, who was a deputy sheriff at the time, testified that he reached the scene of the accident within a few monents after it had occurred and that he examined the marks and tracks along the side of the road within five or ten minutes after the injured woman had been removed and that he saw there the track of a machine which had pulled off the side of the traveled portion of the highway some distance from the spot where the injured woman's bonnet was lying and had continued along the side of the highway for a distance of 80 feet, where it had turned back into the traveled road. He was asked by the court: "Do you know anything about the kind of a track a Ford machine makes?" to which question, without objection, he replied: "Yes; because I own one." The court then asked, "Were these Ford automobile tracks that you saw?" to which the witness replied, again without objection, "Yes, sir." The court then said, "Your objection to that will be overruled if you have one; I think he may testify as to whether it was a Ford, made by a Ford or any other machine." The court and counsel for the defendants then engaged in quite a discussion as to whether a person could tell what type of machine made a particular imprint, during which the court said, "Well I think a man may testify who knows; it is for the jury of course to determine whether or not his judgment is accurate if he is familiar with the prints made by different machines." During this discussion the defendants' counsel formulated no specific objection to the testimony of the witness nor to the remarks of the court, nor did they either move to strike out the testimony of the witness, nor did they attempt to cross-examine him upon the subject at all, but contented themselves with their vague objection and desultory discussion as to the reasonableness of admitting this form of evidence. Under these conditions it is doubtful whether the admission of this evidence would constitute error; but, conceding that it would be so, we are of the opinion that its admission did not constitute prejudicial error in the instant case for the reason that the witness Zanolini proceeded to testify to certain facts coming within his immediate observation at the time of his examination of the tracks of the machine which, if believed by the jury, would show conclusively that it was the defendant's car which made the tracks in question, and which struck and dragged the woman along the side of the road and alongside the tracks of the car. The evidence of the witness Zanolini in that behalf shows that he also examined the footprints and other marks which then appeared to have been freshly made for a considerable distance along the side of the road. He testified that he found footprints which appeared in the dust along that side of the road and which went along to the point where the bonnet of the injured woman was found lying and that these footprints disappeared at that point, and the marks indicating the dragging of a body began and continued alongside the tracks of the car for a considerable distance and up to the point where the body of the woman was found lying. It is a significant fact in this connection that the young son of the defendants, who was driving the car at the time of the accident, was present when the witness Zanolini was engaged in making his examination of the tracks and other marks along the roadside, and that he made no denial of the fact that the tracks there shown and being examined were the tracks of his car. The evidence further discloses that on the following day Zanolini and two other persons again examined the tracks and footprints along the roadside and that one of these, the husband of the injured woman, had brought one of her shoes from the hospital which he fitted to the footprints and found to correspond in size. In this state of the evidence we are unable to conclude that the error of the trial court, if it be such, in admitting the opinion evidence of Zanolini as to the type of machine making the automobile tracks in question, was prejudicial.

[7, 8] The appellants further contend that certain instructions given by the court to the jury were erroneous or were erroneously given. The plaintiffs in their complaint had averred that the negligence of the young son of the defendants, who was driving their car at the time of the accident, was "reckless and wanton." The court in that portion of its instructions dealing generally with the definition of negligence defined and differentiated between "negligence," "wanton negligence," and "gross negligence," but without an application of these definitions and differentiations to the facts of the particular case. The appellants seek to invoke the rule that instructions which are inapplicable to the particular case or to the relief sought therein ought not to be given. Conceding this to be the rule, it cannot be rigidly applied to the giving of instructions which are general in character and which have for their evident purpose that of clarifying the minds of the jurymen upon the general subject to which they relate. We do not think that the action of the trial court, with this manifest object in view, was prejudicial error in this case. The court further instructed the jury as follows:

> "I instruct you that the law of the road provides that a motor vehicle approaching from behind the pedestrian walking in the same direction, in order to pass such pedestrian should turn to the left. * * *"

The appellants complain that this instruction was erroneous, but conceding it to be so we are unable to see that the defendants could have in any way been prejudiced by it, since the physical facts as disclosed by the undisputed evidence in this case, showed that the automobile could not have passed the injured plaintiff except upon her left.

[9, 10] The court further instructed the jury as follows:

> "I instruct you that a pedestrian walking along a public highway should keep a lookout ahead for vehicles approaching from in front, but such pedestrian, having no knowledge of an automobile about to approach from behind is not expected to contemplate the approach from behind of any automobile, and under such circumstances would be under no legal duty to look back or watch behind to see whether he or she was in danger of being struck or run down from behind."

It is the contention of the appellants that this instruction, while not in itself bad law, should not have been given because inapplicable to the facts of the instant case. We are not sure that the appellants are altogether correct in this assertion. It is true that the injured woman testified that she had looked back and saw the approaching vehicle a few moments before its impact upon her; but it is also true that the young son of the defendants who was driving the car testified that he was watching the woman as he approached her and that so far as he saw she never looked back toward his machine. The jury may have believed the testimony of the young man in this regard, in which case the foregoing instruction would be applicable. A like observation applies to another instruction following the latter one and has reference to the duty of a driver approaching a pedestrian on the highway from behind to sound his horn or other warning in order to make certain that the foot passenger is aware of his rearward approach. The undisputed evidence in the case is to the effect that the driver did not sound his horn or give other warning of his approach, and there is some evidence in the case tending to show that the woman was not aware of his approach since the main defense offered in the case was that the woman stepped suddenly from the side of the road onto its traveled portion, directly in front of the approaching car, and when it was so near to her as to render it impossible to avoid the impact. Under the circumstances we are unable to say that the giving of the foregoing instructions constituted prejudicial error.

[11, 12] In concluding its charge to the jury the court gave the following and final instruction:

> "I think you have been instructed now on every possible legal phase of the case. The question for you to decide after all is whether or not at the particular time shown by the evidence the defendant Albert F. Scheidecker, Jr., was guilty of negligence. Of course the testimony going both before and after the incident may throw light upon the real situation, and you are to consider all of the evidence in the case in determining your verdict."

It is quite apparent that the court in adding these closing words to the general body of its instructions was not intending to comprehensively cover the subject, or to state the whole law of the case, or to contradict or vary the effect of its former instructions. It is argued by the appellants that this instruction withdrew from the minds of the jurors all questions relating to the contributory negligence of the injured plaintiff, but obviously such was not the intent of the court. It does not by this instruction tell the jury that if they should find the defendant named to have been negligent they must bring in a verdict for the plaintiffs. Its utmost intendment was to advise the jury that the primary question to be determined by it was the negligence of the driver of the car. In this aspect the instruction was entirely correct, since if it should be found that he was not negligent at the particular time of the accident all such secondary questions as the contributory negligence of the plaintiffs would become immaterial, since in the absence of such primary negligence in the driver of the car they would not be entitled to recover. The appellants further argue that the foregoing instruction withdrew from the jury the question as to whether the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, and urge that the court did not elsewhere in its instructions give an instruction as to proximate cause. We think the instructions fairly construed cover this subject. The court charged the jury as follows, evidently at the defendant's request:

> "I instruct you that the plaintiffs in this action are not entitled to recover damages unless it is shown by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the manner stated in plaintiffs' complaint, and, if the plaintiffs fail to prove such negligence on the part of defendants, your verdict must be in favor of the defendants."

A finding by the jury that the defendants were guilty of negligence "in the manner stated in the plaintiffs' complaint" would of necessity amount to a finding that the negligence of the defendant as alleged and found was the proximate cause of the stricken woman's injuries. We find no prejudicial error in the instructions of the court, except in so far as it might be inferred therefrom that the jury was entitled to bring in a verdict against Mary L. Scheidecker as to whom, as already stated, there is no sufficient evidence to warrant a judgment against her.

The judgment is reversed as to Mary L. Scheidecker, and is affirmed as against the other two defendants.

PIPER et al. v. BIG PINE SCHOOL DIST. OF INYO COUNTY et al. (S. F. 10953.)

1. Schools and school districts ⚷148—Enjoyment of privilege of attending public schools held enforceable rights vouchsafed to those entitled to attend.

The enjoyment of privileges of attending public schools is an enforceable right vouchsafed to all who have a legal right to attend the public schools, which cannot be enjoyed as a matter of right by those who, from choice or compulsion, attend schools without the control, supervision, and regulation of the state educational departments.

2. Schools and school districts ⚷9—Education of children state obligation.

The education of the children of the state is an obligation which the state took over by the adoption of the Constitution and is exclusively a function which cannot be delegated to any other agency.

3. Constitutional law ⚷220—When denial to children of admittance to common schools solely because of racial differences violates Fourteenth Amendment.

While the privilege of receiving an education at the expense of the state is not one belonging to those upon whom it is conferred as citizens of the United States, because the general system of education is distinctly a state affair, the denial to children whose parents, as well as themselves, are citizens of the United States and of the state of their residence, of admittance to the common schools solely because of color or racial differences without having made provision for their education equal in all respects to that afforded persons of any other race or color, is a violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

4. Constitutional law 🔑70(1)—Courts not concerned with economic consequences to school district if required to maintain separate school for Indian children, question being for Legislature.

That it would add to the cost of a school district should it be required to maintain a separate school for Indian children held a matter for which the courts are not responsible, it being an economic question proper to be addressed to the Legislature.

5. Schools and school districts 🔑151—Indian child held entitled to attend school of district of her residence, though eligible to attend federal school for Indians, in same district.

Petitioner, an Indian child whose parents as well as herself are citizens of the United States and of the state and who never belonged to any tribe within Dawes Act of 1887 (U. S. Comp. St. § 3951), was entitled to attend as a pupil a school conducted by the governing body of the school district of which she is a resident and a citizen, in view of Const. art. 9, §§ 1, 5, and Const. U. S. Amend 14, and could not be excluded under Political Code, § 1662, subds. 2, 3, merely because she was an Indian and as such was eligible to attend a federal school for Indians situate in same district; St. 1921, p. 1673, § 1, subds. 3, 4 (known as Compulsory Educational Law), not applying.

In Bank.

Original petition for mandamus by Alice Piper, by Pike Piper, her guardian ad litem, and others, against the Big Pine School District of Inyo County and others. Writ granted.

J. W. Henderson, of Eureka, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank English, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jess Hession, Dist. Atty., of Independence, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This is an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the trustees of Big Pine school district of Inyo county, this state, and its teacher, to admit and receive into said school as a pupil thereof Alice Piper, a female Indian child of the age of 15 years, and a resident of said district, who has been excluded from attendance upon said school. Big Pine school district is a part of the common or public school system of this state, organized and maintained in obedience to the constitutional mandate and the general school laws of the state. The guardian ad litem, Pike Piper, and his wife, Annie Piper, persons of the Indian race and blood, are the parents of petitioner, Alice Piper. It is admitted by the answer that both parents and petitioner are citizens of the United States and of this state, and that neither the petitioner nor either of her parents has ever lived in tribal relations with any tribe of Indians or has ever owed or acknowledged allegiance or fealty of any kind to any tribe or "nation" of Indians, or has ever lived upon a government Indian reservation, or has at any time been a ward or dependent of the nation. No separate school for Indian children has at any time been established by the governing body of said school district, but the United States government, under the direction and supervision of the Department of the Interior, has established and does now maintain a school for the education and training of members of the Indian race within the territorial boundaries of said school district, to which school petitioner is eligible as a pupil. No objection is made to the admission of petitioner to said public school other than that she is a person of Indian blood. Petitioner alleges, and respondents admit, that she is now and at all times mentioned in said petition has been a person of good habits and character, in good physical health, and that she is in need of and desirous of obtaining an education such as is obtainable in the public schools of this state, and that her parents are desirous that she should obtain such an education. As a citizen of the state, under the foregoing circumstances, she claims the right to be admitted to and received into said school, and challenges the constitutionality of the provisions of section 1662, subdivisions 2 and 3, of the Political Code as amended (Stats. 1921, p. 1160), so far as it attempts to confer upon the governing body of the school district the power to exclude Indian children, because of blood differences alone, from attending a district public school maintained under the authority of the laws of the state, provided the United States government maintains an Indian school within said school district and the Indian children residing within said district are eligible for attendance upon such Indian school, as provided by said subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 1662. Said section so far as it directly bears upon the question of the education of Indian children is as follows:

"1662. First. The courses of study for the day elementary schools of California shall embrace eight years of instruction; and such courses must allot eight years for instruction in subjects required to be taught in such schools and may allot not more than two years for kindergarten instruction.

"Second. The day elementary schools of each school district of California shall be open for the admission of all children between six and twenty-one years of age residing within the boundaries of the district, including Indian children whose education may not otherwise have been provided for by the federal government, and may be open for the admission of adults if the governing body of the district deem such admission advisable; provided, that where kindergarten instruction is given in the schools of a district, such school shall admit children to the kindergarten classes at four years of age; and the reports for the kindergarten classes shall be kept and shall be made separate from other school reports; and provided, further, that wherever a school is established for the > instruction of the deaf, such children may be admitted to such school at three years of age; provided, that the average daily attendance of deaf children who are six years of age or older shall be counted as part of the average daily attendance in the day elementary schools.

> "Third. The governing body of the school district shall have power to exclude children of filthy or vicious habits, or children suffering from contagious or infectious diseases, and also to establish separate schools for Indian children and for children of Chinese, Japanese or Mongolian parentage. When such separate schools are established, Indian children or children of Chinese, Japanese, or Mongolian parentage must not be admitted into any other school.
> "It is further provided, that in school districts in Calfornia where the United States government has established an Indian school, or in an area not to exceed three miles from the said Indian school, the Indian children of the district, or districts, eligible for attendance upon such Indian school, may not be admitted to the district school."

It is a claim of respondents that if the school maintained by the federal government corresponds in all respects in grade, course, and hours of study to state schools and otherwise affords equal educational facilities and advantages with the schools maintained by the state or, as intimated, if they be better adapted to the education of members of the Indian race, petitioners would not be prejudiced by being excluded from said state school and could have no reasonable ground of complaint. Respondents justify their action on the authority of said section 1662, Political Code, which they claim to be a valid exercise of legislative power and which in nowise exceeds constitutional limitations. If constitutional guaranties are to be regarded, this contention cannot be sustained.

The policy of the law of this state since its organization with reference to the subject of the education of its citizens finds forcible expression in the language of our earlier and present Constitution and in legislative enactments. By article 9, § 1, of the state Constitution, the advantages and necessities of a universally educated people as a guaranty and means for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people is thus declared:

> "A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement."
> Section 5. "The Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools, by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year, after the first year in which a school has been established."

By other sections the Constitution provides for the establishment of elementary, high, day and evening secondary schools, vocational and technical schools, kindergarten schools, normal schools, and teachers' colleges as may be established by the Legislature or by municipal or district authority.

[1, 2] The Legislature is commanded by the organic law to provide for the appointment or the election of a state board of education whose duty it shall be to provide, compile, or cause to be compiled, and adopted, a uniform series of text-books for use in the day and evening elementary schools throughout the state. Such books shall be furnished and distributed by the state free of cost or any charge whatever, to all children attending the day and evening elementary schools of this state under such conditions as the Legislature shall prescribe. Both the Constitution and statutes of the state provide for a uniform system and course of study as adopted and provided by the authority of the state. Under this uniform system pupils advance progressively from one grade to another and, upon the record made, are admitted from one school into another pursuant to a uniform system of educational progression. The enjoyment of these privileges are enforceable rights vouchsafed to all who have a legal right to attend the public schools which cannot be enjoyed as a matter of right by those who, from choice or compulsion, attend schools without the control, supervision, and regulation of the educational departments of the state. The education of the children of the state, into whose keeping, sooner or later, the preservation of the "rights and liberties of the people" must be committed, is not only directed by but also protected and safeguarded by a state board of education vested with supervisory power against the teaching of doctrines that might have the tendency of purpose of destroying the fundamental principles upon which our government rests. It is in a sense exclusively the function of the state which cannot be delegated to any other agency. The education of the children of the state is an obligation which the state took over to itself by the adoption of the Constitution. To accomplish the purposes therein expressed the people must keep under their exclusive control, through their representatives, the education of those whom it permits to take part in directing the affairs of state.

[3] The privilege of receiving an education at the expense of the state is not one belonging to those upon whom it is conferred as citizens of the United States. The federal Constitution does not provide for any general system of education to be conducted and controlled by the national government. It is distinctly a state affair. Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351; Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558. But the denial to children whose parents, as well as themselves, are citizens of the United States and of this state, admittance to the common schools solely because of color or racial differences without having made provision for their education equal in all respects to that afforded persons of any other race or color, is a violation of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "Nor shall any state * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." For an application of this amendment to the subject before us, see 11 Cor. Jur. 805.

The early case of Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405, considered the provisions of the Constitution of 1849 relative to educational affairs which, in all material respects were similar to those of the present Constitution. There an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the admission of a person of African descent into the public schools of the city and county of San Francisco was denied upon the ground that a separate school had been established by the governing body of the district with like facilities and advantages with those maintained for the general public. The court said:

> "The opportunity of instruction at public schools is afforded the youth of the state by the statute of the state, enacted in obedience to the special command of the Constitution of the state, directing that the Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools, by which a school shall be kept up and supported in each district, at least three months in every year, etc. (article 19, sec. 3). The advantage or benefit thereby vouchsafed to each child, of attending a public school is, therefore, one derived and secured to it under the highest sanction of positive law. It is, therefore, a right—a legal right—as distinctively so as the vested right in property owned is a legal right, and as such it is protected, and entitled to be protected by all the guaranties by which other legal rights are protected and secured to the possessor. * * * The public law of the state—both the Constitution and statute—having established public schools for educational purposes, to be maintained by public authority and at public expense, the youth of the state are thereby become pro hac vice the wards of the state, and under the operations of the constitutional amendment referred to, equally entitled to be educated at the public expense. It would, therefore, not be competent to [for] the Legislature, while providing a system of education for the youth of the state, to exclude the petitioner and those of her race from its benefits, merely because of their African descent, and to have so excluded her would have been to deny to her the equal protection of the laws within the intent and meaning of the Constitution."

The establishment by the state of separate schools for Indians, as provided by the statute, does not offend against either the federal or state Constitutions. Questions of racial differences have arisen in various forms in the several states of the Union and it is now finally settled that it is not in violation of the organic law of the state or nation, under the authority of a statute so providing, to require Indian children or others in whom racial differences exist, to attend separate schools, provided such schools are equal in every substantial respect with those furnished for children of the white race. "Equality, and not identity of privileges and rights, is what is guaranteed to the citizen." No separation can be had, however, in the absence of statutory or constitutional authority therefor. Ward v. Flood, supra; Wysinger v. Crookshank, 82 Cal. 558, 23 Pac. 54; Crawford v. School District, etc., 68 Or. 388, 137 Pac. 217, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 147, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 477 and note; Lehew v. Brummell, 103 Mo. 546, 15 S. W. 765, 11 L. R. A. 828, 23 Am. St. Rep. 895; United States v. Buntin, 10 Fed. 730, and note; Roberts v. City of Boston, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 198; People, etc., v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438, 45 Am. Rep. 232; 14 R. C. L. § 18, p. 122; 35 Cyc. 1111.

No dispute arises here as to the political or civil status of petitioner. She is the descendant of an aboriginal race whose ancient right to occupy the soil has the sanction of nature's code. Since the founding of this government its policy has been, so far as feasible, to promote the general welfare of the American Indian, even to the point of exercising paternal care, and, whenever he has shown an inclination to accept the advantages which our civil and political institutions offer, to permit him to enjoy them on equal terms with ourselves. To this end Congress, in 1887, adopted a statute known as the Dawes Act (24 U. S. Stats. at Large 390 [U. S. Comp. St. § 3951]), which provides as follows:

> "* * * Every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up within said limits his residence, separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, whether said Indian has been or not, by birth or otherwise, a member of any tribe of Indians within the territorial limits of the United States without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the right of any such Indian to tribal or other property."

See People v. Bray, 105 Cal. 344, 38 Pac. 731, 27 L. R. A. 158; Anderson v. Mathews, 174 Cal. 537, 163 Pac. 902.

Petitioner's parents, doubtless, belong to that group of Indians commonly known as California Indians, who do not, and have not within the memory of man, belonged to any tribe of Indians recognized as such by the United States as a distinct political community and which are described, and whose political rights are thus defined in Anderson v. Mathews, supra, as follows:

> "The tribe, so far as we know, never had a tribal government of any sort. Admitting that the original tribe may have had such government, yet the plaintiff's group never had any form of self-government of any kind. Neither the members of the group nor, so far as known, the members of the tribe, were subject to, or owed allegiance to, any government, except that of the United States and the state of California, and, prior to 1848, that of Mexico. The reason for the rule laid down in Elk v. Wilkins [112 U. S. 94], declaring that a tribal Indian is not a citizen of the United States, is wholly wanting here, and therefore this case is governed by the general rule that the place of birth confers citizenship. The plaintiff and his group rather belong to that class of Indians described in Danzell v. Webquish, 108 Mass. 133, and Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 146 [3 L. Ed. 181], as Indians who have lost their power of self-government and become subject to state laws, and who accordingly must be citizens by birth, since they have never been subject to any jurisdiction other than that of the United States."

See, also, 13 Cal. Jur. 1062; 31 Cor. Jur. 482.

Respondents' contention that section 5, article 9, state Constitution, which provides that "the Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools, by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year," etc., is satisfied by the establishment of the federal school in question, is answered by the patent fact that the mandate of the Constitution has been wholly ignored and no legislation whatever has been had in compliance therewith so far as this petitioner is concerned. To argue that petitioner is eligible to attend a school which may perchance exist in the district, but over which the state has no control, is to beg the question. However efficiently or inefficiently such a school may be conducted would be no concern of the state. The public school system of this state is a product of the studied thought of the eminent educators of this and other states of the Union, perfected by years of trial and experience. It is adaptability to the genius of western development and expansion makes it peculiarly important to those who choose to remain in this state where its influence will be felt. Each grade forms a working unit in a uniform, comprehensive plan of education. Each grade is preparatory to a higher grade, and, indeed, affords an entrance into schools of technology, agriculture, normal schools, and the University of California. In other words, the common schools are doorways opening into chambers of science, art, and the learned professions, as well as into fields of industrial and commercial activities. Opportunities for securing employment are often more or less dependent upon the rating which a youth, as a pupil of our public institutions, has received in his school work. These are rights and privileges that cannot be denied.

Respondents cite in support of their position subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to enforce the educational rights of children and providing penalties for the violation of this act" (Acts 1903, p. 388, as amended by Stats. 1921, p. 1673), commonly referred to as the "Compulsory Educational Law," which permits children to attend privately conducted schools provided the tutors or instructors of such schools are capable of teaching, and provided, further, that such institutions shall offer instruction in the several branches of study required to be taught in the public schools of this state. Other provisions not important to this discussion, such as the keeping of an attendance record, are within its terms. We think those permissive sections do not strengthen respondents' position and are not relevant to the issue presented. Those sections give to the child or parent or guardian of such child the right to exercise a volition—a choice—as to the kind of school the child shall attend. To permit children to attend privately conducted schools and avoid the penalties prescribed for nonattendance upon the public schools, the compulsory attendance law prescribes an alternative system, this act, however, is in aid of the exercise of a free volition and is not intended as the denial of the right to attend schools supported at the state's expense. We deem it unnecessary to go further in this direction.

[4] Respondents call our attention to the serious effect that the issuance of the writ will have upon the respondent district. Big Pine school district is located in a sparsely settled portion of the state and contains a number of Indian children, who, it is fairly inferable, attend the Indian or federal school, either as a matter of choice or under the belief that they may not, as a matter of right, attend the district school. It appears from the papers in the case that children of nontaxpaying Indian parents are, by government rule or upon other authority, eligible to attend the federal school, but Indian children whose parents are taxpayers are not admitted into said school. The effect of this decision, it is suggested, will probably cause a greatly increased attendance of Indian children upon the district school who cannot be cared for because of the economic or administrative problem which it will create. No doubt it would add to the cost of the district should it be required to maintain a separate school for Indian children, but this is a consequence for which the courts are not responsible. The economic question is no doubt an important matter to the district, but it may very properly be addressed to the legislative department of the state government.

[5] The constitutional guaranties involved in this case are imperative and must be given effect. Petitioner is entitled to be received as a pupil into the school conducted by the governing body of the school district of which she is a resident and a citizen.

The writ will therefore issue.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 16, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1099(4)—Opinion held not to hold that entire clause of lease for deposit as security was void because of provision for liquidated damages.

Opinion on former appeal held not to hold void entire clause of lease providing for deposit by lessee as security for performance of lease and as liquidated damages for failure to pay rent, but merely the provision for liquidated damages to be void, and the judgment, to the extent of recovery of liquidated damages, unauthorized.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑184(2)—Provision of lease for deposit as general security valid though provision for liquidated damages void.

Provision of lease for deposit as general security for performance of lessee's covenants is valid, and may be enforced, disregarding the void attempt of lease to fix liquidated damages for failure to pay rent.

3. Principal and surety 🔑45 — Finding that transaction was loan sustained by evidence.

Finding that $8,000 represented by check of B. to M., which M. indorsed and deposited in bank as security for his obligations under lease from K., was loaned by B. to M. so that B. was not as to it surety for M. on the lease, held sustained by the evidence.

4. Evidence 🔑383(7)—Recital of contract evidence of nature transaction in favor of third person.

That agreement between B. and M., made immediately after M. indorsed and deposited in bank as security for his obligations under lease to him from K. check of $8,000 from B. to M., recited, Whereas, B. has loaned to M. $8,000 for purposes set forth in the lease, is evidence in favor of K. of the transaction being a loan by B. to M., though K. was not party to and did not know of the agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Thomas G. Knight and another, executors, against Benjamin L. Marks and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Joseph C. Bianchi appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Elliott M. Epsteen, of San Francisco, for respondent Marks.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondent German Savings & Loan Society.

Peter A. Breen and Percy E. Towne, both of San Francisco, for other respondents.

ST. SURE, J. This is the second appeal in this case. The action was brought to recover money claimed to be due to the plaintiffs' testatrix upon a lease executed by her to Benjamin L. Marks on October 22, 1908. Plaintiffs sought to obtain liquidated damages for the nonpayment of rent, and to forfeit a deposit held by the German Savings & Loan Society as security. The cause was first tried by a jury, and upon the verdict judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs and against Marks for the sum of $2,900, and against Bianchi and the German Savings & Loan Society for the sum of $11,222.87. From this judgment the defendant Joseph C. Bianchi appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment upon the ground that, the breach of the lease complained of being merely nonpayment of rent, plaintiffs were not entitled to liquidated damages under section 1670 of the Civil Code. Knight v. Marks, 183 Cal. 354, 191 Pac. 531. Upon the filing of the remittitur in the court below plaintiffs amended their complaint, and upon the second trial made no claim to liquidated damages, but claimed that the deposit was a general security for the lease, and that they had the right to apply it in satisfaction of unpaid rent.

Defendant Bianchi set up six special defenses in his answer. The first is to the effect that the money deposited was, at the time of the deposit, the property of C. D. Bianchi; that Mrs. Knight had been informed prior to and at the time of the deposit that the money deposited was the property of Bianchi, and that it was furnished by Bianchi for the purpose of making the deposit, and that it was only pledged by Bianchi as security for the obligations of Marks, and that Marks had no other interest in it. The second defense pleads a judgment in an action pending in the superior court and numbered 56400, wherein Bianchi was plaintiff and B. L. Marks and the German Savings & Loan Society were defendants. The third defense is a narration of the various provisions of the lease secured by the deposit. The fourth defense alleges that by an executed oral agreement between these plaintiffs, as executors of the will of Mrs. Knight, and Marks as lessee, made on or about the 1st day of January, 1916, the rent under the lease was reduced from $1,000 to $700 per month, and that all rental due under the lease has been paid. The fifth defense is that the judgment upon the former trial is final and bars the further prosecution of this action. The sixth defense alleges that defendant Marks, with the written consent of plaintiffs, and without the consent of defendant Joseph C. Bianchi, assigned the lease to the Central Garage Company, and that said assignee took possession of and occupies the premises as tenant of plaintiffs and as assignee of Marks.

The trial court found that the money deposited was loaned to Marks by C. D. Bianchi, and that at the time of the deposit Marks was the owner thereof; that it is not true that Mrs. Knight had been informed that the sum deposited was the property of C. D. Bianchi, nor that it was furnished by Bianchi as security for the obligations of Marks under the lease, nor that Marks had no other interest therein; that it is not true that the money was pledged by C. D. Bianchi as security for the obligations of said Marks under the lease, or otherwise. The trial court further found that Serena H. Knight was not a party to nor interested in said action in the superior court, numbered 56400, and that the said action did not in any manner or to any extent affect or alter the right, title, or interest of said Serena H. Knight in or to said fund. The trial court further found that the allegations of the fourth defense are not true, and as to the fifth defense it was found that the judgment recovered in the former trial is not final nor a bar, as said judgment has been reversed and set aside by the Supreme Court. It was further found that the allegations contained in the sixth defense are untrue.

Judgment was given in the trial court in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant Marks for the sum of $16,400 unpaid rent, and $200 attorneys' fees as provided in the lease. The judgment further declared that the defendant Bianchi had an interest in the deposit, subject to the right of plaintiffs to apply the deposit and accrued interest in satisfaction of the judgment against Marks, and provided that any balance of the deposit remaining after the satisfaction of the judgment against Marks should be paid to Bianchi. From this judgment the defendant Bianchi alone appeals.

The appellant contends, first, that, as the Supreme Court has held that the provision in the lease for the application of the deposit to the payment of liquidated damages is void, the security cannot be taken for any other purpose; second, that the ruling of the lower court that the $8,000 was loaned by C. D. Bianchi to Marks cannot be upheld because delivery of the money to the debtor is necessary to constitute a loan, and no such delivery was shown; third, that the deposit in the German Bank was a pledge; and, fourth, that, when C. D. Bianchi furnished Marks with the money with which to make the deposit, the former became a surety, and was discharged when Mrs. Knight and Marks entered into the contract of May 13, 1912, modifying the lease by extending the term and making other changes.

The facts on this appeal and those presented on the first appeal, are almost identical. We quote and adopt the following clear and succinct statement from the opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw in Knight v. Marks, 183 Cal. 354:

> "The lease embraced property upon which the lessor agreed to erect a building in accordance with plans and specifications annexed thereto. * * * It was for the term of 10 years, beginning 30 days after the completion of the building. The total rental was $120,000, payable in monthly installments of $1,000 each on the 1st day of each month, and Marks was to pay $200 as attorneys' fees in any action by the lessor against the lessee for a breach of any covenant of the lease. It provided that the lessee should furnish $8,000 as security for the performance of the covenants on his part, which sum should be deposited in the German Savings & Loan Society in the names and for the joint account of the lessor and lessee, there to remain with such interest as should accumulate thereon, provided that, in the event of failure to pay rent or other breach of covenant by Marks, the 'lessor may withdraw from the said account the entire sum, together with the accumulated interest, as agreed liquidated damages for the breach,' and that upon the termination of the lease by expiration of time or otherwise, any balance of the money and interest so on deposit and not applied to the claims of the lessor should be returned to the lessee. * * * The evidence showed that at the time the money was deposited C. D. Bianchi, as a loan to Marks for the purposes of said lease, gave him a check for $8,000 to be used in making said deposit; that the check was indorsed by Marks and transferred to the bank, and that the deposit was, by that means, effected. Upon the deposit being made, Marks, in writing, assigned all his interest therein to C. D. Bianchi, 'subject to the lien thereon of said Serena H. Knight,' under the lease, as security for the repayment of said sum to Bianchi by Marks, and Marks therein expressly promised to repay the same."

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the entire clause of the lease under which the deposit was made is void because that clause contains a provision for liquidated damages; and in this connection it is urged that the Supreme Court on the first appeal (Knight v. Marks, supra) held that the provision in question was void in toto. The provision in question reads as follows:

> "It is further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties that the lessee shall furnish the sum of eight thousand dollars ($8,000) in cash, as security for the performance of the covenants in this lease contained on his part to be performed, and that the said money shall be deposited in the German Savings & Loan Society, in the names and for the joint account of the lessor and the lessee herein above named, and that the same shall there remain, together with such interest as may accumulate thereon, during the term herein prescribed, provided that in the event that the lessee shall fail at any time to pay any installment of rent herein provided, or shall fail to observe or perform any of the covenants herein prescribed, then and in that event the lessor may withdraw from the said account the entire sum together with the accumulated interest, as agreed liquidated damages for breach of the said covenants or covenant. At the expiration of the term of this lease or the sooner termination thereof by agreement, and not otherwise, any balance of said moneys which may not have been applied to the claim of the lessor as hereinabove provided, shall be returned to the lessee with such interest as may have accumulated."

A careful reading of the decision on the former appeal discloses that the Supreme Court did not hold that the entire clause above quoted was void. The Supreme Court said:

> "The only breach of the covenants of the lease here in question that is alleged is the failure to pay the stipulated rent," and "this action was merely for the rent due and the stipulated damages."

The Supreme Court held:

> "It could not be difficult or impracticable to fix the damages in such a case. It was a breach of an obligation to pay money only and the damage was 'the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon,' Civ. Code, § 3302. The parties cannot overcome this objection in such a case by any provision in the contract itself, for such a provision is expressly declared to be void. Civ. Code, § 1670; Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 262, 168 Pac. 114; Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 564, 58 Pac. 130. It follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to anything as liquidated damages for the breach of contract alleged, and that the verdict and judgment are, to that extent, without support in the law and evidence."

Appellant approves the maxim that a contract should be construed to make it valid rather than void, but argues that—

> "When the court says that the 'provision' is void, it does not mean merely the words 'liquidated damages' but all of the context which is tributary to those words."

Our attention has not been called to any authority which gives to section 1670 of the Civil Code a construction contrary to that indicated in Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 Pac. 114, and Knight v. Marks, supra, the opinions in both cases being delivered for the Supreme Court by the same learned justice. In Green v. Frahm, a clause in a lease similar to the clause in the lease under discussion here was under consideration, and there the court held that the part of the clause attempting to fix liquidated damages must be treated as a void provision and disregarded entirely. The conclusion reached by the Supreme Court on the first appeal of this cause is quite plain; we repeat it:

> "It follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to anything as liquidated damages for the breach of contract alleged, and that the verdict and judgment are, to that extent, without support in the law and evidence." (Italics ours.)

This language admits of no such construction as appellant seeks to place upon it. We think that the provisions of the lease may be enforced disregarding the attempt to fix liquidated damages in case of breach. The deposit was a general security for the lease and could be applied in satisfaction of unpaid rent (Green v. Frahm, supra). In line with such view we are constrained to say that, in our opinion, there is nothing in the lease which is against public policy.

[3, 4] The further contentions of appellant that the finding of the trial court that the $8,000 was loaned by C. D. Bianchi to Marks cannot be upheld because delivery of the money was not shown, that the deposit was a pledge, and that when C. D. Bianchi furnished Marks with the money with which to make the deposit the former became a surety, will be considered and disposed of together.

On the first appeal the Supreme Court held that at the time the deposit was made the money therefor was loaned by C. D. Bianchi to Marks, and that "by the terms of the agreement and of the loan the title to it passed absolutely to Marks."

The evidence before us shows that immediately after the deposit of $8,000 was made C. D. Bianchi and Marks entered into an agreement which recited, among other things:

> "And whereas, the party of the second part herein [C. D. Bianchi] has loaned to said party of the first part herein [Marks] the said sum of eight thousand ($8,000) dollars, for the purposes as set forth in said lease. * * *"

This agreement, made on the day of the deposit, is convincing evidence as to the understanding between Marks and Bianchi relative to the ownership of the $8,000. That Mrs. Knight was not a party to the agreement, or did not know of it, does not detract from its value as evidence of the nature of the transaction between Marks and Bianchi. It is true that appellant, upon the second trial, offered testimony by Marks to show knowledge on the part of Mrs Knight that Marks was going to obtain the money for deposit from Bianchi. But such additional evidence merely accentuates an existing conflict which makes conclusive the finding of the trial court in the premises. Appellant claimed on the first appeal, as he claims here (see Knight v. Marks, supra)—

> "the absolute and immediate right to the fund, on the ground that, by the terms of an alleged agreement between Mrs. Knight, Marks, and C. D. Bianchi at the time the deposit was made, it was understood between them that said Bianchi should deposit the money as security for the performance by Marks of his obligations under the lease, and consequently that said Bianchi and the fund he so deposited stand in the relation of a surety for Marks to Mrs. Knight for such performance. It is claimed, further, that in May, 1912, after the lease had run nearly three years, Mrs. Knight and Marks made an agreement in writing constituting a material alteration of the terms of the lease, so far as the obligations of Marks thereunder were concerned, which alteration it is argued operated to release the fund and transfer the same to Bianchi as the absolute owner thereof, under his assignment from Marks. It does not appear that Mrs. Knight had any knowledge of the terms of the agreement between C. D. Bianchi and Marks whereby the money was loaned to Marks for the purpose of making the deposit, and was immediately assigned by Marks to Bianchi as security for the repayment to Bianchi of the money so loaned by him to Marks. By the terms of the agreement and of the loan, the title to it passed absolutely to Marks. Mrs. Knight was not informed that the right of Marks thereto, such as it was, had been pledged to Bianchi for the repayment of the loan to him by Marks. The evidence does not show that she knew that Bianchi was, or claimed to be, a surety for Marks with respect to this money. Consequently the alteration of the lease, even if there were such alteration, did not operate to release her claim to the money so deposited. It may be added that the agreement, which it is claimed changed the terms of the lease, merely gave the consent of the lessor to the lessee to make some alterations in the premises which he desired to make and thereafter to use the premises as a garage instead of a stable. Prior to that time he had been using it as a stable. There was no covenant in the original lease which restricted the lessee's right to use the premises for anything other than a stable. We do not perceive how the consent of the lessor to the proposed alterations operated in any respect to change the obligations of Marks for which the money was deposited as security." Knight v. Marks, supra.

Believing as we do, that the sum of $8,000, deposited as security for the performance of the covenants of the lease, was loaned by C. D. Bianchi to Marks, and that the latter had title to the money at the time of the deposit, and that the findings of the trial court are supported by the evidence and the law, we deem further discussion unnecessary.

PEOPLE v. GERE. (Cr. 1067.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑338(4, 5)—Evidence of other transactions admissible to show conspiracy.

In prosecution for grand larceny by defrauding scheme known as pay-off game, evidence that money was obtained from another than complaining witness, by defendant's confederates by the same means a few days before, was admissible to show conspiracy, though defendant's personal participation in other offense was not shown, and even though defendant became member of conspiracy after other transaction occurred.

2. Criminal law 🔑576(2) — Habeas corpus proceedings by defendant "good cause" for failing to bring prosecution to trial within 60 days.

Habeas corpus proceedings by defendant, which delayed proceedings, constituted "good cause" for failing to bring prosecution to trial within 60 days after filing of indictment under Pen. Code, § 1382.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Cause.]

3. Larceny 🔑68(2)—Intention is question for jury.

Intention of persons obtaining money by the "pay-off" scheme, which under Penal Code, § 21, is manifested by circumstances connected with offense, is a question for the jury.

4. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instruction covered by given instruction not error.

It was not error to refuse a requested instruction covered in substance by given instruction.

5. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Error in refusal of instruction held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

If it was error to refuse to instruct jury concerning right to decide questions of handwriting for themselves despite testimony of experts, held that it did not result in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Thomas P. Gere was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 221 Pac. 689.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction on a charge of grand larceny and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

There were five counts in the indictment under which defendant was prosecuted. On motion of the district attorney three of the counts were dismissed before the trial commenced, and a fourth count was likewise dismissed after the evidence with reference thereto had been introduced.

The point is here raised that the trial court erred in admitting any evidence as to the count which was dismissed during the pendency of the trial; that all such evidence should have been stricken out, and the jury instructed that it should not be considered in arriving at a verdict in the case. The larceny of which defendant was convicted was effected by means of a fraudulent stock brokerage deal which is described in the case of People v. Berry (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 74, as follows:

"The defrauding scheme is what is known in police parlance as the 'pay-off game'; and when reduced to its brutal last analysis consists in making some 'honest' tourist to the beautiful shores of California believe that he can make a huge fortune by 'playing' Wall street through some local 'brokerage house,' and, in any event, he can escape liability for loss, if he loses, by the use of fictitious or 'phony' checks or 'credit slips.' He 'wins' anywhere from $10,000 to a quarter of a million dollars; some trouble arises with the 'brokerage house' in the matter of paying the 'winnings,' and this trouble is usually over the 'credit slips,' in that the money 'won' cannot be paid until 'credit is established' in order that the 'brokerage house' may know that the 'victim' could have paid his losses if he had lost; the victim usually goes hurriedly back to his home town and there converts everything available into current funds; more hurriedly he returns here to collect his 'winnings'; another 'play' is made; some 'mistake' is made therein and all is 'lost'; he is then sent to some far off city to wait the arrival of his associates and all will be regained by 'playing' Wall street again on the money to be furnished by his associates—who never come."

In the count of the indictment which resulted in the conviction of defendant it appeared that defendant, with the aid of at least two confederates, successfully obtained the money alleged to have been stolen, from a man by the name of Herr, and in the count of the indictment on which evidence was heard, but which count was dismissed on motion of the district attorney, although defendant's personal participation in the commission of that offense was not shown, it very clearly appeared that almost identical means to defraud a man named Donahue were used by the same men who had assisted defendant in the Herr transaction. Under appropriate instructions the evidence regarding the Donahue transaction was permitted to go to the jury on the theory that it tended to prove a conspiracy to commit the crime of grand larceny and that defendant was one of the conspirators. In the case of People v. Berry, supra, Berry was shown to have had active dealings with several different persons, including this defendant and each of his two alleged confederates, in connection with "stock brokerage" matters of a similar nature to that herein set forth; and the Supreme Court, in passing upon the question of whether or not a conspiracy was established, said that the evidence demonstrated the existence of a conspiracy and that there was no doubt "that evidence of each and all of the enumerated transactions, whether covered by the indictment or not, was admissible under the similar offense rule as tending to prove a conspiracy. The interlocking of the participants in the various frauds, their common use of the same fictitious entities, their uniform insistence that their banking needs in carrying out their numerous swindling operations should be intrusted solely to the defendant as assuring an element of safety, were facts justifying an inference that a general conspiracy existed."

[1] The evidence here as to the Donahue transaction, being based upon a specific count in the indictment against defendant, was unquestionably originally admissible, and the fact that that particular count was dismissed did not necessarily render the evidence received in support of such count improper for the consideration of the jury, if such evidence tended to prove the existence of a general conspiracy to commit grand larceny, together with defendant's connection therewith. An examination of the evidence herein discloses the fact that to all intents and purposes the system employed in the matter in which Herr was the victim was identical with that used with reference to Donahue. The same persons, with the exception of this defendant in the second affair, were involved in each of those transactions. Judging from the evidence in this case, as well as from the conclusion reached by the jury herein, a conspiracy undoubtedly existed as among defendant and his confederates to commit the crime of grand larceny as to Mr. Herr's possessions. The evidence as to the Donahue matter very plainly indicates that a conspiracy also existed among certain persons to feloniously obtain money and property from Mr. Donahue, and that such nefarious object was effected on or about January 23, 1920. Twelve days later, according to the evidence, several of the persons concerned in the Donahue case, together with this defendant, succeeded by means similar in all respects to those employed in that case in larcenously obtaining a large sum of money from Mr. Herr. The conspiracy being established in the first case and defendant's connection with a similar conspiracy consisting of the same persons, together with defendant, in the second case, the inference is almost irresistible that the conspiracy was continuous, as far at least as between the first and the second transactions, and the rule is well settled that one who joins a criminal conspiracy is to be considered as a party to all acts theretofore or thereafter committed by any or all of his coconspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy. 12 C. J. p. 579, and cases therein cited. Assuming that this defendant became a member of the conspiracy after the Donahue transaction occurred would constitute no valid objection to the introduction, on the trial of this case, of evidence relating to such transaction for the purpose of showing the existence of the conspiracy (People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 Pac. 555), even though such evidence tended to establish the commission of a similar offense (Dahl v. United States, 234 Fed. 618, 148 C. C. A. 384).

[2] Defendant was arrested for the commission of the several offenses charged in the indictment on August 13, 1923, and his ar-

raignment thereon followed two days later. Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides that, "unless good cause to the contrary is shown," the court must order the dismissal of a criminal action "if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment." It is contended by appellant that because against defendant's objection thereto, the trial of his case was postponed by the court beyond the 60-day period fixed by the statute, defendant was entitled to have the action against him dismissed, and that in the circumstances the court erred in proceeding with the trial. It appears from the record herein that, after the arraignment of defendant, the action was originally set for trial within the time provided by the statute, but that before the date fixed for the trial arrived a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of defendant and relating to this action was presented to the District Court of Appeal, in which proceeding briefs were filed by respective counsel, after which the matter was taken under advisement by said court until November 16, 1923, when, by its order, the writ was discharged. On November 7, 1923, which was the date on which the case had been set for trial following several previous postponements thereof, the hearing was continued by the lower court until November 21st, at which time the trial was commenced. The record also discloses the fact that the reason for the said several continuances resulting in the action not being tried within the statutory 60-day period after defendant's arraignment, was that the said habeas corpus proceeding was pending in the District Court of Appeal. That proceedings of this nature constitute "good cause" for failure to bring an action to trial "within sixty days after the finding of the indictment" is indicated in the case of Chrisman v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 85, and in the same case, on petition for rehearing before the Supreme Court reported in 219 Pac. 85, in passing upon the matter before the court, it is said:

> "Where it is shown, in response to the petition for a writ of mandate, that there was in fact good cause for the delay in the trial of the case, it is immaterial whether or not such a cause was satisfactorily shown to the trial court, for the appellate court will not direct the dismissal of a case where it is shown to its satisfaction that the delay in the trial of a case was for good cause.
> "The refusal of the District Court of Appeal to issue a peremptory writ of mandate amounts to a determination by that court that the affidavits on behalf of the respondents show good cause for the delay, which is not overcome by the showing made by the petitioner."

Defendant instituted the habeas corpus proceedings in the District Court of Appeal for the ultimate purpose of testing the right of the superior court to proceed with his trial—his contention being that because the finding of the indictment was of date September 8, 1920, and that defendant was not arrested until August 13, 1923, under the terms of the statute to which reference has heretofore been made (section 1382, Pen. Code), the court was without jurisdiction, and consequently that the action should be dismissed and defendant given his liberty. After a consideration of the facts with reference to the delay as shown by the petition and the return to the writ in that proceeding, it was determined by this court that "good cause" was shown to exist for the delay up to that time, and the writ was discharged. Application of Gere (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 689. All the postponements of the trial of defendant after his arrest were directly caused by his own act in petitioning this court for the writ of habeas corpus. While it may not have been outside the jurisdiction of the superior court (a point which is not herein attempted to be decided) to proceed with the trial of defendant, notwithstanding the pendency of the habeas corpus proceeding, certainly in the circumstances the "good cause" for the delay referred to in the statute was sufficiently present to authorize the several continuances of the trial to a reasonable time after the decision by this court on defendant's petition for the writ.

[3] Appellant urges the point that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. The facts of this case cannot have a better general description than those which are given in the case of People v. Berry, supra. It is just possible that in all honesty and in the best of good faith a man might in the nighttime break open a door or a window of another man's house and thereupon enter the house and remove personal property therefrom; and it is likewise true that persons situated as were the parties involved in this transaction might possibly have acted honestly and in good faith; but, after all, the question of the intention with which the act was performed is one of fact to be determined by the jury. Intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense. Section 21, Pen. Code. If the intention of defendant here was to feloniously deprive Mr. Herr of his property (assuming that the intent was followed by asportation), then the crime of larceny was committed. The jury by its verdict declared against defendant's contention, and this court has found nothing in the record which would indicate that the jury reached an erroneous conclusion in that regard. The question of the identity of defendant is also raised, but that matter was likewise one for determination by the jury. There being substantial evidence to justify the conclusion that defendant's identity was clearly established, the court cannot usurp the functions of the jury and hold to the contrary.

error as against defendant in that, at his request, the court refused to give to the jury certain instructions. The first of these instructions directs attention to some of the evidence given on the trial from which the question might arise as to the nature of the offense, if any, committed by defendant; but, while such instruction was not in terms submitted to the jury, there was another instruction given which adequately covered the situation. The second instruction, which was likewise offered by defendant and by the court refused to be given to the jury, dealt entirely with the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the identification of defendant. While there was no direct instruction given to the jury touching the particular matter contained within the refused instruction, several other instructions, general in their nature, were given to the jury, which were broad enough to thoroughly inform the jury on the legal point in question. The last instruction offered by defendant and which was rejected by the court, in effect advised the jury that, as to expert testimony regarding handwriting, the jury had the right to use its own judgment and decide the fact, not necessarily from the testimony given by any expert, but by the jury themselves from their own consideration of the exhibits before them. Among the instructions given are found several expressions such as "you are the sole and exclusive judges of the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and it is your function to determine all questions of fact arising from the evidence in the case"; also, "you are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number, or against a presumption of law, or other evidence that satisfies your minds"; also, "the jury are the sole and exclusive judges of the effect and value of evidence addressed to them and of the credibility of the witnesses who have testified in the case."

[5] It appears from the record that the various and sundry examplars of the handwriting of defendant were filed as exhibits in the case. The jury, of course, could have had access to them. If the jury thought that any handwriting expert had been mistaken with reference to his testimony, the jury was told that it was the sole judge of the effect thereof. On the one hand, the jury had the right to believe the testimony of any expert; on the other hand, if the jury disbelieved the testimony of said expert, defendant was not injured. But, in any event, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, this court is of the opinion that, even conceding error, as claimed (which this court is not prepared to do), such error did not result in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

HERSOM v. HERSOM et al. (Civ. 4442.)

1. Judgment ⚷430—Failure to assert fraud in foreclosure suit precluded setting aside default judgment in equity.

Wife was precluded from setting aside default decree of foreclosure against husband's property because of fraud and connivance between her husband and his mother who bought in the property, by her failure to assert such defense in the foreclosure proceeding, though weak physically and poverty stricken, in absence of extrinsic collateral fraud, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing relief against default suffered through excusable neglect.

2. Judgment ⚷405—Mere poverty of defendant insufficient ground to set aside judgment.

Mere poverty of a defendant, unaccompanied by any effort of the prevailing party to prevent fair hearing of the cause, is never sufficient ground for suit in equity to set aside judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Carrie Hersom against Milton Hersom and another to set aside a default foreclosure judgment. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. L. Kilgore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry K. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent Milton Hersom.

Rollin L. McNitt, of Los Angeles, for respondent Benjamin F. Hersom.

CONREY, P. J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff against Milton Hersom and Inez E. Hersom. Prior to the trial of the action, Inez E. Hersom died, and Benjamin F. Hersom, executor of her last will and testament, was substituted in her place as defendant.

Carrie Hersom and Milton Hersom, at all of the times mentioned in the complaint, were husband and wife. They owned as community property several parcels of land. They executed three several notes and mortgages to different mortgagees, each of them being a lien upon a part of this real property. In May, 1919, Inez E. Hersom, who was the mother of defendant Milton Hersom, purchased these mortgages and caused them to be assigned to herself. On the 2d day of August, 1919, she commenced three actions, each action being for the foreclosure of one of said mortgages. In each action summons was served upon Carrie Hersom, defendant therein, on the 13th day of September, 1919, and her default entered on the 29th of the same month. The decrees of foreclosure were entered on the 28th day of October, 1919, and sales under said decrees were made in January, 1920. In each instance Inez E. Hersom became the purchaser of the property, and the sheriff's deeds were duly issued to the purchaser in January, 1921, after the expiration of the several periods of redemption.

The plaintiff herein and the defendant Milton Hersom had separated in July, 1918, and the husband had commenced an action for divorce. After that time they never lived together. In that divorce action relief was denied to both parties. A second divorce action was commenced by the husband on March 16, 1920. In that action an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff was entered on the 30th day of December, 1920, which decree, on appeal, was affirmed. Hersom v. Hersom, 60 Cal. App. 383, 212 Pac. 717.

This present action was brought by Carrie Hersom to obtain a decree setting aside the said several decrees of foreclosure and the sales and conveyances made thereunder, and to establish and declare the plaintiff's alleged rights in said several parcels of real property. In her complaint she did not attack the validity of the mortgages. She alleged that the mortgages were purchased by Inez E. Hersom with money furnished to her by defendant Milton Hersom; that the defendant Milton Hersom allowed the interest thereon to become delinquent for the purpose of instituting forclosure proceedings thereon; that said defendants connived and arranged for said proceedings for the purpose of wrongfully and fraudulently foreclosing the interest of said Carrie Hersom in said property, and that defendant Milton Hersom used the name of his mother for the purpose of defrauding said Carrie Hersom by means of said proceedings. Appellant further alleged that at the time of the commencement of said foreclosure actions, she was in a weakened physical condition and was without funds to contest the same, and was unable to file an answer thereto. Upon issues raised by the answer of the defendants, this action was tried and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

In response to issues raised by the complaint and the answer of the defendants, the court found that at the time of service of summons upon Carrie Hersom in each of said divorce actions, she took the copies of complaints and summonses to her attorneys; that the defendant Milton Hersom and his mother did not connive or arrange for said assignment of the mortgages wrongfully or fraudulently; and that the said Milton Hersom did not furnish any money for the purchase of any of said mortgages.

Appellant did not allege and does not contend that anything was done by either Milton Hersom or Inez E. Hersom or any person acting in their behalf to prevent appellant from making her defense, if any she had, in said foreclosure actions. She now complains that the court erred, in that appellant was not permitted to introduce evidence for the purpose of proving that said foreclosure proceedings were in fact fraudulent, as alleged in her complaint, and for the purpose of proving that, by reason of her financial and physical condition at the time of service of the summons, she was precluded from filing any answer because she was without funds "even to pay the fee required by law upon the filing of an answer," and to prove "that she relied upon her attorneys to protect her in the matter of these foreclosures, and that she told her counsel that the foreclosure proceedings were instituted for the express purpose of defrauding her." Such are the claims of appellant as set out in the brief of her counsel herein.

[1, 2] In view of the well-settled law in actions of this character, it at once becomes clear that there is no merit in the appeal. The statement of the case is itself almost a complete decision. Appellant had an opportunity to submit her claims for investigation and determination in the foreclosure actions. If there was any fraud it was something involved in the issues which she could have had determined, by defense in those actions. There was no extrinsic or collateral fraud whereby the jurisdiction of the court in those actions was imposed upon, or whereby the plaintiff in foreclosure prevented or did anything for the purpose of preventing Mrs. Carrie Hersom from presenting to the court her defense, if any she had. This being so, the judgments will not be set aside in an independent equitable proceeding based upon charges of fraud affecting the merits of the actions. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736. The mere poverty of a defendant in an action, unaccompanied by any effort of the prevailing party to prevent a fair hearing of the cause, is never a sufficient ground for a suit in equity to set aside the judgment.

Moreover, as has been suggested by counsel for respondents, appellant had an opportunity, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to apply to the court for relief against the defaults taken against her, if she had suffered default through any excusable neglect. "In such case there is no occasion to resort to equity, and it will not be permitted." Heller v. Dyerville Mfg. Co., 116 Cal. 127, 47 Pac. 1016. Appellant did not attempt to obtain the benefit of that remedy.

WILLIAMS et al. v. WALKER et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1924.)

1. Bills and notes 🔑262—Maker liable to accommodation indorser without knowledge of fraud.

Maker of negotiable promissory note is liable to one who, before maturity, in good faith and without notice or knowledge that there was fraud in original consideration or a want or failure of original consideration, indorses note for accommodation of payee, and without maker's request, if such indorser is compelled to pay it upon default of maker, even though after indorsement he acquires knowledge.

2. Bills and notes 🔑262, 379—Accommodation indorser liable to subsequent holder in due course; accommodation indorser, on payment, succeeds to indorsee's rights.

An accommodation indorser is liable to a subsequent holder in due course, though there was fraud in consideration for note, and upon payment he succeeds to right of indorsee against maker.

3. Bills and notes 🔑357, 358—Indorsee "holder for value" where note taken as collateral security for pre-existing debt; indorsee holder for value where note taken for debt then created.

Where a note is taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt owing to him by his indorser, or for a debt at that time created, indorsee is "holder for value" and in usual course of business, under Civ. Code, § 3106.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Holder for Value.]

4. Bills and notes 🔑357—One taking accommodation paper by way of pledge "holder for value."

One who takes accommodation paper by way of pledge to secure repayment of a simultaneous loan is a "holder for value."

5. Bills and notes 🔑262—Payment by accommodation indorser prerequisite to recovery from maker.

Payment of note by accommodation indorser is prerequisite to recovery from maker.

6. Bills and notes 🔑262—When execution of note by accommodation indorser constitutes payment of original note entitling recovery from maker.

Where an accommodation indorser has paid note of his principal by executing his own note to holder and it is accepted in payment of first note, he may recover from maker; but it is necessary that there be an express understanding or agreement that new note extinguishes indebtedness evidenced by earlier note.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Charles Williams and another against W. C. Walker and Harry Chann and another. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant and another appeal. Reversed.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for appellants.

David Cosgrave and W. A. Andrews, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Action by accommodation indorsers against the payee and makers of a negotiable promissory note for $500, dated January 18, 1918. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs against all the defendants, from which defendants Chann and Ah Tye appeal. Defendants Chann and Ah Tye were the makers, and defendant Walker was the payee. The payee, defendant Walker, indorsed the note, and at the same time, before maturity, at Walker's request and for his accommodation, plaintiffs also indorsed the note and guaranteed payment of the same, waiving presentation, demand, protest, and notice of nonpayment. Walker immediately thereafter delivered the note to the Merchants' National Bank of San Francisco and received from them $500. The complaint then alleges payment by plaintiffs to said bank, upon demand, of $550, the amount of principal and interest then due upon said note, delivery of the note to plaintiffs, and that "plaintiffs are now the owners and holders of the same." Defendant Walker defaulted in the action. Defendants Chann and Ah Tye in their answer admitted the execution and delivery of the note. For the purposes of this opinion it is sufficient to say that they attempted to plead, by way of defense, fraud in the procurement of the note, want of consideration, and failure of consideration; the note having been given in accordance with the terms of payment of a certain lease of farming land between defendant Walker as lessor, and defendants Chann and Ah Tye, as lessees, which lease it is claimed was obtained by false representations. Because we think the judgment must be reversed for the reasons hereinafter stated, it is unnecessary to pass upon these defenses.

[1-4] The maker of a negotiable promissory note is liable to one who, before maturity, in good faith and without notice or knowledge that there was fraud in the original consideration or a want or failure of the original consideration, indorses the note for the accommodation of the payee, and without the maker's request, if such indorser is compelled to pay it upon default of the maker.

Sheahan v. Davis, 27 Or. 278, 40 Pac. 405, 28 L. R. A. 476, 50 Am. St. Rep. 722; 3 R. C. L. p. 1121. And this is so even though after his indorsement he acquires that knowledge. Sheahan v. Davis, supra; Beckwith v. Webber, 78 Mich. 390, 44 N. W. 330; 3 R. C. L. p. 1121. Such indorser is liable to a subsequent holder in due course and, upon default of the maker, may, at any time after the note becomes due, pay the legal holder, take up the note, and recover from the maker. Upon payment he succeeds to the rights of the indorsee against the maker. Sheahan v. Davis, supra; Beckwith v. Webber, supra; Lill v. Gleason, 92 Kan. 754, 142 Pac. 287; 3 R. C. L. p. 1121; 8 C. J. p. 272, § 425. Where a note is taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt owing to him by his indorser or for a debt at that time created, the indorsee is a holder for value and in the usual course of business. People's State Bank v. Penello, 59 Cal. App. 174, 177, 210 Pac. 432; Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Wallace, 58 Cal. App. 625, 209 Pac. 78; Civ. Code, § 3106. Also "one who takes accommodation paper by way of pledge to secure the repayment of a simultaneous loan made in consideration of the pledge is a holder for value." 8 C. J. p. 267, § 419. It was alleged by respondents, and found by the trial court (and this finding is not attacked), that the note was hypothecated with the bank for a loan of $500 (the face value of the note). It is not contended that the bank had knowledge of any equities between the original parties to the note. The bank, therefore, being a pledgee for value, before maturity, in good faith and without notice of any infirmity in the note was a holder in due course (Anderson v. Union Bank, 117 Va. 1, 83 S. E. 1080, 1081), and respondents were liable to them.

[5] In this action it would have no effect upon the indicated rights and liabilities of respondents whether or not the defenses above referred to would be available to appellants in an action between the original parties to the note, if respondents indorsed without knowledge of any equities in favor of appellants. Passing the question of respondents' prior knowledge, which is one of the points urged by appellants, one other prerequisite to respondents' recovery from the makers (appellants) was payment by them to the bank. Sheahan v. Davis, supra; 3 R. C. L. pp. 1121, 1122. The trial court found that—

> "Prior to the commencement of this action, at the time said promissory note became due, upon demand made upon plaintiffs by said Merchants' National Bank, plaintiffs paid to said Merchants' National Bank the money then due and owing by the terms of said promissory note, principal and interest amounting to the sum of $550, and upon the payment of which sum said Merchants' National Bank then and there delivered to plaintiffs said promissory note and plaintiffs were, at the time of the commencement of this action, and are now, the owners and holders of the same."

Appellants attack this finding as unsupported by the evidence, and we think the criticism is merited.

[6] The evidence on this phase of the case was that on March 11, 1920 (the note became due April 18, 1918), respondent Williams paid the bank $50 in cash on account of the principal due on this note and gave his personal note to the bank for $450, the amount of the balance due on the original note; that at different times up to January 3, 1921, he paid various sums, amounting to $125, in addition to the first $50 payment; that on June 30, 1920, he gave a new note for $375, the decreased amount of the indebtedness, and a new note for the same amount on November 29, 1920; that on January 28, 1921, having reduced the amount to $325, he gave a new note for $1,075, covering this $325 and another obligation of $750, and uniting them; that he thereafter paid $50 on this latter note. The bank did not deliver the original note to respondent Williams on March 11, 1920, when he gave them his first note for the amount of the balance due on the original note. It retained the note and continued in possession of it at all times thereafter, only delivering it to respondent Williams on June 24, 1921, as the witness Harris, the bank's representative, testified, to be used as evidence on the trial of this action. At the same time Williams gave the bank what was termed a "trust receipt," stating that he had received the note from them in trust "for inspection or return," which receipt Harris identified on the trial as "a receipt for collateral." There was no evidence of any agreement at the time Williams gave his note of March 11, 1920, to the bank, or thereafter, that this note was given or received by the bank in payment of the original note. The bank's representative testified that the original note was taken off the bank records, in so far as its discount was concerned, on March 11, 1920 (the date of Williams' first note); that the bank records show that it was paid on that date and the bank then carried it as a straight loan to Williams.

There is no doubt that, as stated in McDonough v. Nowlin, 17 Cal. App. 45, 48, 118 Pac. 463, 465, relied on by respondents:

> "Where a surety or accommodation indorser has paid the note of his principal by executing his own note to the holder, and it is accepted in payment and extinguishment of the first note, he has an action to recover the amount of the first note, * * * though his own note was not paid at the time of the trial. Stanley v. McElrath, 86 Cal. 449 (25 Pac. 16, 10 L. R. A. 545)."

The difficulty here is that there was no agreement that Williams' note should be received in payment of the original note, and it is significant that the bank continued to hold the original note as collateral. The rule is that there must be an express understanding or agreement to that effect before a new note of the debtor, or of a third person operates to satisfy or extinguish the indebtedness evidenced by an earlier one. Welch v. Allington, 23 Cal. 322; Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 28, 33, 54 Pac. 273; Andrews v. First National Bank, 55 Cal. App. 138, 141, 203 Pac. 156; Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Wallace, 58 Cal. App. 625, 628, 209 Pac. 78; People's State Bank v. Penello, 59 Cal. App. 174, 183, 210 Pac. 432.

In view of our decision in this matter it will be unnecessary to consider other points raised by appellants on appeal.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

CURNS v. BRANNON. (Civ. 3941.)

1. Brokers ⟹86(1)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain judgment.

Document evidencing defendant's promise to pay plaintiff "the usual commission for your services" in securing purchaser for property, in absence of evidence as to usual commissions, held insufficient to sustain judgment for specific amount claimed.

2. Brokers ⟹82(4)—Averment as to price agreed to be paid for services rendered held sufficiently denied.

In action for broker's commission, where defendant alleged agreement to pay a stated sum, defendant's denial that he agreed to pay plaintiff that sum "or any other sum over and above the sum of $100" held a sufficient denial of plaintiff's averment to make proof of same necessary.

3. Appeal and error ⟹171(3)—Denial of allegations treated as sufficient at trial may not subsequently be regarded as admissions.

Denials which are imperfect or defective, if acted on as sufficient at trial, are not to be regarded as admissions of allegations attempted to be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by J. W. Curns against J. F. Brannon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $325 alleged to have been earned as commission for procuring a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy certain real property belonging to defendant, listed with plaintiff as broker, under a written contract dated September 9, 1921.

The complaint alleges that between the 1st day of September, 1921, and the 29th day of September, 1921, by a written agreement plaintiff was employed by defendant to procure a purchaser for said property, and that for such services defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $325. Defendant denied that he agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $325 "or any other sum over and above the sum of one hundred dollars ($100.00)."

The writing in controversy was introduced in evidence, and that portion having to do with the dispute herein is in the following language:

> "Los Angeles, Sept. 9, 1921.
> "J. W. Curns, I employ you to sell for 60 days or exchange the following property, for which I agree to pay you the usual commission for your services. 60 days. Exclusive."

Then follows certain data and a description of the property.

Evidence was introduced in behalf of the plaintiff tending to show that defendant signed this instrument, and that on September 21, 1921, plaintiff tendered to defendant a buyer ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the terms specified therein, but that the defendant refused to convey. The defendant offered no evidence in his own behalf.

The court found "from the evidence introduced" that all the allegations of the complaint herein are true, "and as a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts the court finds that plaintiff is entitled to judgment in the sum of $325."

[1, 2] Appellant first attacks the judgment upon the ground that there is no evidence to support the allegations of the complaint, and particularly the finding that the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $325. A careful inspection of the record fails to reveal any evidence, other than the document quoted in part, which even mentions the subject of compensation. No evidence was offered to show what amount would be "the usual commission" for respondent's services. It is contended by respondent that inasmuch as his complaint was verified, defendant did not sufficiently deny the allegation "that for such service as a real estate broker in procuring said purchaser for said described premises, the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff the sum of $325." It is then argued that no evidence was necessary to establish the fact that defendant agreed to pay $325 because it had been admitted by failure to deny it. We do not think the authorities cited by respondent support this contention, since they are distinguishable from the case here presented, and from similar cases heretofore decided.

[3] In Ronning v. Way, 18 Cal. App. 527, 123 Pac. 615, it was said that an allegation that certain property was worth $600 was not sufficiently traversed by the mere denial that the value was $600. Kinney v. Maryland Casualty Co., 15 Cal. App. 571, 115 Pac. 456, involved a like denial, and the same may be said of Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 623. These denials are each clearly in the form of a negative pregnant, and, consequently, insufficient. In the case at bar the answer denies that defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $325 "or any other sum over and above the sum of $100." To be complete, it should have been added by apt language that this denial referred to the asserted promise to pay for the services rendered as a real estate broker in the transaction sued upon. But no objection was made to this form of pleading, and the case was tried as though the issue were properly raised. It is well established that denials which are merely imperfect or defective, if acted upon as sufficient at the trial, are not to be regarded as admissions of the allegations attempted to be denied. Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 618, 39 Pac. 1064; McDonald v. Pacific Debenture Co., 146 Cal. 667, 80 Pac. 1090; Board of Commrs. v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 555, 557, 171 Pac. 294.

We do not consider the other points raised tenable, but because of the entire lack of evidence to support the allegation mentioned and the finding upon it, that the defendant agreed to pay $325 for plaintiff's services, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by William Lyon against the Carpenters' Hall Association of San Francisco and others. Judgment of dismissal entered on demurrers to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis and Vincent Surr, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to quiet title to his alleged interest in certain real estate located in San Francisco, Cal. The defendants interposed demurrers which the trial court sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment was entered dismissing the action. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals, bringing up the judgment roll.

[1] In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that prior to October 25, 1921, Carpenters' Hall Association was a corporation without capital stock, existing under the laws of the state of California; that Local Union 483, Carpenters of San Francisco, and Local Union 1082, Carpenters of San Francisco, were unincorporated associations, and on the 24th day of October, 1921, those two associations were expelled from the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America and were disbanded and ceased to exist; that Local Union 304, Carpenters of San Francisco and Local Union 616, Carpenters of San Francisco, were unincorporated associations, and prior to October 24, 1921, they disbanded and ceased to exist; that it is provided in the by-laws of said Carpenters' Hall Association of San Francisco that membership therein shall consist only of members in good standing of the unincorporated associations above mentioned, and that any one ceasing to be a member of any unincorporated association shall thereupon cease to be a member of said Carpenters' Hall Association of San Francisco; that prior to the 24th day of October, 1921, the plaintiff was a member of Local Union 483, Carpenters of San Francisco, and a member of Carpenters' Hall Association of San Francisco. It is also alleged:

> "That there are now no members of Carpenters' Hall Association, or any person, or persons, qualified to be members of said Carpenters' Hall Association of San Francisco, and the said corporation is dissolved and defunct."

In appropriate language it is alleged that at the time of the dissolution Carpenters' Hall Association owned real estate, describing it by metes and bounds; that it also owned other properties the exact nature of which are unknown to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff is a pro rata owner of such assets; and by proper averment it is alleged that the individuals named as defendants were at the time of the dissolution the duly elected and acting officers.

To the foregoing allegations the plaintiff annexed a prayer that the court determine the interest of the plaintiff, that the court appoint a receiver to take possession and sell the property of the corporation, and distribute the proceeds among the persons entitled thereto, and that the defendants be restrained in the meantime from alienating the assets.

If Carpenters' Hall Association (a corporation) had suffered no forfeiture, or if it had not been dissolved, the courts would have no right through a receiver to take possession of the corporation's property, to sell the property, or to distribute the proceeds among the persons entitled thereto, because the law has placed all of those powers in the hands of the directors of the corporation. Civ. Code, § 305.

[2] No statute is cited, and we know of no statute, which declares that the foregoing set of facts constitutes a forfeiture. Of course, if there were a statute to that effect the statute would be recognized and administered by the court according to its terms. Los Angeles Ry. v. Los Angeles, 152 Cal. 242, 92 Pac. 490, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1269, 125 Am. St. Rep. 54; Kaiser Land & Fruit Co. v. Curry, 155 Cal. 638, 103 Pac. 341. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, it is the settled law of California that the state only is entitled to maintain an action to have it adjudged that a forfeiture has occurred and to enforce such forfeiture. In People v. Los Angeles Elec. Ry. Co., 91 Cal. 338, 340, 27 Pac. 673, 674, the court says:

> "Acts sufficient to cause a forfeiture do not per se produce a forfeiture. The corporation continues to exist until the sovereignty which created it shall, by proper proceedings in a proper court, procure an adjudication of forfeiture, and enforce it."

And see 26 C. J. 1045, §§ 117 and 119. Indeed, the rule is statutory. Code Civ. Proc. § 803.

[3, 4] In his pleadings the plaintiff has alleged that Carpenters' Hall Association is dissolved. As to the cause of action which he would have the court entertain, that allegation is the gravamen of the case. Being of such importance the pleader should have alleged the facts and not his conclusion, and it is but his conclusion under such circumstances. Winslow v. Glendale Light & Power Co., 164 Cal. 688, 689, 130 Pac. 427. Furthermore, the presence of the conclusion of the pleader in the pleading does not strengthen the pleading when attacked by a demurrer. People v. Roach, 76 Cal. 294, 296, 18 Pac. 407.

In what we have said we do not want to be understood as holding that the facts pleaded constitute a forfeiture or that such facts, if presented to the proper court, by the proper parties, in the proper action, should, or should not, be adjudged sufficient to constitute a forfeiture. We desire to be understood as merely ruling the questions presented by the record before us.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law 🔑1032(5)—Robbery 🔑17(5)—Information not defective in not alleging persons in possession to be agents of owner; objection first made on appeal not available.

Robbery information was not defective in not alleging that persons from whom property was taken were agents of owner at least as against objection made first on appeal.

2. Robbery 🔑4—Janitors of theater considered in possession of money therein, so that taking robbery and not larceny.

Money in a theater at night must be considered in possession of janitors and watchmen, so that its taking by force against them constituted robbery and not larceny.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Robert G. Dean from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of robbery.

Briefly, the facts are as follows: Robert G. Dean and Joseph A. Neff were living together in Oakland prior to February 5, 1923, the date of the crime for which defendant was convicted. During the early part of January, 1923, Dean spoke to Neff about the commission of some crime, without discussing any details. The substance of this conversation, as testified to by Neff, was as follows:

> "He said that he had met a friend of his that knew of a job, as he called it, to be pulled, but that they would not be able to do it because they had to have another party and wanted to know if I would consider taking part in it, and I admitted I did, and it was dropped then for the period of about another week, when it was brought up in about the same way."

About a week later Dean again asked Neff if he was willing to go in on the "job." Neff signified his willingness and Dean said the other man wanted to meet Neff. Later Dean introduced Neff to this other man, whose name was given as James Carroll. At a subsequent meeting of these three Carroll discussed in detail the plans for robbing the State Theater in Oakland. It was proposed that they rob the theater early the next morning. Dean and Neff, according to arrangement went up to Carroll's room at about 6:15 the next morning, and from Carroll's room they walked up Broadway and passed the State Theater. They saw the janitor cleaning out the entrance and waited nearby until he had finished and gone inside. Dean and Neff then entered the theater. They found Albert Lohman, who acted as janitor and watchman, operating a vacuum cleaner back of the last row of seats. Dean pointed a revolver at Lohman and ordered him to throw up his hands. Dean and Neff had covered their faces with handkerchiefs upon entering the theater and they afterwards removed these coverings and placed them over the faces of the janitors whom they had bound to chairs. Dean and Neff took Lohman up to the mezzanine floor of the theater, where they blindfolded him and tied his hands behind his back with wire. About the time they reached the mezzanine floor, Louis Micotti, the day janitor and watchman, came down from the balcony where he had been working, and was ordered to throw up his hands. His hands were tied with wire and the keys to the office were taken from him. Lohman and Micotti were then taken into the ladies' dressing room, where they were seated in chairs and bound to the chairs with wire. Neff went down to the first floor to represent himself as the janitor to any person who might come to the theater, and Dean and Carroll went into the office of the theater, which was located on the mezzanine floor about 25 feet away from the ladies' dressing room, where the two watchmen were confined. Later Neff was called to the office and saw that the lock on the door of the large outer safe had been pried open and the strong box was in sight. At the request of Carroll, Neff pulled the strong box out of the safe and laid it on the floor. Neff then went downstairs and while there heard an explosion. Later he went back to the office and saw that the door of the strong box had been blown loose, but was not completely off. They tried to pry it off with a bar and failing to do so Carroll said he would give it another "shot" of nitroglycerine. Neff then went downstairs and while he was there E. H. Fitzgerald, a plumber, came to do some work at the theater. Neff told him to go upstairs and when he got to the head of the stairs Dean met him with a revolver and ordered him to throw up his hands. At the trial Fitzgerald positively identified Dean. Fitzgerald's hands were tied behind him and he was left sitting on the floor of the ladies' dressing room with Lohman and Micotti. After this Neff again went downstairs and while there heard a second explosion. Later he returned to the office and found the door of the box completely blown off. There were still several rolls of silver in the safe and on the desk was a leather handbag packed with money. Neff carried the bag to San Francisco, where he and Dean went to a hotel and registered and divided the money. Carroll's share was wrapped up and left for him and Neff took his share and went to another hotel, where he was arrested later.

Appellant's first attack is upon the information, which read, in part, as follows:

> "The said Joseph A. Neff and Robert G. Dean, hereinafter called the defendants, prior to the time of filing this information, and on or about the 5th day of February, 1923, in the said county of Alameda, state of California, did, unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and by means of force and fear and against the will of Albert Lohman and Louis Micotti, take, steal and carry away from the personal and immediate presence of said Albert Lohman and Louis Micotti, the following described personal property, to-wit, two thousand forty-two dollars and twenty-five cents ($2,042.25) in lawful money of the United States and two keys, which said personal property was then and there in the possession of said Albert Lohman and Louis Micotti, and the personal property of the Oakland-San Francisco Theater Company, a corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and which said personal property was then and there of the value of $2,042.25 in gold coin of the United States of America."

[1] It is contended that the information is defective in not alleging that Lohman and Micotti, alleged to have had the possession of the personal property, were the agents of the Oakland-San Francisco Theater Company, alleged to have been the owner of the same. We see no merit in the objection, and, furthermore, no demurrer was interposed to the information or other objection made to the same in the trial court, and this objection is not such an one as is available upon appeal for the first time. People v. Matuszewski, 138 Cal. 533, 71 Pac. 701; People v. Bryon, 103 Cal. 675, 37 Pac. 754; People v. Pauli (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 88.

[2] It is contended that the court should have instructed the jury that if it was not satisfied that the crime of robbery had been committed, but, was satisfied that grand larceny had been committed, it was their duty to find the defendant guilty of the latter offense. This contention is based upon the appellant's position that the evidence showed the offense to have been grand larceny rather than robbery, because of an alleged absence of proof that Lohman and Micotti were in possession of the money taken by defendant and his confederates. But the record contains testimony that Lohman and Micotti were janitors and watchmen; that, in addition to their duties as janitors, they were charged with the custody, protection and safeguarding of the State Theater, which was conducted by the Oakland-San Francisco Theater Company, and of everything contained in and about the premises of said theater. Lohman testified that he was "night janitor and watchman"; that he had access to all the rooms of the theater and had keys to all of them, including the office from which the money was taken. He also testified that he was instructed by the manager, Mr. Holtz, to watch the building and to let nobody in after the show was over, and that at the time he was engaged to work at the theater, his employer, Mr. Frantzen, instructed him that he was to act as watchman in addition to doing janitor work. Micotti testified that he was the day janitor and watchman; that he had been working as such at the State Theater for about two years; that when he first began this work he was told by his employer, Mr. Frantzen, foreman of the American Building Maintenance Company, and by the manager and assistant manager of the theater, that he was to act as watchman in addition to doing janitor work. While these men did not own the money, nor even knew the amount in the safe, yet they were rightfully in possession of the theater and its contents at the time of the robbery and were entitled to this possession as against the defendant.

In O'Donnell v. People, 224 Ill. 218, 79 N. E. 639, 8 Ann. Cas. 123, the charge was assault with intent to rob. Dorgan, the person assaulted, was a watchman in charge of a railroad station. The statute in that state defined robbery as "the felonious and violent taking of money, goods or other valuable thing from the person of another by force or intimidation." It was contended that Dorgan did not have such possession of the property in the station as to come within the above definition of the crime of robbery, and that since there could not have been a completed crime of robbery, there was no crime of assault with intent to rob. It was held that Dorgan had sufficient possession as against the defendant of all the station contained to bring the offense within the definition of attempted robbery.

In the case of Brooks v. People, 49 N. Y. 436, 10 Am. Rep. 398, the house was left in charge of a girl 11 years of age. Defendant entered the house, held a pistol to the girl's head, and took her father's property from a trunk. It was held that the child had such possession of the property as to satisfy the requirements of the definition of the crime of robbery.

In the case of Reese v. State, 91 Tex. Cr. R. 457, 239 S. W. 619, it was held that a railroad employee who worked as a telegraph operator and ticket agent at a railroad station during the night, had "possession" of the contents of the safe in the office which was locked, and to which he did not have the combination, within the meaning of the word "possession" as defined in the crime of robbery.

[3] Complaint is made of the refusal to give certain instructions at the request of the defendant, but we find no merit in any of these specifications of error. Most of the instructions refused were substantially given in other instructions given by the court, and the charge to the jury, as a whole, appears from the record to be full and fair to the defendant in every respect.

There is also no merit in the contention that the witness Neff was forced, against his will, to give testimony which incriminated him. This witness was told by the court at the request of counsel for defendant Dean that he might refuse, if he wished, to answer any question, the answer to which would tend to incriminate himself. The witness for a time took advantage of this privilege and was excused from the witness stand.

Later in the trial he returned to the stand and waived his privilege, voluntarily answering the questions asked him.

[4] It is contended that evidence of the movements and activities of Dean, Neff, and Carroll after they left the theater was improperly admitted. This evidence consisted of the testimony of Neff, one of the conspirators. It is maintained by appellant that although the testimony of one conspirator is admissible against other conspirators with regard to matters and things done in furtherance of the conspiracy, nevertheless, the conspiracy in this case was ended when the robbery was completed and any further inquiry into the activities of the conspirators was erroneous. It would seem to us that the conspiracy was not ended until the spoils had been divided, and, if this be the rule, the testimony was properly admitted. But, however that may be, the outstanding fact upon this appeal is that the judgment in this case has done substantial justice. The record leaves no reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, quite apart from any testimony to which any objection is made. He was positively identified as one of the men who committed the robbery by one of the watchmen and by the plumber, Fitzgerald, both of whom were in the theater at the time of the robbery and saw the defendant's participation in it; and it is certain that the testimony of these witnesses, together with the portion of Neff's testimony which was admissible beyond all question and the many other facts and circumstances appearing in the record uncontradicted, overwhelmingly convict the defendant, and the jury could have brought in no other verdict than it did. In this state of the record it is idle to consider in detail the numerous contentions of defendant with regard to the admission of evidence. If any errors occurred in these rulings, we should be bound to affirm this judgment, nevertheless, after a perusal of the entire record.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GONZALES. (Cr. 1070.)

1. Criminal law ⟾1186(4)—Error in admission of irrelevant testimony held not ground for reversal in view of evidence of guilt.

In view of convincing evidence that defendant stole automobile, error in arresting officer's demonstration, as witness, of use of black silk sock, taken from defendant's person, as mask, it not being contended that defendant made any attempt to conceal features or to elude officer, held, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, not to necessitate reversal.

2. Criminal law ⟾1170(2)—Exclusion of written evidence of certain fact held harmless, in view of undisputed oral testimony to same fact.

Where defendant was charged with stealing an automobile, any error in refusing to admit in evidence conditional contract of sale for purchase of automobile of same make but different machine from that which defendant was charged with stealing was immaterial, in view of undisputed oral testimony that defendant was owner of machine described in contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Joe Gonzales was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Buel R. Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was found guilty of grand larceny in the theft of a Chevrolet automobile of the value of $500, and appeals from the judgment.

be used, shed no light upon the question as to whether the defendant was guilty or not of the theft of the automobile. It was therefore irrelevant as to any of the issues involved in the case, and it was error to admit the same at the trial of the defendant. This testimony would naturally damage the defendant in the estimation of the jury. They would likely conclude that a person in the possession of such an article might in all probability be engaged in the commission of the crimes for which it could be used, and therefore they would more readily find him guilty of the crime charged.

It has been held that evidence tending to show the possession by the defendant, at the time of his arrest, of various poisons, none of which had any connection with the crime with which the defendant was charged, was inadmissible. The same ruling was had regarding evidence of the possession by the defendant of obscene letters and writings. Such evidence was held to be "very prejudicial to defendant, as it tended to show her to be a most depraved and vicious woman." People v. Martin, 13 Cal. App. 96–106, 108 Pac. 1034, 1038. "However depraved or vicious she might be, she was entitled to be tried only for the crime charged against her; and upon the issue presented by her plea of not guilty only such testimony as was relevant to such issue should have been admitted. * * * The defendant had the right to have all such irrelevant matter excluded from the jury. When, as in this case, irrelevant testimony has been admitted, and is of such a character as necessarily to be prejdicial to defendant, a new trial must be granted." People v. Martin, supra, and authorities there cited.

The rule laid down in the foregoing authorities is well established and must be followed in this case, unless the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution necessitates a different action on the part of this court. This section provides, among other things, that no judgment shall be set aside in any case on the ground of the improper admission of evidence, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The evidence in this case against the defendant was that the owner of the automobile, which the defendant was charged with stealing, parked his car at 715 West Sixth street, in the city of Los Angeles, between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock on the morning of the 17th of May, 1923. At 15 minutes before 2 o'clock of the same morning, the defendant was found driving the car at the corner of Grand avenue and Eighth streets, less than three blocks from where the car was left by its owner. Defendant's only explanation of his possession of the car was that a man by the name of Ryan, whom he had met for the first time on the evening of May 15, 1923, had left the car with him while he (Ryan) went in search of some girls whom they were to take riding in the car. He had never seen Ryan since the night of his own arrest, and although the defendant had been out on bail from the time of his arrest to the day of his trial, he had made no inquiry at the place where the defendant testified Ryan had told him he worked, nor had the defendant made any attempt to find Ryan and have him as a witness at the trial. In other respects the story as told by the defendant at his trial was equally improbable and unreasonable. We hardly think any jury composed of intelligent and reasonable men would place any faith in the account given by defendant as to how he came into possession of the car. Furthermore, after the arrest of the defendant, he gave most conflicting accounts as to the possession of the car by his new-made friend Ryan. He first told the arresting officer that at about half past 8 on the evening immediately preceding the morning of his arrest, he met Ryan in front of a café in the city of Los Angeles, and from there Ryan drove him in this same car over the Brooklyn Heights, and then back to Los Angeles. When, afterwards, he was informed that the owner of the car reported that it had not been stolen until after 12 o'clock of the same night, he changed his story and said that he saw Ryan when he stole the car, and that he (the defendant) was only a few feet away from Ryan at the time Ryan took the car; but he disclaimed that he had any part in the theft. With evidence of this character before them, even should we eliminate all testimony of the officer as to the criminal purposes to which the silk sock could be put, we cannot see how the jury could have rendered any other verdict than that of guilty. We are therefore unable to hold that the defendant was prejudiced by the admission of the testimony complained of, or that any miscarriage of justice has resulted therefrom.

[2] Defendant makes the further contention that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence a conditional contract of sale between the Southwest Motor Company and the defendant, for the purchase of a Chevrolet automobile, but a different machine from that which the defendant is charged with stealing. The defendant had previously testified that he was the owner of such an automobile, and upon cross-examination he further stated that this Chevrolet machine belonged to him and not to his mother. The defendant's mother also testified that the machine in question belonged to the defendant and not to her. The prosecution offered no evidence to contradict this testimony. If there was any errer on the part of the court in refusing to admit in evidence the conditional contract of sale, such error was of slight consequence in view of the undisputed oral testimony of the defendant and his mother, admitted without objection, that the defendant was the owner of the machine described in the conditional contract of sale.

Judgment affirmed.

GRAND UNION HOTEL et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 4851.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑419—Commission may enter supplemental award covering surgical treatment after prior award.

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 20(d), the Commission has continuing jurisdiction to make a supplemental award to cover surgical treatment undergone by an injured employee after a prior award.

2. Master and servant 🔑419—Commission authorized to make supplemental award covering surgical treatment subsequent to submission.

Where injured employee, after submission of claim for medical and hospital treatment, but before decision thereon, received additional surgical treatment, and the award included no amount for such surgical treatment, the Commission had jurisdiction under section 20 (d) of Compensation Act to make supplemental award covering such item.

3. Judgment 🔑18(1)—Matters occurring pendente lite not adjudicated unless brought before court by supplemental pleading.

Issues in a case refer to its beginning, and matters occurring pendente lite cannot be put in evidence and are not adjudicated by the judgment unless brought before the court by supplemental pleading.

4. Master and servant 🔑416—Supplemental award may not be used to correct errors.

A supplemental award by the Industrial Accident Commission may not be used to correct errors in earlier award.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act by Gustaf Lindemann against the Grand Union Hotel and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company. To review supplemental award by Industrial Commission, defendants bring certiorari. Writ discharged and award affirmed.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ to review a supplemental order of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission awarding to respondent Gustaf Lindemann $227.62 to cover hospital and medical expenses incurred by him as a result of an injury which he received in the course of his employment by the petitioner, Grand Union Hotel Company. The petitioner, New Amsterdam Casualty Company, is the insurance carrier.

The respondent Lindemann was injured upon November 10, 1922. The employer disclaimed liability under the facts of the case and refused medical and surgical treatment to Lindemann. He was forced to go to a hospital, therefore, upon his own account, and under the care of his own physician. On November 24, 1922, he filed his application with respondent Commission for adjustment of his claim under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Hearing was had upon December 19, 1922, at which time the following stipulation was entered into:

> "That the employer neglected and refused seasonably to provide surgical and hospital treatment necessary to cure and relieve the employee. That, in the event the insurance carrier is found chargeable for the medical expenses incurred by or on behalf of the employee, the reasonable cost of the medical services may be determined by the filing of itemized bills for such services and the submission of the same to the Medical Department of this Commission."

A further hearing was had January 17, 1923, at which time the case was submitted for decision. On March 7, 1923, certain bills for medical services were filed in evidence, pursuant to the foregoing stipulation, to fix the amount of medical expenses incurred prior to March 6, 1923. Up to that time no surgical operation had been performed. On May 12, 1923, the Commission entered its decision in applicant's favor, allowing him compensation benefits for his injury and awarding him the amount of the medical expenses shown by the bills filed with the Commission.

Up to this point the record does not disclose that any evidence was before the Commission of a surgical operation upon Lindemann. Some days after the award, however, Lindemann's attorney sent a letter to the Commission stating that Lindemann had submitted to such an operation upon March 27, 1923, and inclosing hospital and physician's bills covering the same, with a request that an allowance be made to Lindemann therefor. Thereupon the matter was set for further hearing, testimony was taken, and the matter was submitted for decision upon the allowance of such supplemental medical expense. On August 30, 1923, the Commission denied Lindemann an allowance for such supplemental expenses, basing its holding upon the case of Georgia Casualty Co. v.

Ind. Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 289, 170 Pac. 625. A petition for rehearing was granted upon the request of Lindemann, and the Commission allowed such supplemental expenses to Lindemann, which allowance is contained in the order sought to be reviewed here.

The only question presented by the petitioners is whether or not the above-mentioned order is within the grant of continuing jurisdiction conferred upon said Commission by section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act.

In making its supplemental order the Commission relied upon the case of McBride v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 182 Cal. 407, 187 Pac. 1050. The petitioner herein, however, differentiates that case from the present one by pointing out that in the McBride Case the Commission had expressly reserved its award for medical and surgical treatment to which it found the claimant entitled pending the procuring of the necessary information and vouchers for a supplemental award. That case is not precisely in point here, nor is the case of National Engineering Corporation et al. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (L. A. No. 7865, decided by our Supreme Court in bank on April 1, 1924), 225 Pac. 2, which is also relied upon by the Commission.

[1] However, it is settled that, where an employee is awarded benefits under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, and later requires surgical treatment for the relief of his injury, the Commission possesses continuing jurisdiction under section 20 (d) of said act to enter its supplemental award or order, allowing him such treatment as he may need, and also such further disability compensation as he may be entitled to by reason of the change in his condition, the recurrence of disability following his entry into the hospital. Section 20 (d), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act; Georgia Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 289, 170 Pac. 625; Union Iron Works v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 410; Western Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 611; Miller Creamery et al. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. App.) 226 Pac. 402. We think Lindemann's entry into the hospital for the purpose of submitting himself to a surgical operation constituted a change in circumstances or a new development in his situation contemplated by section 20 (d) of said act.

[2, 3] It is true that in the present case the change in circumstances occurred after the submission of the case to the Industrial Accident Commission for decision, but before said decision was actually reached, and at the time of the decision the Commission was unaware of the fact that a surgical operation had been performed, and no evidence regarding the same had been offered to said Commission, and could not have been offered because the hearing was concluded before the operation occurred. This brings us to the precise point specially involved in the instant case, which is whether the date of the actual decision or the date of the submission of the cause should be taken as the date foreclosing the applicant. The language in the case of Georgia Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, relied upon by petitioners herein, is not controlling here because this question was not involved in that case, and it is apparent that it was not given any consideration therein. It seems obvious that the findings of the Commission can settle questions, logically, only as of the date of the submission of the same. Any other rule would be grossly unjust, demanding proof of conditions in advance of their existence. An applicant cannot offer evidence of matters and things which affect his employer's liability if they occur after he has completed his proof. If, perchance, a case should not be decided by the Industrial Accident Commission for weeks after the evidence was offered and the case submitted for determination, this fact should not work to the disadvantage of an applicant by denying him the right to prove changes in his physical condition occurring between the time of the submission of his cause and the decision of the Industrial Accident Commission. By analogy, we find support for our view in the settled rule in this state that the issues in a case refer to the beginning of an action, and that matters occurring pendente lite cannot be put in evidence and are not adjudicated by the judgment unless brought before the court by a supplemental pleading. 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 329; People's Savings Bank v. Hodgdon, 64 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 938; Metropolis Trust & Savings Bank v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 132 Pac. 833.

[4] It is true, of course, that supplemental awards may not be used for the purpose of correcting errors in the original award (Georgia Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; McBride v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra), and if the expenses in dispute here had been incurred prior to the submission of the case to the Industrial Accident Commission, but, nevertheless, through error said Commission had failed to make an allowance therefor or if applicant had neglected to prove such expenses before the Commission, although they had occurred prior to the date of the hearing, no supplemental award could have accomplished the purpose of correcting the error. But in the present case, the decision having reference only to the facts as they existed at the date of the submission of the case to the Industrial Accident Commission, the expenses incurred later and the conditions which occurred later making such expenses necessary constituted such a change in the situation of the injured man as to empower the Commission to do justice by him under the provisions of section 20 (d) of the act. Any other construction of the act would be contrary to its spirit, and would result in hardship and injustice to an applicant without fault on his part.

The writ is discharged, and the award affirmed.

ADERHOLT v. WOOD. (Civ. 4823.)

1. Contracts 🔑252—Parties by consent canceling executory contract not governed by statutory rule as to restoration by party rescinding.

Parties by consent canceling executory contract thereby make new contract, their rights and obligations under which are to be determined by rules relating to ordinary contracts; and Civ. Code, §§ 1691, 3408, as to restoration by a party rescinding, or in whose favor rescission is adjudged, have no application to such mutual cancellation.

2. Evidence 🔑417(9)—Intention of parties as to restoration of payments determinable by conversations and communications, where cancellation agreement is silent.

If agreement whereby parties to executory contract cancel it is silent as to restoration of payments made under the contract, intention of parties may be determined by reference to their conversations and communications leading up to execution of cancellation agreement.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑334(3)—Under cancellation by agreement of executory contract, held, that no restoration of payments intended.

Agreement of parties canceling executory contract because purchaser could not proceed with payments, being delivered at same time as quitclaim of the property from purchaser to vendor, and being silent on the subject of restoration of payments as well as to profits received by purchaser during his three years' sole possession and occupation, and the property having greatly depreciated in value, held, that it was not intended payments made should be restored.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. Aderholt against Joseph H. Wood. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ben S. Hunter, of Los Angeles, and Bradford M. Melvin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Powell & Dow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $4,857.50, with interest, this being the amount which his assignor had paid on principal and interest upon a written contract with the defendant for the sale of 40 acres of land situated in Los Angeles county. The contract price for the sale of the land was fixed at $12,000, $3,000 of which was paid upon the execution of the contract and the remainder thereof, with interest, was payable at specified dates. Plaintiff's assignor, the vendee under the contract, was unable to make his payments, and from time to time requested and received further extensions, and on numerous occasions urged the defendant to release him from the terms of the contract. On February 10, 1922, he addressed a letter to the defendant in which he stated definitely that he was unable to proceed further with the purchase and that he was directing his attorney to prepare a release and return of the ranch to defendant on the condition that he (the defendant) would cancel the agreement and release him from any further liability. This offer was accepted by the defendant, and a few days thereafter he received from the vendee's attorney a document signed by the vendee designated "Cancellation of Agreement" and providing that the contract of sale "has been this day canceled by mutual consent." With this document he also received a quitclaim deed from the vendee remising, releasing, and quitclaiming to the defendant all interest in the parcel of land covered by the contract of sale. The document designated "Cancellation of Agreement" was dated February 16, 1922, was acknowledged by the vendee before a notary public in the county of Storey, state of Nevada, on the same date, and was acknowledged by the vendor on the 27th day of March, 1922, in Hennepin county, Minn. The quitclaim deed was dated February 20, 1922, and was acknowledged by the vendee Dakin on the 25th day of February, 1922, in the county of Storey, Nev., and by Margaret Dakin on the 2d day of March, 1922, in San Mateo county, state of California. The date of the delivery and exchange of these papers does not appear in the record, but it does appear that "both documents were received at the same time." After the exchange of these papers, the vendee made an assignment of all claims and demands against the defendant to the plaintiff herein, who commenced this action on June 7, 1922. Defendant's answer admits the execution of the original contract and the payment of the money thereunder, but alleges that by the terms of the agreement dated February 16, 1922, taken with the quitclaim deed, the parties intended to and did effect a mutual cancellation and release of all obligations between them. The trial court found in accordance with the admissions of the pleadings on the material facts relating to the execution and cancellation of the agreement of sale. It also found that on the 1st day of April, 1922, the buyer executed and delivered the quitclaim deed to the defendant. In this respect the finding is unsupported by the evidence, as has been heretofore pointed out. The date of April 1, 1922, is the date of the recordation of the quitclaim deed in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. It appears without contradiction that it was delivered to the defendant herein in Minneapolis some time during the month of March of that year at the same time when the cancellation contract was delivered to him.

Another finding which requires attention is that though the plaintiff's assignor on the 10th of February, 1922, wrote thee defendant a letter offering to make a complete release of the obligations of the original contract, the defendant did not accept said offer. The only evidence on this point is that the defendant answered this offer by telegram and, quoting from defendant's testimony, "I accepted the proposition that he made." This finding becomes important in connection with that portion of the defense raised by the defendant that the parties intended to make a complete release of all obligations one from the other growing out of the original contract of sale. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the return of the full sum of principal and interest, and the defendant appeals on a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] As stated by respondent, the question at issue before us is, where, in the case of an executory contract for the sale of real property on which installment payments have been made, the parties mutually agree to a cancellation of the contract, is the vendee, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, entitled to the return of the installments theretofore paid? It is argued in support of the judgment that the accepted rule in this state is that when the parties to an executory contract of this kind have abandoned it or it has been rescinded by mutual consent, either party may recover money paid under it. The authorities cited by respondent, however, all relate to the rescission of contracts in cases in which the vendor was at fault. In such a case the rule is without conflict that equity will restore the parties to statu quo. This principle is announced in section 3408 of the Civil Code and has been approved in numerous cases. The theory of these cases is that, where one party rescinds an executory contract on account of the default of the other, he is entitled to recover his outlay under the contract; but at the same time he must restore to the other party whatever of value he has obtained under it. Section 1691 of the Civil Code expressly provides that rescission can be accomplished only in such manner except where effected by consent. This exception is the important part in the consideration of cases such as presented in this record. If the parties by consent rescind an executory contract, they thereby make a new contract, and their rights and obligations thereunder are to be determined by all the rules relating to ordinary contracts. It is not improper and it is not unusual for parties to contracts of this nature to cancel them and to release each other from all mutual obligations. Where the statutes do not provide that in such cases the vendee shall recover the payments made under the contract and where the contract of cancellation is silent on the matter, the intentions of the parties may be determined by reference to the conversations and communications had between them leading up to the execution of the contract of cancellation. In the case before us all evidence of such communications tended unmistakably to show that the parties intended a complete release of all mutual obligations, and the simultaneous delivery of the quitclaim deed is persuasive evidence of such intention. The failure of the trial court to find in accordance with the evidence on this issue was highly prejudicial to the case presented by the appellant. If the trial court had found in accordance with this evidence, it would have necessarily followed that the intention of the parties in the execution of the cancellation agreement was to release each other from these obligations and that it was not the intention that the vendee should thereafter be entitled to recover the payments which he had paid in on the contract. This is especially true in view of the fact that the vendee had sole possession and occupation of the premises for a period of over three years, during which he had taken and retained all the profits therefrom. It is not reasonable to assume that, in view of the admitted fact that the property had greatly depreciated in value, the appellant would have knowingly consented to release the vendee from further payments under the contract and at the same time allow the vendee to attain the profits from the premises which he had received during the period when he was in possession without the payment of any rent.

Respondent's case is based upon a rule of law which he draws from a number of California cases cited to the effect that upon a rescission of an executory contract of sale of real property "the vendor is entitled to a return of the property, freed from the obligations of the contract of sale, and the vendee is entitled to a return of the moneys paid by him on the purchase price of the property so returned." But this statement of the rule is incomplete. The vendee is entitled to a return of the moneys paid by him less the benefits he received under the contract. When, therefore, the parties contract in writing to cancel the original agreement without mention of these respective rights, the rule as stated by respondent is not determinative; but the contract must be given a reasonable interpretation with the view of determining the intention of the parties.

The case is similar to the case of Winton v. Spring, 18 Cal. 451; the only difference in the facts being that in the cancellation agreement the vendee expressly surrendered possession of the premises, whereas in the case before us this was done by the simultaneous delivery of a quitclaim deed. The Supreme Court in construing the cancellation agreement in the Winton Case said (page 454):

> "The plaintiff contends, that this agreement being canceled as above shown, the effect was, as in the ordinary case of a rescission of a contract, to put the parties in statu quo, and having paid the $4,000 in the execution of the agreement, he is entitled to recover it back. We think not. The agreement of cancellation evidently was intended to effect a complete settlement in regard to the subject; it discharges the parties from all covenants and agreements in the original contract, and provides for a surrender of the premises. Nothing is said or done in reference to the refunding of the $4,000. If the intention was to place the parties in statu quo, and this were supposed to be effected by the use of the word 'cancel,' as an equivalent to the word 'rescind,' it is probable that language more unequivocal would have been employed. The latter clause of the agreement in respect to the possession would be tautological in this view; for the restoration of possession would follow from the use of the word cancel in the first line. Besides, it is to be supposed that the party in possession, having paid his money, would not abandon the possession, until he got a return of it, or some provision was made for securing it. He would scarcely have left so large an amount a matter of open account. Nor is it probable that the question as to the rents and profits of the land would be left unliquidated. It is much more probable that when parties come to an arrangement of a business matter, they settle all the terms of the contract, than that they leave them unadjusted. The word 'cancel,' applied to the agreement, under the circumstances, means no more than 'doing away with' an existing agreement upon the terms and with the consequences mentioned in the writing. What is not said, is excluded; and whatever was meant to be obligatory was expressed."

The Winton Case has not been overruled or criticized by any later decision of the Supreme Court, and, inasmuch as the opinion was based upon practically the same facts as we have before us, it seems to be decisive of the question presented.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. WRIGHT et al. (Cr. 752.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 29, 1924.)

1. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Conflict in evidence held for jury.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, conflict in evidence as to purposes and practices of I. W. W. held to raise question for jury.

2. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Objection to testimony of acts of I. W. W. as too remote held to be on its weight rather than competency.

Though after enactment of criminal syndicalism law, I. W. W. proclaimed itself against commission of crime or acts of sabotage or other violence, where there was evidence that this was a subterfuge, and that it had not changed its tactics, acts of violence in years 1917, 1918, 1919, were not objectionable as too remote, objection going to weight of testimony rather than competency.

3. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Error in admitting I. W. W. literature without prejudice in view of case made.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, any errors in admitting evidence of I. W. W. literature held without prejudice in view of strong case made against accused.

4. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Teaching or advocating sufficient to constitute offense.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, acts of violence and actual commission of crime are merely evidentiary; the teaching or advocating of the prohibited matters being sufficient to constitute the offense.

5. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by court's charge, was not error.

Refusal of instructions which were covered by court's charge was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

W. H. Wright and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and all defendants except D. Williams appeal. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants above named were jointly charged, by information filed in the superior court of Plumas county, with the crime of "criminal syndicalism," as that crime is defined by an act of the Legislature of 1919 entitled "An act defining criminal syndicalism and sabotage, prescribing certain acts and methods in connection therewith, and in pursuance thereof and providing penalties and punishments therefor." Stats. 1919, p. 281. The defendants were jointly tried for the offense so charged, and all, with the exception of the defendant Williams, who was acquitted, were found guilty by the jury. A separate verdict was found and returned as to each of the defendants. A motion for a new trial was made in behalf of each of the convicted defendants and denied, and each appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

Subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act constitutes the basis of the charge alleged in the information. That section provides:

> "Any person who: * * * Organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism," is guilty of a felony, etc.

Section 1 of said act thus defines "criminal syndicalism" as said phrase is used therein:

> "Any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."

[1] The points made by the appellants on this appeal are numerous, the general import thereof being that the evidence does not support the verdicts, that irrelevant and incompetent testimony was allowed to go before the jury, and that error was committed by the giving of certain instructions and the refusal to give others, the latter having been proposed by the appellants.

The defendants, with the exception of Wright and Bamman, were arrested by the sheriff of Plumas county in a raid on a house in Portola, said county, on the 14th day of July, 1923. Suspended from the front of the house was a sign about three feet long and eight inches wide, containing the words "I. W. W. Office." On the windows were smaller signs containing the same words. Each of the defendants found in the house at the time of the raid was made was searched by the sheriff and found to have in his possession a membership card of the I. W. W. The defendant Bamman was out on the street at the time the raid was made, but practically surrendered himself to that officer by stepping up to him and delivering to him his membership card. Wright was arrested in Quincy, the county seat, and upon his person was also found a membership card. These cards were introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing that the defendants were members of the I. W. W. organization. There is not and could not be any question raised here as to the fact that the defendants were members of the organization, because they admitted at the trial that they were such members. The sheriff found and took possession of a large quantity of I. W. W. literature, and this was introduced in evidence.

There is no necessity for detailing or reciting in substance herein the testimony introduced by the people to support the charge against the accused. Elbert Coutts and W. E. Townsend, former members of the I. W. W., and whose testimony has been received in every criminal syndicalism case which this court has been called upon to review in the past three or four years, testified in the instant case, going over practically the same ground that they had at previous trials. Joe Arada, another witness whose testimony has appeared in previous cases, and to which reference has been made in the opinions filed in this court in said cases, was also a witness in the present case, and gave the same testimony that he had theretofore. G. J. Davis, deputy sheriff of Stanislaus county, in the years 1917 and 1918, who has also testified in one or two previous cases reviewed by this court, testified to the incendiary fires which occurred in that county and in the city of Modesto in the year 1917, and which were supposed to have been caused by certain members of the I. W. W. The attorney for the defendants in the present case made no objection at any time at the trial to the testimony of Townsend, Coutts, Arada, and Davis. Coutts told the story of his connection with the I. W. W. from 1912 until and including a portion of the year 1918, he having joined the organization when he was but 16 years of age. He repeated the story of the making, by himself and other members of the I. W. W., of different chemical combinations and explosives on a houseboat on Smith's slough, about three miles south of the city of Stockton, in the year 1917, and reiterated that such chemicals and explosives were made for the purpose of carrying on the destructive policy of the I. W. W. in its efforts to establish an industrial government in this country in place of our present system. He also told the story of his connection with other members of the I. W. W. in the setting of fires and thereby the destruction of a number of haystacks in Stanislaus county, in the month of June, 1917, and also the like destruction of a stable, garage, and a large quantity of hay in the city of Modesto in the month of October of that year. He also testified that at the meetings of the I. W. W. the use of violence and the commission of crimes as the means for terrorizing the people into submission to the political vagaries and revolutionary notions of the I. W. W. were matters of common discussion and advocacy. Townsend, as stated, gave a statement of the principles and purposes of the I. W. W. and the determination of that organization to carry out its plans by means of acts of sabotage and other crimes.

Arada testified that he was employed in August, 1917, on McDonald island, about 15 miles south of Stockton, by the Scata Company, being engaged in the digging of potatoes. There was a large number of other laborers employed in the same work. The men slept in one large room in what was known as the bunkhouse on the ranch. A few days after these men were so engaged some 14 other men called at the place and asked for employment. The owner of the property gave them employment, and they worked all of the afternoon of the day they made their appearance there, and at night slept in the large room so occupied by the other workmen. The next morning the 14 men referred to left the premises without obtaining breakfast or demanding or receiving compensation for their labor the day before. Arada, a short time before noon of that day, and while employed in the field, felt a burning sensation in his feet. The pain grew in intensity until he was required to remove his shoes, and, upon doing so, he found that his feet were seriously blistered, and also discovered what appeared to be white powder in his shoes. The white powder proved to be potassium hydroxide, which, so testified an expert chemist, will destroy "organic matter or human flesh," and would cause one's feet, if brought in contact with them, to bleed, and would cause much pain and suffering. The story, as he told it herein, of the severity of his injuries, and how he was compelled to go to the county hospital for treatment, where he remained over a year before he was able to use his feet, is told in the case of People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 695, 209 Pac. 381. He further testified that I. W. W. papers were found in the bunkhouse the morning the 14 men referred to left the premises, and stated that no such literature had been seen there before.

Davis, the deputy sheriff above referred to, told about the fires in Stanislaus county on the morning of July 21, 1917. He stated that some eight or nine haystacks a short distance from Modesto and within a radius of a few miles of each other, belonging to different persons, were found to be burning simultaneously. He also testified as to the incendiary fires resulting in the destruction of the buildings in the city of Modesto, and above referred to, and stated that these several fires were in progress at about the same time. The people introduced in evidence a large amount of literature of the same general character as that introduced and referred to in the cases of the People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381; People v. Flanagan et als. (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014; People v. Wagner (Cal. Sup.) 225 Pac. 464. Some of this literature involved publications under the authority of the I. W. W. organization, which openly advocated the resort to crimes and acts of violence for the purpose of carrying out the ultimate plans of said organization. Much of this constituted publications appearing prior to the enactment of the syndicalism law. But Townsend testified that the same propaganda of violence and crime was advocated by the organization at their meetings and in divers other places long after the Syndicalism Act was placed upon the statute books; for illustration, a songbook, published under the authority of the I. W. W. in the year 1918, and containing a number of different so-called songs which involved somewhat veiled yet plainly apparent suggestions of the necessity for pursuing a course of criminal violence to accomplish the main purposes of the organization, was introduced in evidence. It was claimed at the trial that this book had been supplanted by a new songbook from which the objectionable songs referred to had been eliminated after the passage of the Syndicalism Act. But Townsend stated that, notwithstanding that the objectionable songs were not contained in the new book, they were, nevertheless, still sung at the meetings of the I. W. W. and at other places when there was a considerable number of them together. But, as stated, above, there is no necessity for setting forth herein even in substance the vast amount of literature that was introduced by the people in support of the charge. It is enough to say that all of this literature, as was shown in the cases heretofore decided by this and the Supreme Court, contained incendiary utterances against our government and society generally as it is governed to-day.

Some of the defendants and other witnesses, members of the I. W. W., testifying for the defense, declared that the organization never did advocate the commission of crime or acts of violence in the carrying out of its principles. Some of these witnesses testified that they never heard at any I. W. W. meeting any suggestion that acts of violence should be resorted to for any purpose connected with the organization, but, to the contrary, the leaders thereof had often advised against criminal acts or violence of any character in the pressing of the principles of the organization upon the people. A resolution adopted by the I. W. W. organization, after the passage of the syndicalism law, declaring that the Industrial Workers of the World "do hereby declare that said organization does not now and never has believed in or advocated either destruction or violence as a means of encompassing industrial reform," was introduced by the defense. Several other similar statements published under the authority of the organization were also introduced in evidence.

The testimony thus presented by the defendants merely had the effect of creating a conflict in the evidence which it was the duty of the jury to determine.

[2] The counsel for the defendants insists that the testimony presented by the people disclosing acts of violence in the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 "was too remote," and for that reason should not have been received. While it is true the criminal acts shown to have been done in the years mentioned were rather remote from the date of the trial, yet the objection on the ground of remoteness goes to the weight of the testimony rather than to its competency. Besides, Townsend, as we have seen, testified that, while it was true the organization after the enactment of the criminal syndicalism law proclaimed itself as against the commission of crime or acts of sabotage or other acts of violence, such proclamation or the resolution containing such proclamation was wholly a subterfuge, and intended for the sole purpose of hoodwinking the public into the belief that the organization had in good faith changed its tactics in that particular; that after the resolution referred to was adopted the members still advocated and urged the commission of acts of violence and sabotage as they had prior to the enactment of the criminal syndicalism law. Indeed, the jury could well have doubted the sincerity of the organization in the adoption of the resolution denouncing violence of any character as a means "for encompassing industrial reform" upon comparing the statement therein contained that said organization "does not now and never has believed in or advocated either destruction or violence" with the vast amount of testimony brought before them which showed that, as a matter of fact, the organization or its members had committed the most atrocious crimes for the purpose of terrorizing the people in the futile hope that it would intimidate them into yielding to the demands of the organization.

[3] There are a number of assignments involving objections to said literature that was offered and received in evidence. We have examined these assignments, and find that, generally speaking, they are without legal force. Those errors in rulings upon the evidence which might be subject to a degree of criticism, in view of the strong case made against the accused, were without prejudice. The ruling admitting in evidence a contemptuously satirical article published in one of the official newspapers of the I. W. W. concerning the passing of the late President Harding is especially complained of, the contention being that the article was irrelevant and incompetent as evidence and tended strongly to prejudice the defendants in the minds of the jury. The article was aimed, not particularly at the late President as an individual, but as a political system established for the orderly government of society. In other words, the attack contained in the publication was an attack upon our political system and institutions. While it was not necessary to introduce the article in evidence in this case, yet there was nothing in the article any more radical than statements contained in other newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets admittedly published by and under the authority of the organization and which were properly received in evidence as in proof of the general attitude of the organization toward the governments of this country, and, indeed, toward all constituted authority, whether involving democratic, aristocratic, or other rational forms and systems of government.

[4] The statement of counsel for the defendants that, to constitute criminal syndicalism, "there must not only be acts of violence committed, but those acts of violence must be employed with the direct purpose of effecting the political or industrial changes named in the statute" does not altogether involve a correct view of the law. The law, as will be observed, provides that the act of teaching or advocating or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage, or unlawful acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting political change, by any organization or assemblage of persons, constitutes criminal syndicalism. It will thus be noted that the mere teaching, etc., is sufficient, and that the actual acts of violence or the actual commission of crime are merely evidentiary, and tend to show the character of the organization, and the fact that it does teach and advocate such methods.

[5] The objection is made that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions preferred by the defendants. We think that there was no error in disallowing said instructions. The charge of the court covers every principle of law applicable to the case, and was expressed in lucid language. In this connection it may be observed that the court, in its charge, in defining criminal syndicalism, not only set forth section 1 of the act, but also gave an instruction clearly and positively stating that, in order to convict the defendants, the jury must find that the defendants and each of them "did discover and know that the organization referred to as the I. W. W. was an organization for the purpose of advocating, teaching, aiding, and abetting criminal syndicalism."

The judgment and the order as to each of the appealing defendants are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WARE et al. (Cr. 1014.)

1. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Crime of organizing and assisting in organizing not committed by being member.

Where I. W. W. had been organized before accused's acts of bringing in members, he was not guilty of organizing or assisting in organizing such group of persons.

2. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Verdict finding accused guilty of membership in I. W. W. held not sustained.

Where accused did not become member of I. W. W. in county in which he was indicted for membership, and there was no evidence that he was ever in county prior to indictment, verdict of guilty, under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, could not be sustained.

3. Criminal law 🔑97(1)—Person never within state may be found guilty of conspiracy, if coconspirators commit overt act within county.

Under Pen. Code, § 27, notwithstanding accused has never been in state, he may be found guilty of conspiracy to commit criminal syndicalism, if within three years prior to indictment coconspirators commit overt acts within county.

4. Criminal law 🔑97(½)—Person never within county cannot be found guilty of criminal syndicalism.

Person never within county prior to indictment cannot be found guilty of substantive crime of criminal syndicalism.

5. Criminal law 🔑419, 420(1)—When testimony of statements as to purposes and principles of I. W. W. admissible, stated.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, unlawful character of organization must be proved, and testimony of witness as to statements by persons whom he believed to be members of I. W. W., of which accused was member, as to purpose and objects of organization is inadmissible as hearsay, but testimony as to statements, speeches, and declarations of members at recognized meetings of organization, or sanctioned by it, and as to conversations with recognized leaders, is admissible.

6. Criminal law 🔑448(12)—Testimony must be confined to substance of statements or speeches authorized by I. W. W.

Witness testifying as to statements or speeches to show objects and principles of I. W. W. must not give his inferences as to meaning of language used, but must confine testimony to substance thereof; exception to rule in case of libel and slander not being applicable.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of incompetent testimony as to teachings of I. W. W., subsequently greatly modified, held prejudicial error.

Where accused contended that since 1918 violence and sabotage were no longer taught or justified by I. W. W., it was prejudicial error to admit hearsay and incompetent testimony based in part on speeches and declarations occurring prior to 1918.

8. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Instruction defining criminal syndicalism held erroneous as including peaceful demonstrations.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, it was error to instruct that criminal syndicalism included any form of direct action to abolish present social system, leading jury to believe it included peaceful public demonstrations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Paul Ware and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism. From the judgment and from an order denying new trial they appeal. Reversed.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The defendants Ware, Kohn, Nolan and White, who with 18 others were jointly charged with the crime of criminal syndicalism, have appealed from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The indictment contains two counts in each of which the defendants are charged with criminal syndicalism alleged to have been committed in the county of Los Angeles. The first count, drawn under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act (St. 1919, p. 281), charges that defendants did "organize and assist in organizing and knowingly become and were members" of the Industrial Workers of the World, the nature and character of which organization is then averred. For brevity the organization will be referred to as the I. W. W. The second count is so inartificially drawn that we are left in doubt as to whether it is an attempt to charge a conspiracy to commit some one of the crimes denounced in section 2 of the act or to charge a violation of subdivision 3 of that section, i. e., the crime of publishing printed matter of the character condemned in that subdivision. The appellants Ware, White, and Nolan were convicted under the first count and acquitted under the second; the appellant Kohn was convicted under the second count and acquitted under the first.

[1] There is no evidence that Ware, White or Nolan ever organized or assisted in organizing the I. W. W. That society was completely organized and in existence before appellants had anything to do with it. And the act of bringing in or assisting to bring in members is not the equivalent of "organizing or assisting in organizing" such a group of persons. People v. Thurman (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 394; People v. Thornton (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 1020. Neither Ware nor White became a member of the I. W. W. in the county of Los Angeles, they having joined the organization outside of this state, but each of those two defendants continued to retain his membership in, and he was in fact a member of, the I. W. W. while he was in the county of Los Angeles and within three years prior to the filing of the indictment.

[2] Nolan not only did not become a member in Los Angeles county, but there is no evidence to show that he was in that county at any time prior to the indictment, and therefore there is no evidence that he was a member in Los Angeles county as charged in the indictment. As to him, therefore, the evidence unquestionably is insufficient to support the verdict.

[3, 4] It was stipulated that Kohn was not in the state at the time of the filing of the indictment. If the second count of that pleading must be construed as charging a conspiracy to commit the crime of criminal syndicalism, and if the several publications of the printed matter described therein are to be regarded as nothing more than overt acts done to effect the object of such conspiracy; then, notwithstanding Kohn was not in the state prior to the indictment, it nevertheless is possible that he could be found guilty of such conspiracy, if, within three years prior to the indictment, any of his coconspirators committed any one of such overt acts within the county of Los Angeles. See Hyde v. United States, 225 U. S. 347, 32 Sup. Ct. 793, 56 L. Ed. 1114, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 614, and section 27 of the Penal Code. If, on the other hand, the second count is to be construed as an attempt to charge the substantive offense of criminal syndicalism and not a conspiracy to commit it, then it unquestionably must be held that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against Kohn, who at no time prior to the returning of the indictment by the grand jury did anything personally in the county of Los Angeles which is denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism Act. See People v. Leonard (Cal. App.) 225 Pac. 461. There is substantial ground to support the conclusion that the second count is an attempt to charge one or more of the substantive crimes defined in section 2 of the act and not an attempt to charge a conspiracy to commit any one of such crimes. That count commences as follows:

> "And for a second and separate cause of action against the said defendants, * * * and being a different statement of the same offense as that charged in count 1 of this indictment, (italics ours) the said defendants * * * are accused," etc.

Not only this, but, with the evident purpose of complying with section 951 of the Penal Code by making a general statement of the "legal appellation" of the crime intended to be charged, the second count, in its commencement, declares that the defendants are accused by the grand jury "of the crime of criminal syndicalism, a felony." As aids to construction, these statements in the commencement of the second count lend color to the theory that the grand jurors intended to charge the defendants with the commission of one or more of the substantive crimes defined in section 2 of the act, and not to charge them with a conspiracy to commit any of such crimes. We do not find it necessary, however, to pass upon this question. For though the evidence might possibly be sufficient to support the verdict against Kohn if conspiracy be the crime with which he is charged in the count upon which he was found guilty, there are errors in the record of so grave a character as to necessitate a reversal as to all of the appellants.

[5] One of the most serious errors of which appellants justly complain is the admission against them of hearsay evidence and of incompetent opinions and conclusions. In prosecutions under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, where it is charged that the accused is a member of an organization which advocates criminal syndicalism or that he published written or printed matter which advocates or teaches the purposes or principles of such an organization, it is incumbent upon the people to prove in each case the unlawful character of the organization. People v. Thornton, supra. In making such proof the following rules of evidence, sanctioned by authority and fortified by reason, should be observed: The testimony of a witness as to talks which he had with persons whom he believed to be members of the organization, whether such belief be founded upon membership cards shown to the witness or upon declarations made to him by such supposed members, and in which talks the persons whom the witness so believed to be members made statements of what purported to be the purposes, objects, principles, or teachings of the organization, is hearsay testimony, and as such is inadmissible. State v. Gibson, 115 Wash. 512, 197 Pac. 611; State v. Cantwell, 119 Wash. 665, 206 Pac. 362. It may be that the persons quoted by the witness were not members of the organization, though they claimed to be. They may have obtained their membership cards through some species of fraud, or it may be that they were not acquainted with the principles and teachings which they professed to know. These are matters which the defendants in such actions should have the right to search out by cross-examining the persons who vouchsafed the information given to the witness. State v. Gibson, supra. Testimony as to statements, speeches, and declarations made in the hearing of the witness by, or in the presence of, members of the organization, at recognized meetings thereof in its headquarters or halls or in such places and on such occasions as are proved to have received the sanction and countenance of the organization, is admissible. State v. Pettilla, 116 Wash. 589, 200 Pac. 332. Also witnesses may testify as to conversations had with members of the organizations whose membership is proved by competent evidence and is of such a character as to show that it carried with it the authority of the organization to make declarations as to its purposes, objects, principles, and teachings, as, for example, where, by competent evidence, the conversations are shown to have been had with leaders and officers of the organization in the course of the performance of their duties as such. State v. Pettilla, supra; State v. Kowalchuk, 116 Wash. 592, 200 Pac. 333.

[6] A witness testifying to statements, speeches, or declarations made in his presence by members of the I. W. W., at recognized meetings or in places and upon occasions which have received the organization's sanction and countenance, or to conversations had with officers or leaders whose membership and rank have been proved by competent evidence, and whose official positions are such as to carry authority to make on behalf of the organization declarations of its purposes, objects, principles, and teachings, must not give his inference as to the meaning of the language heard by him, but must confine his testimony to recounting the substance of the statements, speeches, declarations, or conversations, so far as his memory will enable him to recall it; that is to say, a witness to such speeches, declarations, or conversations may give the substance of the language as he remembers it, but he may not give his inferences drawn from what was said to him or in his presence. He must not be allowed to place his construction upon the language by stating what he understood it to mean. It is for the jury, not the witness, to determine from the language used at the meetings or in the conversations with the authorized leaders or officers what were the teachings or principles promulgated, or what were the objects or purposes had in view by the organization. The general rule is that a witness may not state his impression as to the meaning of the language heard by him or as to the intention of the speaker. Braley v. Braley, 16 N. H. 426; Hibbard v. Russell, 16 N. H. 410, 41 Am. Dec. 733; Kingsbury v. Moses, 45 N. H. 222; Robinson v. Robinson, 159 Cal. 203, 113 Pac. 155. In the case last cited our Supreme Court says:

> "The trial court did not err in excluding from evidence the conclusions of the plaintiff as to the meaning defendant intended to convey by certain statements made to her. She was allowed to state fully the substance of what he said, and it was for the trial court to determine the meaning thereof from the words used and the circumstances under which they were spoken."

To this general rule an exception is made in actions for libel or slander, where the libelous or slanderous statement depends upon the effect which the words produced in the minds of the readers or hearers. 11 R. C. L. pp. 567, 568. Also an exception to the rule is permissible where there is something besides the mere words used which goes into the making of the inference or conclusion deduced by the hearer, as, for example, when gestures, tones, and innuendoes which are incapable of description accompany a speech or a conversation, and so affect the meaning of the spoken words that a mere recounting of the words without the accompanying circumstances will not convey the real meaning of what was said. Note to State v. Pruett, L. R. A. 1918A, 738, 739. This last exception to the general rule is but an application of the well-established doctrine that a witness may state his conclusion where the facts perceived by the senses are so complex and subtle as to make it difficult or impossible adequately to describe them to the jury, and the conclusion or inference is so simple and so well within the range of common experience that the witness may relate what he has observed more accurately, as well as more easily, by stating his conclusions than by attempting to detail the evidential facts. But this reason for making an exception to the general rule is not applicable here. There is no claim that the language of any of the statements, speeches, declarations, oral teachings, conversations, or writings heard or read by any of the witnesses in this case was accompanied by gestures, tones, or other conduct which so affected the meaning of the spoken or written words that a mere recounting of the substance of the language would not convey the real meaning of the person who spoke or wrote the words.

Tested by the foregoing it must be held that the trial court erred in overruling appellants' objections to innumerable questions calling for hearsay testimony and for the witnesses' interpretations of the language which they heard or read. Thus one of the witnesses for the prosecution, a police officer who formerly was a member of the I. W. W., after giving what appellants' counsel describes as "a series of exegeses as to the witness' interpretation" of a certain pamphlet, was asked these further questions as to the meaning of the language of the pamphlet, and gave the following answers:

> "Q. Now, Mr. Townsend, as far as you have gone, I will ask you whether or not the explanation you have given as you have gone along was the explanation of the literature that you learned in this school of instruction? A. Yes, in it, and being a member of the I. W. W., talking to members as individuals, as members. (Italics ours.)
> "Q. Is there any further passage there? A. Yes.
> "Q. All right, if you will just go ahead and read that and give the explanation of it. A. (Reading) 'It is as a negation of and as a reaction against such methods that the I. W. W.

preaches its own form of economic direct action.' That is a statement against craft unionism; that they want to teach that by direct action. Here is the best one of all: 'We want to stir the workers into personal activity and participation in the struggle for a new society.' Now, what is that personal activity that they want to stir the workers into? Direct action sabotage, the things that I have previously named; to destroy the industries. Personal activity means—

"Q. I will ask you whether that explanation is what you learned at the schools of instruction? A. Yes.

"Q. And from conversation with officials and the rank and file members of the I. W. W.? (Italics ours.) A. Yes."

By these excerpts from the witness' testimony there is shown, not only a violation of the rule which forbids the witness giving his conclusions and inferences, but a violation also of the rule against hearsay evidence. A portion of the witness' information may have been gained by him through hearing speeches at recognized meetings of the I. W. W., through secret instruction given him by authorized teachers of the organization's real purposes and aims, or through his conversations with officers of the I. W. W.; but he did not pretend to say what portion of his information was so acquired and what portion was obtained by him from private conversations had with members or purported members of the organization—with those whom he referred to as "the rank and file members." As in State v. Cantwell, supra, the witness was testifying, in part, as to what he had learned from supposed members of the organization who were not shown to have had authority to speak concerning the organization's purposes and principles. Another witness, who testified that he had joined the I. W. W. for the purpose of getting information for the government, testified as follows:

"Q. And from your knowledge of the organization (italics ours) I will ask you if you know the attitude of the I. W. W. towards military establishment? A. Yes, sir."

Thereupon the defendants, who were not represented by counsel, all of them having elected to conduct their own defense in person, interposed the following objections and motions which were met with the following adverse rulings:

"Mr. Kohn: May it please the court, we object—he has not been a member since 1919, and anything he can claim to know or think to know can only be hearsay, or conclusions. * * *

"The Court: * * * Objection overruled.

"Mr. White: I move that the literature of the I. W. W. be used as the best evidence, and not this man's testimony.

"The Court: Objection overruled."

Thereupon the witness proceeded as follows:

"Q. By Mr. Hill (the public prosecutor): The question is, What is their attitude toward the military establishment? A. They support every movement for the reduction of the army and navy; they discourage enlistments in the army and navy, the national guard, and so on, without exception.

"Q. Why? A. To increase their chances of success when the time comes for a revolution.

"Mr. White (a defendant): I certainly object to the answer and the question both, and ask that it be stricken out and the jury instructed to disregard them as plainly a conclusion of the witness, why these members of the I. W. W. done this.

"The Court: Motion denied."

[7] In this testimony we have an example of a flagrant violation of the rule which forbids a witness to place his interpretation upon language heard or read by him or to give his inferences as to the meaning of spoken or written words. Another witness, a former mayor of Seattle, was permitted to testify that during his incumbency of the office of mayor of that city he read official copies of certain resolutions published in the Seattle Union Record, a newspaper which he testified was owned by the Central Labor Council. The prosecuting officer, over defendants' objections that it called for the conclusion of the witness, was then permitted to ask the question, "And by whom was the Central Labor Council controlled at that time?" To which the witness answered: "The Central Labor Council was controlled at that time by members of the Industrial Workers of the World." A more glaring violation of the rule forbidding a witness to state his conclusion could not well be imagined. The record before us, covering almost 7,000 pages, is replete with just such errors, a few of which we have culled at random for the purpose of illustration. That these errors were prejudicial is shown beyond the shadow of a doubt. It was the contention of the defendants at the trial that since the year 1918 the literature issued by the I. W. W. and the teachings of that organization have undergone a radical change, and that ever since that year violence and sabotage no longer have been taught or justified by that group of men. It was important, therefore, that the jury should be apprised of the principles, policies, aims, and purposes of the organization within the three-year period immediately preceding the filing of the indictment, and not be led astray by hearsay evidence and incompetent conclusions based, in part at least, upon speeches, declarations, and conversations occurring prior to the time when, as the defendants claimed, the principles, purposes, and teachings of the organization were greatly modified.

[8] But one further error needs consideration. After having read to the jury the Criminal Syndicalism Act, the trial court gave the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the word 'criminal syndicalism' is defined in the law I have read to you, and you are to be governed by that definition. It is defined in Webster's New International Dictionary as follows: 'It aims to abolish the present political and social system by means of the general strike, and direct action, which is any kind of action that is directly effective, whether it be a simple strike, a peaceful public demonstration, sabotage or revolutionary violence.'" (Italics ours.)

This instruction was misleading, and tended to confuse the jury. It could hardly have failed to create in the minds of the jurors the erroneous notion that not only is there no conflict between the law's definition and Webster's definition, but that criminal syndicalism is a crime which embraces any and every aim to abolish the present political and social system by any directly effective action, even though such action amount to no more than a peaceful public demonstration.

It is but fair to say that the Attorney General, in the brief filed by him, virtually concedes that the judgment should be reversed.

The judgment against each appellant and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

GANDALFO v. GANDALFO. (Civ. 2684.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Allowance of charge on entry in account book contrary to oral evidence was question for trial court.

The allowance of a charge against one partner, based upon an entry in a partnership account book by the other partner, was question for the trial court, there being a conflict between the oral evidence and the account book.

2. Appeal and error ⚷932(1)—In absence of showing by record, it is assumed that amount allowed for hauling was proper.

Where the record does not show what credit the court allowed for certain hauling, it will be assumed on appeal that the amount allowed was proper, error not being presumed.

3. Appeal and error ⚷930(1)—Reviewing court assumes as true all facts appearing by reasonable inference from evidence.

The reviewing court will assume as true all facts appearing by reasonable inference from evidence in record, so far as they may support the findings.

4. Trial ⚷377(2)—Refusal to admit further evidence after submission, held proper.

After a case was submitted to the trial court, refusal of a motion to set aside the submission and to allow further evidence to be introduced, where the parties produced conflicting affidavits concerning the motion, was justified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Joseph L. Gandalfo against Jo Gandalfo. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. B. Warne and J. B. Curtin, both of Sonora, for appellant.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for respondent.

YOUNG, Justice pro tem. This is an action for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting. The trial court made and filed findings of fact, and judgment was entered thereon. By the judgment it was, among other things, orderd that the plaintiff recover from the defendant the sum of $3,728.17. Defendant appeals.

That portion of the judgment which orders such recovery from defendant is based upon finding 4 of the findings, which is as follows:

"That during the existence of the said partnership of J. Gandalfo & Co. and from and after said October 8, 1914, to the time of the trial of this action the said partnership became indebted to plaintiff for a balance on account of money paid out and contributed to and for the benefit of said partnership and for labor performed and for use of his motor vehicles in the sum of $5,308.08 to which the said partnership is entitled to an offset on account of moneys of said partnership collected by plaintiff and for gasoline used amounting to the sum of $1,313.50, leaving a balance of $3,994.58 now due and payable and owing by the said partnership to the plaintiff on the said account. That during said time there was collected, received and retained by defendant money belonging to the said partnership to the amount and value of $4,191.97, and the said defendant paid out and contributed to the funds of said partnership the sum of $763.00, leaving a balance of $3,428.97, which is due and payable to the said partnership from the said defendant. That the sum of the said account owing from the said partnership to the said plaintiff, to wit: $3,994.58 and the said amount owing by defendant to the said partnership, to wit, $3,428.97, equal the sum of $7,423.55, one-half of such amount or the sum of $3,711.775 is due and owing from the said defendant to the plaintiff in settlement of their said partnership accounts and defendant is also indebted to plaintiff for a balance of $17 on their individual accounts which by consent of the parties hereto has been determined in this action, making a total of $3,728.775 due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff herein."

The principal ground urged by defendant for a reversal of the judgment is that finding 4 is not supported by the evidence.

Plaintiff, a nephew of defendant, and defendant, entered into articles of copartnership in February, 1913, and their principal business consisted in conducting a hotel and a saloon in the city of Sonora. They also ran a grocery store for a while, and also occasionally engaged in farming. Plaintiff was called to serve in the United States Army in August, 1917, and did not thereafter participate in the actual affairs of the partnership business.

The documentary evidence introduced at the trial consisted of bank statements, checks, notes, letters and the account books of the partnership. The parties to the action relied upon oral testimony to establish many of their respective claims. Many witnesses were sworn and examined, and the testimony as to many items was extremely conflicting. Plaintiff gave testimony as to many items contributed by him for the benefit of the partnership (some of which testimony was corroborated by other witnesses), which had never been entered in the books of the partnership, and also offered oral testimony—his own and that of other witnesses—as to many sums of money collected for the partnership by defendant for which the partnership had not been credited. Defendant contested many of these items, and gave testimony in his own behalf as to items advanced by him for the benefit of the partnership for which no credits had been given on the books of the partnership, and also as to amounts collected by plaintiff for the partnership and not accounted for. There is no finding as to the items which were included in the totals found in finding 4, nor is there anything in the record which shows authoritatively these items. In making up the totals found in finding 4, the trial court had before it many items for consideration, many of which were necessarily excluded by it. We reach this conclusion from an examination of the transcript on appeal, from which we gather that, had the court accepted all the items claimed by plaintiff, plaintiff's credit would have been much larger, and, had it accepted as true the testimony offered by defendant, plaintiff's recovery would have been much less. The only suggestions before us as to the items included in these totals are found in the respective briefs of plaintiff and defendant, and these do not agree.

[1] Defendant, in his brief, calls our attention to certain items which he asserts the trial court erroneously included in the total sum found in favor of the plaintiff; also certain items which he asserts were erroneously included in the total sum charged against defendant. He contends that the court included in the total charge made against defendant an item of $780.15, which was the total sum of other items also included in the total charge of finding 4. On page 120 of the partnership account book introduced in evidence there appeared the following entry in defendant's handwriting: "Apr. 23, 1918—Recd. from Andy $738.15." On the same page, 120, and on page 118 of the same book, were many other items set out as having been received, with date of receipt and the name of the person from whom received. Defendant testified that the item "$738.15" was the total of the other items found on pages 118 and 120, and that they were collected by one Andy Devoto and entered in the account book as collected, and paid over to him by Andy Devoto and that he (defendant) had added them up and made the entry above specified. The allowance of this charge against defendant—if it was allowed—was entirely a question for the trial court. The original entries were before it, and it was for the court to say whether or not it would accept the record evidence contained in the account book, or the oral statement of defendant. In this connection it may also be well to observe that we have examined the items which, defendant testified, made the total of $738.15, and find that the total of the items is a much larger sum. Defendant complains that the court credited plaintiff with an item of $626 upon plaintiff's testimony that his father had paid a bill for the partnership to the Tacoma Bottling Company. Defendant denounces this as error, and argues that plaintiff did not pay it himself, and that, his father not being a party to the action, the credit should not have been allowed. Defendant's father was sworn as a witness and testified that he had made the payment for and in behalf of his son. If this credit was allowed by the court it was entirely proper. Defendant complains that the court credited the plaintiff with $676.08 for picking up and hauling 2,625 sacks of grain, and that this sum was an excessive charge and should not have exceeded $80. The plaintiff sets forth in his brief that the court gave plaintiff credit for only $76.08 in this behalf. The record does not show what credit the court allowed, and therefore we assume that it only allowed such sum as was shown by the evidence to be proper. Defendant again complains that the court allowed plaintiff credit for $789 for the use of his individually owned tractor in plowing land for the partnership, and in his brief says: "Just how that sum was arrived at we cannot understand." In connection with this transaction plaintiff testified that he had plowed 460 acres of land for the partnership with his tractor, and that the going charge for such plowing was $3 per acre, thus making a total of $1,380, with which he sought to charge the partnership. Defendant testified that plaintiff plowed only 363 acres of land for the partnership. Thus we see that, if the court did allow plaintiff credit for $789 for plowing, this sum was arrived at by the court accepting defendant's testimony as against that of plaintiff. Defendant asserts that the court allowed a charge of $58.95 against him as money collected from M. E. Knaus, which was part of a total of $364.50, also charged against him. An examination of the transcript and a computation made by us discloses that the item of $58.95 was not included in the total charge of $364.50.

[2, 3] It is further claimed by defendant that the court included in the charges against him an item of $310 as collected from Angelo Pararia, and that the evidence shows the amount collected by him to be $210. The partnership account book shows this amount to have been $210, and if it were satisfactorily shown that the excess of $100 was included in the finding, it would be error. The record, however, does not show that this item was allowed against the defendant as $310, or at all. There is ample evidence in the record to support the total amount allowed against defendant in finding 4, irrespective of this amount, and the appellate court will not, therefore, assume that the trial court made an erroneous charge. The reviewing court will assume as true all facts which appear by reasonable inference from the evidence contained in the record on appeal, so fas as they may support the findings. Cosby v. Cline, 186 Cal. 700, 200 Pac. 801.

It is held in Estate of Aufret, 187 Cal. 34, 200 Pac. 946, that error cannot be presumed on appeal, all intendments being in favor of the judgment.

In O'Meara v. Swortfiguer (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 975, it is held that in determining whether or not a judgment is supported by the evidence, the appellate court will accept the view most favorable to respondent.

It is further claimed by defendant that the court credited plaintiff with $860 for the use of his Ford car as a delivery car in the business of the partnership at the rate of $20 per month for the period of 43 months. He contends: First, that the plaintiff did not originally intend to make a charge for the use of his car in the business; second, that he charged for a greater period of time than the car was actually used in the business, and, third, that the charge of $20 per month for the rental of the car was excessive, especially in view of the fact that the evidence shows that the partnership paid for the upkeep of the car while used as a delivery car. As to the first point urged by defendant, it is true plaintiff testified that he did not originally intend to charge for the car. On the other hand, defendant testified that he expected the partnership would have to pay a reasonable amount for the use of the car while in the use of the partnership. Here again the record fails to show whether or not the court did, in fact, include this credit in its findings, and the appellant court will, therefore, assume that the trial court did not allow an excessive amount.

There are several other items for which defendant urges that the court erroneously allowed plaintiff credit, and still others that he claims were allowed against defendant erroneously, but an examination of the transcript shows that the testimony with regard to all of them was conflicting, and that if they were included in the totals found in finding 4, it was entirely a matter for the trial court to determine.

[4] After the case was submitted to the trial court defendant moved to set aside the submission for the purpose of introducing further evidence. He offered affidavits in support of his motion, and plaintiff offered affidavits in opposing the motion. The motion was overruled, and defendant complains of this ruling as an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. The affidavits were conflicting, and the court was justified in ruling as it did.

Defendant has failed to show that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence, and has failed to show that there was any error on the part of the trial court.

It is therefore, ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

Defendant appeals from the judgments entered against him, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The only argument made by defendant is upon his contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgments rendered against him on the four charges of grand larceny. While the facts in support of these four charges are entirely different, in so far as the names of the parties and the amounts involved are concerned, yet the general plan or scheme followed by the defendant in securing the various sums of money from the several complaining witnesses was practically the same in each of the four transactions. It will not, therefore, be necessary to detail the testimony relating to all four charges, and we will, for the sake of brevity, confine ourselves to a review of the testimony involved in the charge set forth in count one of the indictment. The facts in the case are undisputed, as the defendant offered no evidence in his behalf. The defendant represented to J. Q. Alexander, the complaining witness in count No. 1, that he had an option on a bungalow, including the furniture, situated at No. 4380 Denker avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, for $6,300, and that $750 would handle it; that he could sell and make from $1,000 to $1,500 on the deal; that the option would expire at noon on that day; that if Alexander wanted the option he could have it at the price quoted. Thereupon Alexander gave to the defendant the former's check for $750. Defendant accepted the check, and informed Alexander that he would escrow the deal with one of the title companies in said city, and that a card would be received by Alexander in a short time from said title company informing him of said escrow. Just before he left Alexander the defendant voluntarily gave his own check to Alexander for $850, remarking at the time. "I am going to leave you just $100 in excess of your investment, to show you my faith in it." The check for $750 was cashed by the defendant, but he failed to place it, or the money received thereon, or any papers, in escrow as agreed, but converted the proceeds of said check to his own use. The evidence further shows that the defendant had no option to purchase the property, as represented by him to Alexander, nor was there any such property as described by defendant at No. 4380 Denker avenue, nor was there any such number as 4380 Denker avenue. Alexander ascertained these facts, and endeavored to find the defendant, but learned that he had left the city of Los Angeles. He then presented the defendant's check for $850 to the bank upon which it was drawn for payment, which was refused. Later the defendant returned to Los Angeles, and Alexander made numerous attempts to have the defendant repay to him the $750, all of which were unsuccessful. These negotiations continued for about a month, when the defendant left said city and later was located and arrested at Springfield, Mass., and returned to this state for trial.

Defendant now contends that these facts are insufficient to support a verdict finding him guilty of the crime of grand larceny. He insists on the other hand that, if he is guilty of any crime, it is that of obtaining money by false pretenses and not grand larceny. The distinction between the crime of grand larceny, when the property in question is obtained by fraud, trick, or device, and the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses, is well established as a matter of law. It is often difficult to determine from a given state of facts of which one, if either, of these crimes the accused is guilty. The law governing this subject is well settled and is stated in People v. Shwartz, 43 Cal. App. 696, 699, 185 Pac. 686, 687, as follows:

> "In larceny the owner of a thing has no intention to part with his property therein to the person taking it, although he may intend to part with possession. In false pretenses the owner does intend to part with his property in the money or chattel, but it is obtained from him by fraud. People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 Pac. 131."

[2] There is nothing in the evidence in the case before us tending to show that the check given by Alexander to the defendant was at any time to become the property of the latter. On the other hand, it is quite evident from the testimony in this case that the complaining witness, at the time he delivered this check to the defendant, intended that he should deposit the same in escrow with the title company as part payment on the so-called Denker avenue property. The title to the money, therefore, never passed to the defendant, nor did it pass out of the complaining witness. The title to the money remaining in the complaining witness, it was subject to larceny as his property, and, when the defendant appropriated the proceeds thereof to his own use, he was guilty of larceny. People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 Pac. 131. It should also be stated that, in order to convict a person of the crime of grand larceny by fraud, trick, or device, it is necessary that the evidence show that it was his intention at the time he procured the property to defraud the owner out of the same. The fact that the defendant in this case had no option to purchase the property as represented by him to Alexander would justify the belief that defendant's intention, at the time he made such false representations, was to defraud Alexander out of his property. No other reasonable conclusion can be drawn from the conduct of defendant. Evidently the jury so construed his actions, and in our opinion there was ample evidence in the case to justify them in so doing.

Defendant intimates that the giving by him of his check for $850 to Alexander in some way changed the nature of the transaction to his advantage. The check was given voluntarily on the part of the defendant and after he had received Alexander's check for $750. A similar device was attempted by the defendant in the case of People v.

Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19–22, 36 Pac. 506, 507, concerning which the Supreme Court said:

> "The jury were justified in believing that defendant's voluntary presentation of the note was a mere trick to get possession of the money."

So in the case at bar the voluntary giving by the defendant of his worthless check was apparently in furtherance of his dishonest scheme to obtain Alexander's check, and did not convert this fraudulent transaction into a legitimate one. We are satisfied that the evidence in all respects supports the judgments.

The judgments and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte WILKINS. (Cr. 785.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 26, 1924.)

1. Bail 🔑44—Criminal law 🔑1148—Bail, pending appeal from judgment not imposing fine only or imprisonment for misdemeanor, discretionary, and reviewable only for abuse.

Discretion, under Pen. Code, § 1272, to admit to bail, pending appeal from judgments not imposing fines only or imprisonment for misdemeanors, is vested primarily in trial court, whose determination should not be disturbed or ignored, except for manifest abuse.

2. Bail 🔑44—Admission to bail, pending appeal, after conviction and sentence to state penitentiary, discretionary with trial court.

Under Pen. Code, § 1272, admission to bail pending appeal from conviction, under section 476a, for making and delivering fictitious check with intent to defraud, is not matter of right, but discretionary with trial court after sentence to imprisonment in state penitentiary as for felony, though court could have sentenced defendant to county jail as for misdemeanor.

3. Habeas corpus 🔑113(12)—Sufficiency of evidence to support conviction not considered pending determination on appeal.

Pending determination of legal sufficiency of testimony to sustain conviction on appeal, defendant is presumed guilty, and appellate court will not weigh evidence on application for writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody.

Application by W. C. Wilkins for writ of habeas corpus to sheriff of Placer county to secure release from custody on bail. Writ denied.

C. M. Fickert, of San Francisco, and H. Hugh Sydenham, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Orrin J. Lowell, Dist. Atty., of Auburn, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of admission to bail. It appears from the petition in this matter that on or about the 28th day of February, 1924, W. C. Wilkins was convicted of the offense of having made and delivered a certain fictitious check with intent to defraud the county of Placer in the state of California. The check in question was as follows:

"The People's Bank 90–32.

"Commercial and Savings 12 No. ——.

"Sacramento, Cal., Aug. 30, 1922.

"Pay to the order of M. Stone (J. P. Roseville, $50.00, fifty & $^{00}/_{100}$ dollars.

"W. C. Wilkins.

"Indorsed on back: M. Stone, J. P."

After conviction, sentence was pronounced of imprisonment in the state prison, state of California, at San Quentin, for such period as might be provided by law. The conviction and sentence were had under the provisions of section 476a of the Penal Code, which section specifies that upon conviction imprisonment may be imposed in the county jail for not more than 1 year or in the state prison for not more than 14 years. Within due time after the imposition of sentence the petitioner took an appeal to this court, which is now pending, and thereupon applied to the trial court for admission to bail pending such appeal. This application was denied. The real question before this court upon this application is whether the order of the superior court denying admission to bail constitutes an abuse of discretion.

[1] No question of illness of the petitioner is presented nor any matters of an extraordinary character occurring since the denial of the petitioner's application for bail in the trial court are presented to us upon this application. No attempt is made to bring this case within the provisions of the law set forth in the cases of People v. Cornell, 28 Cal. App. 654, 153 Pac. 726; Ex parte Turner, 112 Cal. 627, 45 Pac. 571; People v. Perdue, 48 Cal. 552; People v. January, 70 Cal. 34, 11 Pac. 326; and a number of others which we need not enumerate, all holding that matters of an extraordinary nature must be shown before an appellate court will interfere with the determination of the trial court upon applications for bail after conviction. The law is well settled that "the discretion mentioned in the statute relating to the admission to bail is vested primarily in the trial court and the determination of that court should not be disturbed or ignored except in instances of manifest abuse." The petitioner in this case insists: First, that he is entitled to bail as a matter of right; secondly, that the denial of his application for bail by the trial court was a manifest abuse of discretion; and, thirdly, that this court has the right and that it should review the evidence to ascertain whether the lower court has or has not abused its discretionary power in denying bail.

Section 1272 of the Penal Code, in relation to the admission to bail reads as follows:

> "After conviction of an offense not punishable with death, a defendant who has appealed may be admitted to bail:
> "1. As a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing fine only.
> "2. As a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing imprisonment in cases of misdemeanor.
> "3. As a matter of discretion in all other cases."

[2] It is argued that, by reason of the fact that under the provisions of section 476a of the Penal Code the trial court is vested with the discretion as to the place of punishment when pronouncing sentence, and that, if the place of punishment is fixed in the county jail, the offense thereafter is known to the law as a misdemeanor and bail may be insisted upon as a matter of right, it follows as a necessary conclusion that, if the trial court fixes the place of imprisonment as the state penitentiary, and the offense thereafter in law is known as a felony, the same rule as to admission to bail after conviction applies, and that bail is still a matter of right and not a matter of discretion. To support this contention the appellant relies upon the case of Ex parte Hoge, 48 Cal. 3, wherein it is apparently held by Chief Justice Wallace, speaking for himself alone and not for the court, that in cases where a defendant has been convicted of the offense for which the court may thereafter, in its discretion, impose upon him a sentence for a felony or for a misdemeanor, he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of right. This conclusion is based upon the reasoning that the offense of which the defendant has been found guilty is the same in either case, and that the rights of the defendant are not to be adjudged or lessened by the exercise of the trial court of the discretion vested in it in such instances. With this reasoning we cannot agree. If the rights of the defendant are the same both before and after the imposition of sentence, we do not very well see how the Legislature could very well invest the trial court with the discretion conferred by the statute in question. It is for the very purpose of determining the rights of the defendant in such instances according to the character of the offense and all the attendant circumstances connected therewith that the discretion is vested in the trial court to take away from the defendant the privilege (if we may use that word) of being confined in a county jail and to sentence the defendant to a state prison. The statute, by its very terms, authorizes the trial court in its discretion to adjudge the status of the defendant according to the enormity of the offense committed by the defendant, and which, under the statute, calls for the exercise of the legal discretion of the trial court in order that suitable punishment may be meted out to offenders.

After such determination has been had, and the character of the offense has been fixed in the manner provided by law, we think that the rule governing admissions to bail in cases of other felonies is applicable to cases of felonies ascertained and determined under section 476a of the Penal Code.

[3] The petitioner next calls our attention to the case of People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 140, 131 Pac. 127, and insists that under the holding of this case the petitioner will undoubtedly be granted a new trial upon his appeal, and therefore he is entitled to bail. In response to this point, counsel for the people call our attention to certain stipulations contained in the transcript which, it is alleged, obviates the holding in the case of People v. Frey, supra. A cursory inspection of the transcript shows that, in order to determine the merits of the contending parties, this court must pass upon the legal sufficiency of the testimony when the petitioner's appeal is presented for determination. Pending that time and until the appeal is determined, the law is well settled that any one convicted of an offense is presumed to be guilty, and even where the question is only one of admission to bail, we do not think the rule is different and that we should weigh and consider the evidence to ascertain the legal sufficiency of the same to support the conviction. Upon the question of whether the testimony may be considered for the purpose of ascertaining whether the trial court has or has not abused its discretion in denying bail we content ourselves in this case with the statement that a cursory examination of the testimony shows that it is by no means certain that the holding of the case of People v. Frey, supra, is determinative of the issues that may be presented for consideration upon the petitioner's appeal now pending in this court.

In the case of Ex parte Smith, 89 Cal. 79, 26 Pac. 638, an application for a writ of habeas corpus to be admitted to bail pending appeal contained, among other reasons assigned for admission to bail, the following:

> "That the trial court committed errors of law that appear from the face of the record, and that the evidence at the trial was insufficient to justify a conviction."

The court refers to the case of Ex parte Smallman, 54 Cal. 35, as outlining the general character of facts necessary to exist upon which to base an exercise of discretion and admission to bail, and, also, of circumstances of an extraordinary character that must intervene to warrant the admission to bail of a person convicted of felony, and then holds as follows:

> "The petition in this case shows no such circumstances. We cannot, in this proceeding, examine into the alleged errors of law committed by the lower court, and thus prejudge the case before it comes before us upon its merits."

The application for bail was denied. If it be true, as contended by the petitioner, that the evidence in this case is not legally sufficient, as was contended in the Smith Case, were we to examine into the testimony and determine such fact we would simply be prejudging the defendant's appeal before the time prescribed by law, and also the method and manner when such questions may come before us and be properly adjudged. If this rule were adopted, then every appellant, the legality of whose conviction might be seriously or otherwise argued in an appellate court, would be entitled to bail and the discretion lodged by the Legislature in the trial court would become a nullity whether that discretion is abused or exercised with the greatest circumspection and precision.

As analogous to the questions presented upon this petition relative to a consideration of the evidence we may well consider the cases having to do with writs of habeas corpus for discharge after conviction. In the case of In re Graham et al., 74 Wis. 450, 43 N. W. 148, 17 Am. St. Rep. 174, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin having to do with this question decides the matter tersely as follows:

> "We deny the writs, for the reason that the error in the judgments does not render them void, or the imprisonment under them illegal, in that sense which entitles them to be discharged on a writ of habeas corpus. The judgments are doubtless erroneous, and would be reversed on writ of error [citing a number of cases]. But the judgments are not void. * * * The court had jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter or offense, but made a mistake in the judgment. For mere error, no matter how flagrant, the remedy is not by habeas corpus. The law is well settled in this court that on habeas corpus only jurisdictional defects are inquired into. The writ does not raise questions of errors in law or irregularities in the proceedings. * * *"

In Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, quoting from page 162 (19 Pac. 277, 11 Am. St. Rep. 251), the Supreme Court of this state, upon application for a writ of habeas corpus, uses the following language:

> "When jurisdiction depends on a fact that is litigated in a suit, and is adjudged in favor of that party who avers jurisdiction, then the question of jurisdiction is judicially decided, and the judgment record is conclusive evidence of jurisdiction until set aside, or reversed by a direct proceeding."

In the recent case of Ex parte Drew, 188 Cal. 717, 207 Pac. 249, the Supreme Court of this state again held upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus that:

> "The scope of inquiry upon a writ of review extends only to the question of the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment sought to be reviewed."

Again, in the case of In re Selowsky, 189 Cal. 331, 208 Pac. 99, upon an application for discharge on a writ of habeas corpus it was decided that:

> "In a proceeding in habeas corpus to obtain release [of petitioner] from custody under a judgment of contempt, the only inquiry that can be made is with reference to the jurisdiction of the court which made the judgment of which the imprisonment is a part."

There is no question as to the jurisdiction of the court in the instant case. It is only the errors of law committed by the court and the sufficiency or insufficiency of the testimony to support the conviction which, of course, again goes to the correctness or incorrectness of the order of the trial court in granting or denying a new trial that are urged in this application. These questions do not touch the subject of jurisdiction, and were we to consider them now would be in effect to decide the defendant's appeal upon petition to be admitted to bail.

We do not find any reason for holding that the trial court abused its discretion in denying bail, and it therefore follows that the petitioner's application to be admitted to bail by this court must be and the same is hereby denied.

TETENMAN v. EPSTEIN et al. (KAUFFMAN et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3936.)

1. Mortgages 🔑608½—Findings held insufficient to sustain judgment declaring deed absolute to be mortgage.

Finding that deed absolute from mortgagor to mortgagee was intended to convey mortgaged property in satisfaction of mortgagee's claim, and that neither party at time knew the property was greatly enhanced in value, held insufficient to sustain judgment declaring deed a mortgage only.

2. Mortgages 🔑32(2)—Court without power to hold deed intended as absolute conveyance a mortgage.

Where deed from mortgagor to mortgagee was intended as conveyance of equity of redemption and not as security, court is without power to hold same a mortgage.

3. Contracts 🔑93(5) — Equity will freely grant rescission for mistake of parties.

Equity will freely grant rescission of contract for mistake of both parties as to material collateral matter, vital to and forming an essential part of contract.

4. Reformation of instruments ⚷1—Reformation of contract presupposes same does not express intent of parties.

Reformation of contract presupposes same does not express intent of parties.

5. Mortgages ⚷32(1)—Mere inadequacy of consideration will not warrant finding deed absolute was mortgage.

In the absence of fraud or oppression, mere inadequacy of consideration alone does not warrant finding deed absolute was intended as mortgage.

6. Mortgages ⚷297—Fraud of mortgagee in securing mortgagor's deed of property in satisfaction of debt held not established.

That mortgagors, without knowledge of their legal rights, gave mortgagee deed to mortgaged property in satisfaction of debt at time when neither party knew that same had increased in value and when supposed value was less than the mortgagor's debt, held insufficient to establish fraud.

7. Sales ⚷36—Seller's ignorance of true value of property sold not ground for setting aside sale.

Under Civ. Code, § 1577, relating to rescission of contract for mistake consisting of "belief in the existence of a thing material to the contract which does not exist," mere ignorance of the true value of property by one selling it is not a ground for setting aside sale.

8. Mortgages ⚷38(2)—Evidence must be clear to warrant holding deed absolute was mortgage.

To justify decree that deed absolute was intended as mortgage evidence must be clear and free from doubt.

9. Mortgages ⚷297—Deed of equity of redemption not presumed fraudulently obtained.

Until it appears that execution of deed of equity of redemption by mortgagor to mortgagee was traceable to the inequality of the positions of the parties, no basis exists for the presumption that mortgagee used some form of oppression to obtain it nor for application of the equity rule designed to especially protect right to redeem.

10. Mortgages ⚷297—Statute declaring one, acquiring property by mistake, involuntary trustee, held inapplicable.

Civ. Code, § 2224, declaring one who gains a thing by mistake an involuntary trustee, is without application to an action to declare a deed absolute a mortgage, in absence of any showing that the same was the result of a mistake within sections 1577, 1578.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Aaron Tetenman against B. Epstein and Mrs. B. Epstein, wherein Mitchell Kauffman and Annie Kauffman intervened. Judgment for interveners, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. F. Gerecht and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. N. Goodwin, of Los Angeles, Roland G. Swaffield, of Long Beach, and Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the interveners against the defendants decreeing that interveners were the owners and entitled to possession of certain lots in Orange county, and that a deed thereof, executed by interveners, constituted a mortgage to secure payment to Epstein of a promissory note and taxes, aggregating $461.17.

Plaintiff instituted an action praying specific performance of a contract in the form of an option given by Epstein to plaintiff upon the property in suit on January 5, 1921. Defendant Epstein answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and alleging that his wife was not a party to the option, and that she refused to sign a deed of conveyance, and that plaintiff had obtained such option by means of the concealment of material facts regarding the value of the property. Thereupon the Kauffmans intervened, claiming ownership of the same property, which they alleged consisted of four lots, numbered 15, 16, 17, and 18, in block 802, of the Vista del Mar tract.

Upon the trial the interveners, under the direction of the court, filed an amended complaint in intervention to conform to the proof, and therein alleged, among other facts, that Epstein had paid taxes amounting to $162; that the reasonable market value of the lots on November 22, 1920, was $2,000, but that neither of the parties knew at that time of their increased value, and that this increase was caused by the discovery of oil in the immediate vicinity; that interveners did not learn of such discovery or of the advancement in value until just before the commencement of this suit. Ownership in the interveners is also alleged, with the prayer that they be adjudged the owners, and that the deed executed by them to Epstein be declared a mortgage to secure the payment of principal and interest due on the loan, and taxes paid by Epstein.

The trial court rendered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing; that the deed executed by interveners conveying the four lots mentioned be declared a mortgage and a lien upon all of said lots to secure the payment to B. Epstein of the sum of $461.17, representing the principal and interest on the note, and the taxes.

The principal contention of appellants is that neither the allegations of interveners' amended complaint, nor the findings, contain sufficient facts to legally justify the judgment rendered. In so far as the findings affect the controversy between the Epsteins and the Kauffmans, they recite that all of the allegations contained in paragraphs numbered 1 to 4, inclusive, of interveners' amended complaint are true, which amounts to a finding affirmatively upon each fact so alleged. The essential facts so found are that the defendant B. Epstein loaned to interveners $250 upon the promissory note of the latter, secured by mortgage on the four lots, and payable seven months thereafter; that defendant demanded payment when the note was overdue; that interveners were poor and without funds, and unable to pay said amount and were ignorant and unfamiliar with the law relative to foreclosure and the right of redemption; that interveners were foreigners, unable to speak English perfectly, and that they thought that by virtue of having executed said mortgage they had placed themselves in Epstein's power; that while in such state of mind Epstein proposed to them that they give him a grant deed to all the lots in full satisfaction of their indebtedness, and that believing that the value of the lots did not exceed the amount of the note, on November 22, 1920, they executed and delivered to Epstein a grant deed to the entire property, which Epstein accepted believing that the value of the lots did not exceed the amount due him; that the reasonable market value of said property on November 22, 1920, was at least $2,000, but that none of the parties at such time knew this fact; that the increased value was due to the discovery of oil in the vicinity, but that interveners were not aware of such discovery until just prior to the commencement of this action; and that Epstein did not execute or file a satisfaction of said mortgage until January 10, 1921, at which time said lots were of the value of at least $3,000.

[1, 2] Based upon these facts alone, we are unable to perceive any theory upon which the judgment can be upheld. The trial court adjudged that the deed was a mortgage, and yet there is no finding that it was the intent of either of the parties that the instrument was given as security for the payment of any obligation or the performance of any act. On the contrary, it was expressly found that Epstein proposed that interveners execute a deed to all four lots, and that they "executed and delivered to said Epstein a grant deed conveying said four lots." Upon such a finding, the deed not being given as security, but as a conveyance of the equity of redemption, it was obviously not within the power of a trial court to make over into a mortgage the instrument intended by the parties who executed it to be a deed. Hochstein v. Berghauser, 123 Cal. 681, 56 Pac. 547. When the facts warrant, a deed conveying the equity of redemption, so called, will be set aside, leaving the mortgagee still possessed of his mortgage security and the court may decree that the debt represented thereby be satisfied in the usual manner from the mortgaged premises. But the court in the instant case has not set the deed aside and revived a mortgage of February 4, 1919, the foreclosure of which was threatened before the deed was executed, but has declared that the deed itself is a mortgage, which, as we have indicated, the findings do not warrant.

[3-5] In effect the intervention is for reformation. The decree rendered grants that relief. The complaint in intervention is not to rescind the deed of November 22, 1920. Had such rescission been sought and decreed, the deed might possibly have been canceled and the original mortgage would then remain as a lien upon the property in question. Equity will freely grant rescission where there has been a mistake of both parties as to a collateral matter which was vital to the contract and formed an essential element thereof. Johnson v. Withers, 9 Cal. App. 52, 98 Pac. 42; Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 112 Pac. 1094. But in contrast with rescission, reformation of a contract presupposes that it does not express the true intent of the parties, which intent being other than that stated in the agreement is substituted by apt language, provided by the decree of court. Even though the distinction between actions for reformation and for the rescission of an instrument were to be disregarded (and this is a fundamental difference and not one merely of form), still, under the authority of De Martin v. Phelan, 115 Cal. 538, 47 Pac. 356, 56 Am. St. Rep. 115, in the absence of fraud or oppression the mere inadequacy of consideration could not alone serve as a basis for granting the intervener relief.

[6] From the record before us it is impossible to ascertain upon what legal theory the judgment was rendered. Some facts are contained in the findings which might be regarded as elements proper for consideration in the granting of relief where the deed had been obtained by fraud, or by mutual mistake, or under coercion; yet the facts fall far short of establishing constructive fraud, which is negatived by the ignorance of all parties as to valuations at the time the deed was made, and we do not understand the respondents to rely upon this ground. It is true that the court finds the Kauffmans were not aware of their legal rights, and, particularly, of the existence of an equity of redemption, and that they believed that Epstein could do what he pleased with their property; but this is quite insufficient as a finding that Epstein or any one in his behalf defrauded them, or exercised any undue influence, or compulsion, to force them to sign the deed.

[7] In connection with the possible ground of mistake, which seems to be principally relied upon by respondents, the only material fact concerning which that claim could be asserted is that the parties believed the lots in question to be of a value far less than their actual value at the time the transaction was consummated. The findings of the trial court which he have mentioned do not permit consideration of the claim that there was any mistake as to the contents or legal effect of the instrument itself. All of the parties knew that it was a deed and not a mortgage. It appears that in the beginning Epstein loaned the interveners $250, and that after they had failed to pay taxes for some time the property was about to be sold on that account, and he paid these items. The whole amount due at the time of the trial was found to be $461.17, and Epstein and the interveners at the date of the deed believed the lots to be worth about $100; whereas, they were in fact worth $500 each. The court found that the change in values was the result of the discovery of oil in the vicinity of the premises. Respondent cites section 1577 of the Civil Code, to the effect that mistake may consist of "belief in the existence of a thing material to the contract whch does not exist," etc.; also section 2224, Civil Code, which provides that one who gains a thing by mistake is an involuntary trustee of the thing gained for the benefit of the person who would have had it. If the mere ignorance as to the true value of property by one who sells it, where the sale is for a sum considerably less than its value, were a ground to set aside a deed, no transaction would be final until the validity thereof had been determined by a suit to quiet title. We are cited to no case holding that such ignorance or erroneous belief as to the mere value of property amounts to mistake of fact as defined in section 1577, Civil Code. In Hannah v. Steinman, supra, our Supreme Court, construing certain sections of the Civil Code, including section 1577, said:

> "It cannot be doubted that plaintiff would not have consented to the lease but for this mistake. The principal question in this connection is whether it was 'material to the contract' within the meaning of those words as used in our statute. That it was material in the sense that but for it plaintiff would not have considered for a moment the making of the contract we have seen, but that clearly is not enough. The same thing might be said as to mistaken expectations of both plaintiff and defendant as to plaintiff's ability to obtain tenants for the building he proposed to erect on the leased land, and, of course, a mistake in that regard would not furnish ground for rescission, although plaintiff never would have entered into the contract but for such mistaken belief."

We have said that a contract may be rescinded where there has been a mutual mistake as to some collateral fact the existence of which constitutes the essence of the agreement. For example, in the case last mentioned, the mutual ignorance of the parties of the fact that the lot leased by the plaintiff had just been placed within the fire limits so that wooden buildings could not be erected thereon was held to be a mutual mistake of such character as to justify rescission of a lease contract, where the parties understood that the lot was to be used for the erection of wooden buildings. In the instant case the existence or nonexistence of oil was not considered by the parties at any time. It cannot be said, nor was it found, that they, under the mistaken belief that oil did not exist in the vicinity of these lots, made this contract, and that such belief served as an inducement, much less constituted an element thereof. The most that can be said is that they gave no consideration or thought to the possibility of oil being located near the premises.

[8] The general rule is that clear evidence, free from doubt, is necessary to establish that the real intention of the parties was to execute a mortgage, in order to justify a decree to that effect where the deed is absolute in form. Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22, 26; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 58, 30 Pac. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; Holmes v. Warren, 145 Cal. 457, 78 Pac. 954.

[9] The respondent insists that a different rule prevails where a mortgagor has deeded his equity of redemption to the mortgagee than that applied to other transactions. Without doubt this is true where the theory of the common-law mortgage obtains. There is no question that the right to redeem is one generally especially protected by courts of equity. This is upon the theory that the mortgagee having received a common-law mortgage occupies a position superior to that of the mortgagor so that the parties cannot be said to have dealt with one another upon a basis of equality, hence for the mortgagee to retain the benefit of a deed from the mortgagor of the equity of redemption it must be shown that no undue influence, no fraud, and no compulsion operated to cause the mortgagor to execute the instrument of conveyance. In all such cases the advantage allowed the mortgagor in court, which in some instances has been held to amount to a presumption against the mortgagee, springs from the fact that the mortgagee has the mortgagor in his power through having obtained control of the mortgaged premises. The opinion in De Martin v. Phelan, supra, elucidates the fundamental principle involved in this phase of the discussion, and establishes for this state a different rule from that prevailing in some other jurisdictions, because of the fact that here the mortgagee secures only a lien upon the mortgaged premises, and does not receive title or possession thereof. Until it appears that the execution of the deed was traceable to the inequality of the positions of the parties, no basis exists for the presumption that the mortgagee used some form of oppression to obtain it. In the case at bar, as we have shown, the findings negative the idea that the deed was executed as a result of fraud; they also are inconsistent with the conclusion that coercion or oppression caused the interveners to make an absolute conveyance. It is expressly found that the parties all believed the property to be worth $100 per lot, or a total of $400. Had this been true, Epstein would have received less than his debt. It is found that the Kauffmans did not learn that the lots were more valuable than they had supposed until just before the bringing of this suit. The conclusion is unavoidable from these findings that when the deed was executed the interveners were satisfied to secure the cancellation of their debt in that way. Such being the facts, the underlying reason for the rule favoring the mortgagor's right to redeem has no application if the mortgagor contracted freely; no substantial argument is apparent for limiting his power to contract and relieve himself of a debt through the transfer of a property right.

But aside from these considerations it will be noted that the actions cited by respondent, and other cases in which courts of equity have shown a willingness to set aside deeds made by mortgagors conveying their equities of redemption to mortgagees, have been suits to rescind or to redeem; proceedings in which the mortgagor, though tardy, has either come forward and tendered the amount necessary for redemption, or has sought rescission on the ground of fraud or undue influence or advantage taken by the mortgagee over the mortgagor.

[10] Of course, section 2224 of the Civil Code can have no application to the facts of this case, except it be first established that the deed was made as a result of mistake, as provided in sections 1577 and 1578 of the Civil Code.

The judgment is reversed.

LEE v. NATHAN. (Civ. 2650.)

1. Master and servant ⟹302(1)—Master liable for servant's negligence in business.

If master is to be held responsible for negligence of servant it must appear that in doing act out of which negligence arises servant is representing master at the time or engaged in his business or in some act incidental thereto.

2. Master and servant ⟹302(6)—Master not responsible for negligence of servant pursuing own ends.

Master is not responsible for negligence of servant while latter is pursuing his own ends even though injury complained of could not have been committed without facilities afforded to servant by his relation to master.

3. Master and servant ⟹302(6)—Automobile owner not liable for negligence of driver on own errand.

Where, at time of collision, servant was driving defendant's automobile, for sole purpose of conveying himself home from garage where car was kept, defendant was not liable, even though on other occasions he had permitted such use of the car.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. O. Busick, Judge.

Action by King H. Lee against Charles P. Nathan and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Reversed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellant.

P. G. West, of Sacramento, for respondent.

YOUNG, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Charles P. Nathan and his codefendant Leland R. Apperson in an action to recover for the alleged damage to plaintiff's automobile as the result of a collision between plaintiff's said automobile and a Packard automobile owned by defendant Nathan, and driven by his codefendant Apperson. The defendant Nathan appeals, and the only point urged by him for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to support a certain finding of the trial court to the effect that at the time of the collision the defendant Apperson was driving the Packard automobile as the agent of the defendant Charles P. Nathan. The testimony touching this phase of the case was given by appellant, Apperson, and one George Sellinger, Jr., all called as witnesses by plaintiff.

It appears from the evidence that Apperson had been in the employ of appellant as receiving clerk in appellant's department store in Sacramento for many years. In addition to this employment, for some three or four years prior to the time of the collision, Apperson had also been driving appellant's automobile when called upon by him to do so. Appellant also looked to Apperson to see that the automobile was kept in running order. The automobile was kept in a garage on I street, between Fifth and Sixth streets. Appellant did not himself drive the car, nor did any member of his family. It was quite usual for Apperson to drive appellant to his home at 2027 F street to lunch at noon, and also to dinner in the evening, and frequently, especially in pleasant weather, Apperson would, after getting his evening meal downtown or at his home, return to appellant's home and take him driving around town for an hour or so. He also frequently drove him to club meetings in the evening, and to the theater. On several occasions when out late at night in the car after attending club meeting or the theater, appellant directed Apperson to drive by the garage where the car was kept and get one of the employees of the garage to go with them to take the car back to the garage after first taking appellant home, and then taking Apperson to his home at 3019 Fifth avenue, in Oak Park, in the south part of the city of Sacramento. All the witnesses agree that this was done only when appellant was out as late as 10:30 or 11 o'clock at night. On other occasions when out riding in the evening Apperson would, afer taking appellant home, go to the garage and leave the car, or would himself ask one of the boys at the garage to go home with him and bring the car back to the garage. Appellant testified that he did not know of Apperson getting the boy on his own account to go home with him, and that he had never given him permission to do so. There is no testimony contrary to this statement.

On the evening of the accident Apperson had taken appellant for a ride and had left him at his home about 8 o'clock. He then drove the car to the garage. Apperson testifies that "after I saw the boy was not busy, I asked him to jump in and take me home." The boy got into the car and Apperson was driving in the direction of his home when the collision resulting in this action occurred at Twenty-First and M streets. It is conceded by appellant that there is sufficient conflict in the evidence to justify the finding of the trial court to the effect that plaintiff's car was injured as the result of Apperson's negligence.

[1] If the master is to be held responsible for the negligence of his servant, it must appear that in doing the act out of which the negligence arises the servant is representing the master at the time, and engaged in his business or in some act incidental thereto. Hall v. Puente Oil Company (Cal. App.) 191 Pac. 39; Higgins v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 156 N. Y. 75, 50 N. E. 500, 66 Am. St. Rep. 537; Chamberlain v. California Edison Co., 167 Cal. 500, 140 Pac. 25; Gousse v. Lowe, 41 Cal. App. 715, 183 Pac. 295; Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 Pac. 697.

[2] The master is not responsible for the negligence of his servant while the servant is pursuing his own ends, even though the injury complained of could not have been committed without the facilities afforded to the servant by his relation to his master. (26 Cyc., p. 1536; Stephenson v. S. P., 93 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 234, 15 L. R. A. 475, 27 Am. St. Rep. 223; Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Car Company, 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 Pac. 697; Kish v. California State Automobile Association (Cal. Sup.) 112 Pac. 27.

In Kish v. California State Automobile Association, above cited, it is held that—

> "In determining whether or not a particular act was done in the course of the servant's employment, the act of the servant must be connected directly or indirectly with the business of the employer, and be in furtherance of the object for which the servant was employed. In other words, if the act is for the benefit of the employer, either directly or incidentally, the act is within the general scope of the servant's employment, but if the act performed is not in any way connected with the service for which he is employed, but for his own particular and peculiar purpose, then the act is not within the scope of the employment."

[3] There is no conflict in the evidence as to the fact that Apperson was at the time of the accident driving the car for the sole purpose of conveying himself home from the garage where the car was kept. On the evening of the accident, the main object for which Apperson was employed was to take his employer riding. When the employer had finished his ride and had gotten out of the car at his home, the main object of Apperson's employment for that day had therefore been accomplished, and there then remained nothing further for him to do in the business of his employer as driver on that day, other than to take the automobile to the garage where it was to be housed for the night. When Apperson reached the garage with the car, there then remained nothing further for him to do in the master's business. He was thereafter his own master and was free to go home or elsewhere according to his own peculiar pleasure or inclination, and, if he chose to go home, he was free to go by whatever means he elected. His use of his employer's automobile in going home did not spring from any duty that he owed to his employer. His employer could not be benefited directly or incidentally thereby. Respondent argues that from the fact that appellant had at times authorized Apperson to have a boy from the garage take him home that it can be inferred that a course of practice had been established from which it can be fairly implied that Apperson's use of the car on the evening of the accident was authorized by his employer. We think that no such inference can be reasonably drawn. Even if it is conceded that such an inference can be drawn, Apperson was nevertheless using the car at the time of the accident solely for his own convenience and accommodation, and the authority conferred by the master amounted only to the master's permission that he might use the car for his own ends and purposes, and when so using it he was not acting within the scope of his employment, and hence his master is not liable for his negligence. In the opinion of the court in the case of Hall v. Puente Oil Co., supra, it is said:

> "We are unable to draw any distinction between a case where the use of the car by a servant for his own purpose is without the master's consent and that where such use is permissive."

It is our opinion that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that Leland R. Apperson was driving the Packard automobile at the time of the accident as the agent of the defendant Charles P. Nathan. We therefore think that the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

DAVIS-HELLER-PEARCE CO. v. RAMONT et al. (Civ. 2757.)

1. Process ⟹96(1)—Affidavit for publication by disinterested stranger familiar with facts sufficient.

As Code Civ. Proc. § 412, does not designate person by whom affidavit for publication of summons shall be made, affidavit of disinterested stranger to action, who is familiar with facts, is sufficient.

2. Process ⟹96(4)—Affidavit for publication on information and belief as to defendant's place of residence sufficient.

Affidavit for publication of summons on information and belief as to defendant's place of residence in another state is sufficient, where affiant shows due diligence in acquiring information.

3. Process ⟹96(3)—Affidavit for publication held to show existence of cause of action by reference to complaint, though latter was not verified.

Affidavit for publication of summons, stating that affiant "has read the complaint * * * and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information or belief," sufficiently referred to and adopted allegations of complaint, and hence showed existence of cause of action, though complaint was not verified.

4. Affidavits ⟹17—Chief test of sufficiency is whether indictment for perjury may be sustained if false.

Chief test of sufficiency of affidavit is whether it is so clear and certain that indictment for perjury may be sustained on it if false.

5. Process ⟹96(4)—Affidavit for publication on nonresident need not state that no certificate of residence has been filed.

Affidavit for publication of summons on ground that defendant resides out of state need not state that no certificate of residence has been filed, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1163, where such service is sought on ground that defendant cannot be found within state after due diligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by the Davis-Heller-Pearce Company against W. F. Ramont and George Biaggi, for whom R. J. Biaggi was substituted. From order denying substituted defendant's motion to quash service of summons on defendant George Biaggi and set aside default and judgment against him, substituted defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William R. Biaggi, H. A. Gabriel, and George W. Waldorf, all of San Jose, for appellant.

J. M. Walthall and E. H. Zion, both of Modesto, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from an order denying the motion of defendant R. J. Biaggi, substituted as defendant for George Biaggi, "to quash the service of summons" on the latter and "to set aside and vacate the default and judgment against" him. The court ordered service of summons by publication upon George Biaggi. In lieu of such publication, he was personally served with a copy of the summons and complaint in the state of Arizona, which service, under the provisions of section 413 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post office." The only question presented by the appeal is whether the affidavit for publication is sufficient. The affidavit reads as follows:

"L. L. Dennett, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is an attorney at law, residing at Modesto, in the county of Stanislaus and state of California; that he is personally acquainted with W. R. Biaggi, the brother of George Biaggi, defendant above named; that he was the attorney for W. F. Ramont in a suit in the superior court of the county of Stanislaus and state of California, in which George Biaggi was plaintiff and W. F. Ramont was defendant, and W. R. Biaggi was attorney for said defendant, which said case is now on appeal from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Stanislaus and state of California; that he has corresponded with W. R. Biaggi, the brother of said George Biaggi, and was informed by him that said George Biaggi was out of the state in a hospital, and that the summons and complaint in the above-entitled action was sent to the sheriff of the county of Santa Clara, state of California, which was the county of the former residence of said defendant, George Biaggi, with instructions to serve the said summons and complaint upon said George Biaggi, but that the said summons and copy of summons and complaint were returned by the said sheriff with a statement by H. A. De Lacy, undersheriff, that said George Biaggi is in a hospital at Tucson, Ariz., and that the said sheriff was so informed by the brother of said George Biaggi, to wit, by W. R. Biaggi, and that affiant is informed and believes, and so states the fact to be, that said George Biaggi does not reside in the said state of California, but now resides out of the state of California, and that his present address is Tucson, Ariz.

"Affiant further states that he has read the complaint on file herein, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true."

[1] It is contended that the affidavit was insufficient because, in so far as appears from the record, it was made by a stranger to the action. It is only required that the necessary facts appear "by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof." Code Civ. Proc. § 412; Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 655, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732. In Gardner v. Steadman, 31 Cal. App. 447, 160 Pac. 834, it is said:

> "Section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the affidavit of merits upon motion for change of place of trial must be filed by the defendant. * * * We see no reason for holding that an affidavit of merits may not be made by any person on behalf of the defendant who is sufficiently familiar with the facts of the case to make the same."

Since the statute does not designate the person by whom the affidavit shall be made, it would be illogical to hold that the affidavit of a disinterested stranger to an action, who is familiar with the facts, is not entitled to as much weight as that of an interested party.

[2] It is urged that affiant's statement that George Biaggi's residence was in Tucson, Ariz, was insufficient because made on information and belief. The contention is without merit. Rue v. Quinn, supra. As a general rule it would be impracticable to state the place of residence of a person in another state except on information and belief. Affiant showed due diligence in acquiring information upon which to base his belief.

> "Oftentimes affiant's knowledge of matters stated in his affidavit must of necessity rest upon information derived from others, and where this is the case it is generally sufficient if he aver that such matters are true to the best of his knowledge and belief." 2 C. J. 355.

[3] It is argued that the affidavit does not show that a cause of action existed against George Biaggi. The complaint was not verified. Affiant, however, "states that he has read the complaint on file herein, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true." The only allegation of the complaint relative to George Biaggi which is stated on information and belief is to the effect that he had or claimed some interest in the land described in the complaint. In Ligare v. California S. R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 610, 612, 18 Pac. 777, 779, it is said:

> "The affidavit could refer to any document on file, and adopt its contents. In such case, the oath to the affidavit is an oath to the truth of the document referred to. The affidavit here did refer to the original complaint and adopt its contents, and this complaint stated a cause of action. The fact that a cause of action existed, therefore, appeared from the affidavit. And, as above shown, it made no difference that the document which was then performing the functions of a complaint was not verified."

[4] Appellant urges, however, that the affidavit "does not refer to and adopt the allegations of the complaint." It is not apparent in what manner the affiant could have more certainly referred to and adopted the averments of the complaint without setting them out at length. If the facts stated in the complaint are not true, then the affiant committed perjury.

> "The chief test of the sufficiency of an affidavit is whether it is so clear and certain that an indictment for perjury may be sustained on it if false." 2 C. J. 348.

[5] The affidavit does not show that George Biaggi had not filed the certificate of residence provided for by section 1163 of the Civil Code. The statute, however, requires such showing only where service is sought to be made upon a person by publication upon the ground that he cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state. The order for publication of summons is based upon the ground, as stated therein, "that the said defendant resides out of the state, and is now a resident of Tucson, Ariz." It was not necessary, therefore, for the affidavit to state that no certificate of residence had been filed.

The motion to vacate the judgment appears to be without merit from either legal or equitable considerations. George Biaggi was personally served on the 19th day of September, 1921. His default was not entered until February 1, 1922. Judgment was thereupon entered, and pursuant thereto the property in controversy was sold by the sheriff February 25, 1922. December 30, 1922, notice was filed stating that the motion would be made on the 8th day of January, 1923.

The order is affirmed.

BITSEKAS v. PARECHANIAN et al.
(Civ. 2733.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 6, 1924.)

1. Evidence ⚷588—Inconsistencies held not to stamp testimony as inherently unbelievable.

Inconsistencies between statements in deposition and testimony held not to stamp testimony as inherently unbelievable.

2. Trial ⚷140(1)—For trial court to analyze, sift, and weigh testimony.

Where evidence of witness was inconsistent and some of it probably untrue, it was for the trial court to analyze, sift, and weigh the testimony, and to determine whether any of it was entitled to credence.

3. Witnesses ⚷238(1)—Adverse party called for cross-examination under statute may be examined by own counsel as to matters not brought out in cross-examination.

Defendants called for cross-examination by plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, could be examined by their own counsel as their own witnesses regarding matters pertinent to case which were not brought out by cross-examination by counsel for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by John Bitsekas against M. Parechanian, alias, etc., and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Collins & Collins and B. M. Benson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of the defendant Parechanian, brought this action to set aside a deed executed by the latter to the defendant Sarkisian, conveying a half interest in a tract of 40 acres of land situated in Kings county, on the ground that said deed of conveyance was the result of a fraudulent conspiracy between the two defendants to prevent the plaintiff from securing satisfaction of a judgment previously obtained by plaintiff and against Parechanian in the superior court of Fresno county for the sum of $2,153.90.

According to the complaint, the plaintiff brought an action against Parechanian in the above-mentioned superior court, and on June 19, 1921, was awarded judgment for the amount above stated; that execution upon said judgment was issued on the 13th day of September, 1921, and the writ thereupon placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county of Fresno for execution, and said writ returned unsatisfied; that thereafter, and on the 13th day of October, 1921, "a similar writ of execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the County of Kings, * * * for execution, and that said writ has likewise been returned unsatisfied." The complaint, in appropriate legal nomenclature, alleges the facts constituting the alleged fraud at the bottom of the transaction climaxing in the transfer of the property above referred to by Parechanian to Sarkisian, and charges that said transfer was the result of a conspiracy between the said two defendants fraudulently to prevent plaintiff from securing satisfaction of his judgment against Parechanian; that said transfer was made and executed at a date subsequent to the date of the entry of said judgment, to wit, on the 29th day of June, 1921, and that the same was made without valuable or any consideration; that said Parechanian, by making said transfer and putting out of his possession all other property belonging to him, became insolvent and "rendered himself incapable of paying said indebtedness," or "execution proof."

The relief asked for is that the deed of conveyance be adjudged and declared fraudulent and void, and that the land thereby purporting to have been conveyed be adjudged subject to the lien of the plaintiff's judgment against Parechanian and the "writ of execution" thereupon issued.

After their demurrer to the complaint on the general ground was overruled, the defendants jointly answered the plaintiff's pleading by specifically denying all it has to say of material importance concerning the transaction.

The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury.

The court found that the conveyance in question was made by Parechanian to Sarkisian after the obligation of Parechanian to the plaintiff arose, but before said obligation had been reduced to judgment; that at the time said conveyance was made and consummated said Sarkisian did not know that the said defendant Parechanian was indebted to the plaintiff in this action or was under any obligation whatever to plaintiff; that said conveyance was made by Parechanian to Sarkisian for the consideration of $10,000, paid by the latter to the former; that, at the time of the making of said conveyance, there was a mortgage incumbrance on the property so conveyed, given to secure a promissory note for the sum of $7,500, which mortgage incumbrance and obligation the said Sarkisian assumed and agreed to pay as part of the consideration for said transfer and conveyance; "that said sum of $10,000 was paid by the said Sarkisian to the said Parechanian by the payment in cash of the sum of $1,500, a part of which money was paid prior to the date of said conveyance, and a part thereof after the date of said conveyance, but prior to the commencement of this action, and the remainder of said sum of $10,000 was paid by the delivery to the said Kasbar Parechanian by the said defendant Sarkisian of a promissory note held by the said Sarkisian against the said Parechanian for the sum of $8,500, which said promissory note had theretofore been given to the said Sarkisian by the said Parechanian as part payment of the purchase of his said one-half interest in said described lands from the said Sarkisian; that said sale and conveyance of said land was made for a valuable consideration, to wit, for the consideration of $13,750 (?); that said conveyance was made in good faith and with no intent on the part of the said defendants or either of them to defraud the plaintiff."

The conclusions of law and the judgment harmonize with the findings, and are in favor of the defendants.

The plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon a record prepared according to the alternative method.

The points made by the plaintiff are that the findings are not sufficiently supported and that the court committed prejudicial error by allowing certain evidence to be received over the objections of plaintiff.

[1, 2] The defendants, as we understand from the record, are Armenians, and each in testifying expressed himself in broken English. Theirs was the principal testimony introduced in support of the averments of the complaint, the plaintiff having called them to the witness stand under the authority of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure for examination or "cross-examination." Their testimony supports the findings of the court as to the facts and circumstances of the transaction culminating in the execution of the conveyance by Parechanian to Sarkisian. Indeed, the findings of the court faithfully follow their testimony in the main. It is therefore unnecessary to detail herein their testimony as they gave it under cross-examination and direct examination by the counsel for the respective parties. It is true that the testimony of these witnesses appeared to be inconsistent in some particulars with declarations they made previously to the trial and while their depositions to be used in the trial of this case were being taken. Whether these inconsistencies were due to the fact that the witnesses, who are foreigners, apparently uneducated, and with but little experience in the use of the English language, were unable to grasp clearly the significance of the questions propounded to them, or because the several transactions to which they testified did not occur as they sought to make it appear that they occurred, it is difficult for a court of review to determine. Counsel for the plaintiff seem to assume that the very fact of the inconsistencies to which we have referred is sufficient to stamp their testimony as inherently unbelievable. This is, however, not a sound assumption. It may be that there were some statements made by the witnesses that were not strictly in accord with the truth, but it does not necessarily follow that, because the testimony of a witness may not be consistent in all its parts, or that there may be some particulars as to which he may have departed from the truth, the testimony of such witness is to be held earmarked as intrinsically untruthful. It was for the trial court in this case to analyze, sift, and weigh the testimony according to those tests which are peculiarly available to trial courts and to determine whether, in the main, the testimony of such witnesses is entitled to credence and is sufficient to justify findings upon the vital issues either one way or the other, and where this is done upon evidence, which, upon its face, is sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial judge as to the facts, such findings are conclusive upon reviewing courts. It is true that the fact of the transfer of the property by Parechanian after the plaintiff's cause of action arose against him might properly be considered a suspicious circumstance upon the question of the good faith of the transaction, so far as said defendant was concerned. But it was for the trial court to determine whether said circumstance did or did not weigh against or detract from the probative value of the testimony of both defendants, not contradicted by an affirmative showing, or contradicted only in so far as the apparent inconsistencies in their testimony might be regarded as contradictory thereof, to the effect that the transfer was made in good faith and upon the payment by Sarkisian to Parechanian, as a consideration for the conveyance, the sum of $13,750 (or $10,000) for the latter's interest in the property, the greater part of which consideration was not in cash but in a promissory note given Sarkisian by Parechanian as in part payment for the interest in the land which the former had previously conveyed to the latter.

[3] Counsel for the appellant, in the cross-examination of the defendants, under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, called the attention of each to his deposition taken prior to the trial and asked if he had not given certain testimony which was read by counsel from said deposition to the witness. The purpose of this cross-examination was to show that the declarations of the witnesses made then were in conflict with certain portions of the testimony of said witness given at the trial. On examination of the defendants by their counsel, each was asked if he had given certain other testimony at the time of the taking of his deposition regarding the transactions involved herein, reading the same to the witness. To this examination counsel for the plaintiff objected on the ground that it was "not proper cross-examination," in that the part of the depositions as to which counsel for the defendants proposed to question the defendants was not pertinent to those portions of the depositions concerning which counsel for the plaintiff examined the defendants. It is true that several questions were asked by counsel for the defendants as to certain statements made by the defendants when their depositions were taken that had no direct connection with those portions of their depositions about which counsel for the plaintiff examined them, still a considerable portion of their depositions brought out by the examination of counsel for the defendants was pertinent and was repeated by the defendants in their testimony in the trial. As seen, the defendants were called for cross-examination by the plaintiff and when turned over to the attorney for the defendants for examination the latter in examining them had the right to question them concerning any matter as to which they had testified in the cross-examination. But we go further and say that we know of no reason why the attorney for the defendants should not have been permitted at that time to make the defendants their own witnesses and question them regarding other matters pertinent to the case which were not brought out by their examination by counsel for the plaintiff.

We have given the case full consideration, and our conclusion is that the findings, from the viewpoint of a court of appeal, are immune from successful attack.

No prejudicial error in rulings admitting and excluding evidence has been found.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

CASTRO et al. v. MALCOLM et al. (AMERICAN SURETY CO. OF NEW YORK, Intervener.) (Civ. 2700.)

1. Highways ⚷113(4)—Defaulting contractor's assignment of funds due held not to affect county's right to use funds in completing work.

Where county had right under road construction contract to withhold compensation to be paid for proposed improvement, and, if abandoned by contractor, to use any money due or to become due thereon to complete work that was left undone, contractor could not make any assignment of any funds due to him at time of abandonment that would affect county's right to use funds in payment of expenses of completing work.

2. Subrogation ⚷7(1)—Rights as between defaulting contractor's surety and his assignee as to funds due him in county's hands.

Where, at time of contractor's default in road construction contract entitling county to withhold compensation so far as necessary to pay expenses of completing work, county had in its possession moneys due contractor, rights of surety who had advanced sums to pay materialmen's and laborers' claims on account of contract held paramount, by virtue of subrogation to rights of county, to right of contractor's assignee who advanced no money on the assignment, and whose previous advancements had gone into contractor's general banking account on which checks were drawn by contractor in prosecution of at least four separate and distinct contracts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by Lee Castro and W. E. PLUMMER, J. On the 13th day of June, 1916, an agreement was entered into between the county of Kern, acting through its board of supervisors, as the party of the first part, and the Coast Construction Company, a partnership consisting of Stephen V. R. Malcolm and others, as party of the second part, for the construction and improvement of 7.56 miles of that certain highway in the county of Kern, known as and called the McKittrick-Maricopa road, for the estimated sum of $44,766.15, to which was thereafter added, as extras, the sum of $1,017.42. At the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, there was delivered to the board of supervisors of said county of Kern and made a part of said agreement two certain bonds, executed by the American Surety Company of New York, the cross-complainant and respondent in this action. One of said bonds was for the faithful performance of said contract and executed in the sum of $11,191.54. The second bond was given for the security of materialmen and laborers, and was in the sum of $22,383.08.

The agreement was conditioned in the usual form, and provided for progress payments in the sum of 75 per cent. of the estimated value of the work and the retention by the county of Kern of the sum of 25 per cent. until 35 days after the final completion of the work agreed to be performed. The bonds were conditioned as is usual in such cases.

Thereafter, and on or about the 30th day of June, 1916, the Coast Construction Company, the contractor in the agreement above mentioned, entered into an agreement with the Empire Securities Company, the appellant in this action, whereby the execution of the contract for the work above provided to be done by the Coast Construction Company was set forth, also the execution of the two bonds given by the American Surety Company of New York. The amount of the contract and other matters were set forth. It was mentioned that the contractor desired to borrow money for the purpose of enabling the contractor to carry out the aforesaid contract, and the Securities Company was willing to lend money for that purpose. It was agreed that the Securities Company would advance to the contractor in installments, as requested from time to time, money not in excess of 75 per cent. of the work done and materials furnished under the aforesaid contract, etc.; it was further provided that an agent of the Securities Company might be at all times upon the work with authority limited to the keeping of the time of employees, the paying of bills for labor and material, and seeing that all labor and material previously furnished had been paid for, etc. As security for such advances the agreement assigned to the Securities Company all the right, title, and interest of the contractor in and to the moneys that might become due and payable under the agreement for the improvement of the road above mentioned.

Under this agreement with the contractor the Securities Company loaned the sum of $32,284.65, all of which was entered into and became a part of the general banking account of the Coast Construction Company.

The contractor entered upon the performance of the work early in July, 1916, and proceeded with the same until on or about the 11th day of December, 1916, when it abandoned the same and discontinued work thereunder. At the time of the abandonment of the work, five units, upon which 75 per cent. estimates had been made, were completed. Of these, four estimates in the aggregate of $20,304.94 had been paid. The fifth estimate, approved by the highway commission, but not by the board of supervisors, in the sum of $3,867.25, remained unpaid. It is this sum that is in controversy in this action. The trial court awarded this sum to the American Surety Company, and it is from this part of the judgment or decree of the trial court that the Securities Company appeals.

At the conclusion of the trial it was adjudged that laborers and materialmen had enforceable claims against the Surety Company in the total sum of $15,703.38. It was also found by the trial court that at the time of the abandonment of the contract the status of the contract and the amount of money still in the county treasury in the county of Kern was as follows:

Extras	1,017 42
Total	$45,783 57
Payments to contractor	20,304 94
Balance available for completion	$25,478 63

The amount last stated was made up as follows:

Retained percentages	$ 8,057 39
Fifth estimate, approved by highway commission but not by supervisors, exclusive of retained percentage of 25 per cent.	3,867 25
Unearned balance of contract price	13,553 99
Unexpended balance		$25,478 63
It was further established that the county of Kern had forfeited such contract and had elected to and did complete the work therein provided for, expending in connection therewith, after allowance of certain credits, the sum of		$18,660 26
Leaving in the hands of the county for such disposition as the court might direct, the sum of		$ 6,818 37

As to the payment made by the contractor for labor and material the trial court found as follows:

"Approximately the sum of $20,000 was proven by said contractors to have been expended in connection with said contract, but a substantial part of said last-named amount was expended for purposes other than material and labor. Whether such sum was paid from the fund so furnished by said Empire Securities Company, or from moneys borrowed by said contractors from other sources, because of the mingling of said funds, to the knowledge and with the consent of said Empire Securities Company, it is impossible to determine."

The trial court also found that the Securities Company at the time the assignment of $3,867.25 was made to it by the Coast Construction Company advanced nothing of value, and did not pay out any money represented or covered by said assignment towards the discharge of the claims of the materialmen for the payment of labor on account of the improvement of said highway; that the only promise made by the Empire Securities Company was that, if a representative of the Coast Construction Company would go to Bakersfield, and there assign to the Empire Securities Company said claim or estimate in the sum of $3,867.25, the Empire Securities Company would then consider the making of a further advance. This advance was desired to meet a pay roll of the Construction Company then due. This advance was never made. The court further found that the Securities Company desired the assignment for the intent and purpose of appropriating to its own use the amount of money represented thereby, and not for the purpose of applying the sum towards the payment of labor performed upon or materials used in construction work on the highway referred to. These findings are challenged as well as one involving the good faith of the Securities Company. This latter, however, for the reasons hereinafter stated, we do not deem material. The testimony shows without conflict that the Coast Construction Company had at least four contracts for work and improvement during the pendency of the agreement involved in this action in which the Securities Company, the appellant in this action, was doing the financing; that all the money received from the Securities Company went into and became a part of the general banking account of the Coast Construction Company, and the funds thereof so intermingled that their identity became lost. The testimony also shows that, while the Empire Securities Company had a representative on the scene of the work, no special effort was made to ascertain if the funds were being properly applied by the Coast Construction Company. The witness who had charge of the financial affairs of the Empire Securities Company during the period in question testified as follows: "I made no special effort to know that the money paid to them was paid to any particular creditor, or material man of any kind." Also, that he knew that the Construction Company was keeping its accounts at the Merchants' National Bank. In relation to the assignment of the fifth estimate, hereinbefore referred to, this witness also testified in substance as follows: That he knew Mr. Farish, one of the partners composing the Coast Construction Company; that on or about the 21st or 22d day of November, 1916, he had a conversation with Mr. Farish in relation to money needed to meet the pay roll then owing by the company; that he paid Mr. Farish the sum of $12.65 to meet the traveling expenses of Mr. Farish in going to and returning from Bakersfield; that, if Mr. Farish would go to Bakersfield and make an assignment of the fifth estimate to the Securities Company, the Securities Company would then consider the question of further advances. No further advances, however, were made. It appears that Mr. Farish went to Bakersfield, indorsed an assignment on a warrant, returned to Los Angeles, and reported his action to this witness. The warrant, however, does not appear to have been delivered to the Securities Company, nor does it appear just what was done with the warrant thereafter. This witness also stated that Farish reported to him that the affairs of the Coast Construction Company were in bad shape, and that another member of the Coast Construction Company had deliberately and willfully deceived him (Mr. Farish) as to the condition of the company.

[1, 2] It is by virtue of this assignment of the fifth estimate that the Securities Company claims to be entitled to the sum of $3,867.25 as hereinbefore stated. To support its contention the appellant relies upon the cases of Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., 185 Cal. 586, 197 Pac. 941; Slayden v. O'Dea, 182 Cal. 500, 189 Pac. 1066; Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 179 Pac. 880; Hunt v. Empire Securities Co., 50 Cal. App. 43, 194 Pac. 744. These cases, however, have no application to the issues presented to this court for decision. In those cases the contracts were awarded under the provisions of the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147, as amended) or the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), contain no provisions as to the retention of any portion of the contract price, and also were instances in which the contracting parties had no rights in any portion of the amount agreed to be paid to which a surety upon performance could be subrogated. In the case at bar the county of Kern had control, and in its treasury the entire sum agreed to be paid to the contractor and the provisions of the contract not only gave the county the right to withhold 25 per cent. of the stipulated amount to be paid as compensation for the proposed improvement, but also had the right, in the event of the abandonment of the contract by the contractor, to use any moneys due or to become due on the contract to complete the work that might be left undone by the contractor. Section 106 of the agreement between the Coast Construction Company, the contractor, and the county of Kern provided for such contingency, and gave the county the power above stated. After specifying what the county might do towards completing the work should it be left undone by the contractor, that section contains this language:

> "All expenses charged under this paragraph shall be deducted and paid by the county out of any moneys then due or to become due the contractor under the contract or any part thereof; and in such accounting the county shall not be held to obtain the lowest figures for the work of completing the contract or any part thereof, or for insuring its proper completion, but all sums actually paid therefor shall be charged to the contractor."

By the very terms of this section the county of Kern was given the right to use all moneys due the contractor under any circumstances, and was not limited to the 25 per cent. specified to be retained by the county in other portions of the contract. In other words, the county was not required to reserve any portion of the fund or exercise any priority in the expenditure thereof in the completion of the work. In other words, it could use the money claimed by the Securities Company as assignee herein and also of the American Surety Company by reason of its subrogation to the rights of the county to whatever might be left of the 25 per cent. reserve fund hereinbefore mentioned. Or, to state the matter in a different manner, the contractor could not make any assignment of any funds due to him at the time of the abandonment of the contract that would affect the right of the county to use that fund in the payment of the expenses of completing the work. If this is true, it would seem that the Surety Company, under the instruments to which we have heretofore referred, the existence of which the Empire Securities Company in its agreement admits knowledge would, if it advanced money to the county of Kern to pay for the completion of the work or the discharge of the claims of laborers and materialmen, be subrogated in equity to the rights of the county. The transcript shows that the American Surety Company advanced the sum of $15,703.25, and that of the retained percentages which amounted to $8,057.39 in the first instance the Surety Company was entitled to receive the remaining balance, which had been cut down to $6,818.37. In other words, the American Surety Company is not awarded under the judgment the amount to which it would otherwise legally be entitled under the contract on account of retained percentages, for the simple reason that the county of Kern was entitled to and did deduct therefrom a little over $2,000 in making payment to the persons who finished the work, the net loss to the surety company being the difference between $6,818.37 awarded to it from the county and the sum of $15,703.38 paid out by it on account of labor and materials going into the improvement of the highway in question.

In so far as the assigned warrant is concerned which is involved in this case, the Securities Company stands in the position of a general creditor. No money was advanced on account thereof, as heretofore stated, and as also shown all moneys advanced by the Securities Company went into the general banking account of the Coast Construction Company upon which checks were drawn in prosecution of at least four distinct and separate contracts for that many different specified improvements. In this particular the language of the court in Title Guaranty & Surety Co. v. Dutcher (D. C.) 203 Fed. 167, quoting from page 169, is directly applicable:

> "All the money borrowed by the contractor went into his general bank account with other of his money. During the time involved he had four separate contracts with the city. No account was kept of the particular work upon which disbursements were made, and it is not shown how much, if any, of the money borrowed, or other money of his, was paid upon the contract in question."

Under such circumstances it was held that the rights of the surety were paramount. A large number of cases were also cited by the court in the above-mentioned decision. To the same effect is the case of First Nat. Bank of Seattle v. City Trust, etc., 114 Fed. 529, 52 C. C. A. 313. In that case the rights of the surety on account of moneys advanced by it to discharge claims for unpaid labor and material were held paramount to that of the bank which founded its claims upon money loaned to the contractor, which likewise went into the contractor's general banking account.

In Re McGarry & Son, 240 Fed. 400, 153 C. C. A. 326, it is held:

> "That the surety, on payment of labor and material claims, was subrogated and that its equity attached as of the date of the bond, and that a mere volunteer's rights would be subject to those of the surety who pays the labor and material bills"—citing Prairie State Bank v. United States, 164 U. S. 227, 17 Sup. Ct. 142, 41 L. Ed. 412.

In that case it was held that the rights of the surety on account of moneys paid for materialmen and labor were superior to those of an assignee of the contractor. In that case it was also held that the fund under the contract was for a particular class of creditors to which class the assignee did not belong. This is true of the case at bar.

In the case of Wasco County v. New England Equitable Ins. Co., 88 Or. 465, 172 Pac. 126, L. R. A. 1918D, 732, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 656, the Supreme Court of Oregon speaks of the rights of the respective parties as follows:

> "When the bank loaned its money it knew that before Cromer entered upon the performance of his contract he had given a bond signed by a surety, and that the law required the county to reserve 25 per cent. of each monthly estimate. From the date of the contract of suretyship the bank was bound to know that the insurance company had an equity in the funds to be reserved; and when the bank loaned its money it did something that it was not obliged to do, and it must be deemed to have acted with a full knowledge of the right of the surety. The contractor and the bank could not create a lien in favor of the bank upon the reserved fund and make it paramount to a prior and then existing lien of the surety"—citing a number of authorities to the same effect.

The federal cases, heretofore cited, are supported by the decision in the case of Prairie State Bank v. United States, supra. Whether the law required the retention of 25 per cent. is wholly immaterial, as the contract of which all parties had notice so specified. An almost identical question was before this court in the case of Maryland Casualty Co. v. Shafer, 57 Cal. App. 580, 208 Pac. 192. In that case, this court, speaking through the presiding justice, said:

> "The further provision for retention by the county of sufficient funds to pay claimants who filed verified claims was equally a part of plaintiff's contract and was for the protection of the surety as much as for that of claimants. To the extent that such provision was observed, the liability of the surety was lessened. The fund retained was beyond the control of Shafer and no assignment by him could prejudice the rights of the parties for whose benefit the fund was created. To hold otherwise would be to nullify the stipulation of the contract for the retention of the fund and to destroy the security intended for the benefit of claimants bringing themselves within its terms as well as for the protection of the surety."

This statement of the law is supported by a large number of authorities there collated. This case also shows the difference in the application of the principle or rule of law relating to the rights of the parties where the party contracting for the work has control of the fund and may lawfully contract to reserve a certain percentage thereof and cases in which no such power exists. In one case the rights of the sureties can and will be protected; in the other it is found impossible so to do.

To summarize this case we have these facts: The contractor was carrying on four contracts; all of its money was placed into and withdrawn from a general banking account; the money was not traced; the appellant claims the thirty-eight hundred odd dollars on account of an assignment indorsed upon the fifth estimate upon which no money was advanced by the assignee, but which it was understood, as shown by the testimony which we have quoted, the matter of advancing money would be taken up and further considered; the contractor defaulted in his work; at the time of the default the county had in its possession something over $8,000 in retained percentages, as well as other sums of money due and to become due the contractor; the surety advanced over $15,000 to pay the claims of materialmen and laborers on account of the contract.

In view of this summary, and of all that we have hereinbefore stated, we think that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

KAMMERER v. MARINO et al. (Civ. 2740.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 24, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 23, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑607(2)—Trial court's power to permit amendment of notice to clerk to prepare papers should be freely exercised.

Power of trial court under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to permit amendment of notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal, should be freely and liberally exercised.

2. Appeal and error 🔑958—Order denying leave to amend notice to prepare papers not reversed in absence of clear abuse of discretion.

Order denying leave to amend notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal will not be reversed, unless record clearly shows abuse of trial court's discretion.

3. Appeal and error 🔑607(2)—Relief from mistakes of law as well as fact may be had by amendment of notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, amendment of notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal may be allowed to afford relief from mistakes of law, as well as fact, on proper showing.

4. Appeal and error 🔑607(2) — Affidavits supporting application for leave to amend notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal held insufficient.

Affidavits supporting application for leave to amend notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal held insufficient as not showing by whose inadvertence, mistake, or neglect notice did not include request for reporter's transcript of evidence, why such transcript would be of value, or its materiality in presenting questions tendered for review.

5. Appeal and error 🔑607(2)—What affidavits supporting application to amend notice to clerk must show, stated.

Affidavits supporting motion to amend notice to clerk to include copy of reporter's notes of evidence in papers on appeal should show clearly questions desired to be presented for review and necessity of such copy to properly present them, before it can be said that trial court abused discretion in denying leave to amend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by John Kammerer against Guiseppe Marino and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from order denying application of defendants Marino and others for leave to amend notice to clerk to prepare papers on appeal, they appeal. Affirmed.

Donald R. Green, V. L. Hatfield, Martin I. Welsh, and W. H. Hatfield, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Sacramento county denying the application of defendants, Guiseppe Marino, Charlie Roparty, also known as Charles Rafti, and Steve Kamer, for leave to amend their notice to the clerk to prepare papers on appeal. It appears from the transcript that, after the trial had been had and judgment entered in the above-entitled action, the defendants, last above named, desiring to appeal therefrom caused to be filed with the clerk of said court on the 15th day of May, 1923, the following notice, to wit:

"Notice to Clerk to Prepare Papers on Appeal.

"To the Clerk of the Above-Entitled Court: Please take notice that the defendants Guiseppe Marino, Steve Kamer and Charlie Roparty, also known as Charles Rafti, intend to appeal from the judgment heretobefore rendered in the above-entitled action, and request that a clerk's transcript to include the judgment roll herein together with all of the papers and matters used and all rulings and orders made upon said defendant's motion for a new trial herein be made up and prepared.

"Dated this 15th day of May, 1923.
"V. L. Hatfield.
"Martin I. Welsh.
"W. H. Hatfield."

Subsequently to said date it was discovered that said notice did not ask for a copy of the reporter's notes of the testimony, and on the 19th day of June, 1923, the defendants and appellants in this action served notice that on the 25th day of June, 1923, they would move the trial court for an order permitting them to amend their notice to the clerk of the above-entitled court to prepare papers on appeal herein by adding thereto a request to prepare a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts, or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel and all matters to which the same relate. That said motion would be made upon the ground that said matter requested to be added to said request theretofore filed was omitted therefrom through inadvertence, surprise, mistake, and excusable neglect. This motion was supported by the affidavit of W H. Hatfield filed on the same date, which affidavit is as follows:

"State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.: W. H. Hatfield, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is one of the attorneys for the moving defendants herein; that it was agreed between affiant and one of his associates, Donald R. Green, that said Green would prepare the notice of appeal and the notice to the clerk to prepare papers on appeal herein; that affiant asked said Green to include in said request both a reporter's transcript and a clerk's transcript, together with all papers connected with the motion for a new trial herein; that due to inadvertence said notice did not include the request for the usual reporter's transcript; that affiant did not learn this until on or about the 15th day of June, 1923, when the clerk's transcript was submitted to him for examination.

"Wherefore, affiant prays for an order of this court allowing the said notice to prepare papers on appeal herein to be amended to include therein a request for the usual reporter's transcript on appeal. W. H. Hatfield."

Subsequently an affidavit by Donald R. Green was also filed in support of said motion. This affidavit is as follows:

"State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.: Donald R. Green, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is attorney of record for Steve Kamer, one of the defendants herein; that immediately after the denial of the motion for a new trial in the above-entitled matter he consulted with W. H. Hatfield about the matter of an appeal from the judgment herein; that he stated to Mr. Hatfield that he had never taken an appeal to the Supreme Court or to the District Court of Appeal; that Mr. Hatfield stated to him that he had considerable experience in those matters and was thoroughly familiar with the procedure and had just recently taken an appeal to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, wherein practically the same point was raised as here, i. e., failure to find on a material issue; that Mr. Hatfield stated to affiant that as he was busy he would have to ask affiant to attend to preparing the necessary papers and arranging the matter of the transcript with the reporter; that appreciating the fact that he had never taken an appeal before, and appreciating the fact that Mr. Hatfield had, he discussed the contents of such papers on appeal fully with Mr. Hatfield; that through mistake, inadvertence and a misunderstanding on his part, he understood that a reporter's transcript was unnecessary; that affiant did not discover his mistake until after the clerk's transcript was presented to Mr. Hatfield for inspection; that as soon as said error was discovered, said W. H. Hatfield prepared and filed his notice of motion for an order permitting defendants to amend their notice to the clerk by adding thereto a request to the clerk for a transcript of the testimony offered at the trial; that the said notice was given with the knowledge and consent of affiant, and was for the purpose of correcting the said mistake of affiant. * * *"

No opposing affidavits were filed. The trial court denied the motion and the matter is now before this court on appeal from that order. On the part of the appellants it is contended that the trial court abused its discretion in denying such motion, and on the part of the respondents it is contended that there was no showing of such abuse.

[1, 2] Two propositions of law in relation to the exercise of discretion in such matters by the trial court seem to be definitely settled: First, that the power vested in trial courts by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be freely and liberally exercised to the end that cases should be disposed of according to their substantial merits rather than upon mere technical matters of procedure. Sofuye v. Pieters-Wheeler Seed Co. (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 990; Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 455; Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 Pac 657. Secondly, that, unless the record clearly shows the trial court has abused its discretion in denying a defendant's motion for relief, its order will not be reversed on appeal. Horne v. Standard Auto Sales Co. (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 970; Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165; Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 78 Pac. 878.

Other cases might be cited following the rules above set forth, but these are deemed sufficient.

[3] It also seems to be well settled in this state that relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure may be had from mistakes of law as well as from mistakes of fact when a proper showing therefor is made. Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 655, 31 Pac. 623, 31 Am. St. Rep. 247; Mitchell v. California, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 Pac. 590; 14 Cal. Jur. 1044.

It seems, however, that the mistake of an attorney justifying relief must be other than that arising from mere ignorance of the law. This question was before the court of this state in Garroway v. Jennings, 189 Cal. 97 (207 Pac. 554) where it is held (we quote from the syllabus):

> "A motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside a default for failure to answer a complaint after a demurrer thereto was overruled was properly denied where the only showing made in support of the motion was that the defendant was an attorney at law who had never been in active practice and was not familiar with the rules of practice and procedure of courts and believed that an order overruling a demurrer was appealable and an appeal taken therefrom would stay all further proceedings until the appeal was determined."

It was also stated that:

> "All of these things he could have readily and easily ascertained by taking the trouble to read the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating thereto and the numerous decisions of this court directly holding that no appeal lies from an order overruling a demurrer."

[4] With these principles of law in mind, let us consider the two affidavits upon which the motion is based. In the affidavit of Hatfield it appears that the affiant asked Donald R. Green to prepare the notice of appeal and the notice to the clerk and asked said Green to include in said request both a reporter's transcript and a clerk's transcript and that due to inadvertence said notice did not include the request for the usual reporter's transcript. Whose inadvertence, mistake, or neglect it was does not appear from this affidavit. There is nothing in the affidavit of affiant Hatfield which states any reason why a reporter's transcript of the evidence would be of value or its materiality in presenting any questions which may be tendered to an appellate court for review upon appeal. There is nothing stated in this affidavit which would call to the attention of the trial court any necessity whatever for such a transcript or any reasons whatever given why all questions which were intended to be presented to a reviewing court might not be tendered, presented, and considered upon the record already made. In other words, there is nothing in this affidavit showing how the appellants would be benefited by the granting of their motion, and, necessarily, nothing shown as to how they would be prejudiced by a denial thereof.

We come next to a consideration of the affidavit filed by Donald R. Green. This affidavit states that affiant had never taken an appeal to the Supreme Court or to the District Court of Appeal; that affiant Hatfield had stated to him that he (Hatfield) had had considerable experience in those matters and was thoroughly familiar with the procedure and had just recently taken an appeal to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, wherein practically the same point was raised as here, i. e., failure to find on a material issue; that Hatfield was busy and would have to ask affiant to attend to preparing the necessary papers; that through mistake, inadvertence and misunderstanding on his part affiant understood that a reporter's transcript was unnecessary; that affiant did not discover his mistake until after the clerk's transcript was presented to Mr. Hatfield for inspection. Here, again, there is no showing in the affidavit of the necessity of a reporter's transcript of the testimony or why there should be a reporter's transcript of the testimony made or how the appellant represented by Mr. Green or any of the other appellants would be benefited by the granting of the motion to amend, and, hence, necessarily not showing how they would be prejudiced by a denial of such motion. In so far as the application is based upon the affidavit showing unfamiliarity with the law in such cases, the Garroway Case, above cited, seems to apply.

[5] We do not find any cases which hold that the actual merits of an appeal must be set forth in the affidavit supporting a motion to be relieved from a default for failure to serve or file statements or bills of exception on appeal within time, but there must be some showing of merit in the motion, that is to say, the affidavits in this case should show clearly and distinctly the questions desired to be presented for review by the appellate court and that a copy of the reporter's notes was necessary in order that such questions might properly be presented and considered on appeal. Then, in the event such motion is denied or granted, the appellate court would be in a position to determine whether the trial court had or had not abused its discretion. Without such showing the mere fact that a mistake has been made, whether of law or of fact, and the party making the mistake has not been relieved therefrom, does not authorize or justify an appellate court in finding that the trial court has abused its discretion. We do not need to hold that the trial court in this case either has or has not abused its discretion. The papers presented to us do not clearly show such abuse and under the law we have but one thing to do and that is to affirm the judgment.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GALBRAITH. (Cr. 1168.)

1. Perjury ⚷34(4)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Under Pen. Code, § 1103a, relating to corroboration of a chief witness in a prosecution for perjury, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. Perjury ⚷34(5)—Not necessary for testimony of chief witness to be directly proved by "corroborating circumstances."

Under Pen. Code, § 1103a, providing that perjury must be proved by two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances, it is not necessary that the truth of the testimony of the chief witness be directly proved by "corroborating circumstances" which relates to circumstances tending to corroborate the facts offered in evidence to show the falsity of the statements of defendant on trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Corroborating Circumstances.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

James C. Galbraith was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr and Stanley R. Sterne, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Ralph E. Hoyt, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was charged with perjury alleged to have been committed in the course of his testimony as a witness in the case of People v Jeff Galbraith and others, who were charged with the robbery of the Pergola Café, a resort located 17 miles out of Oakland, on the night of January 13, 1923. The information charged that during the course of said trial the defendant herein, after being duly sworn as a witness, testified that he had met Jeff Galbraith in the city of Tulare, Cal., early in the morning of the 13th of January, and had spent the whole day with him, leaving him about 5 or 5:30 o'clock p. m.; that he had driven with him out to a camp called Liggett's, which place he left at about 4 p. m. with the said Jeff Galbraith, driving with him back to the town of Tulare; that he left Jeff on the street in Tulare, and went to his own home, and then to the freight yards, where he took a train out of Tulare the same night.

[1] The evidence at the perjury trial consisted of the direct testimony of one George Ducker directly showing the falsity of all the testimony given by the defendant herein, and the corroborating testimony of other witnesses tending to show that the entire story of the defendant was a fabrication. Ducker testified that between the hours of 4 and 5 p. m. on the 13th of January, 1923, he picked up Jeff Galbraith and two others at a place in Modesto, which was shown to be 137 miles from Tulare; that he carried these parties in his automobile through the San Joaquin valley through Tracy, and down to Oakland, a distance of 86 miles, where they all had their dinner, and then from Oakland out to the Pergola Café, a distance of 17 miles, where the occupants of the car held up and robbed the café at about 10:30 or 10:45 p m. of that night. It was shown that, if Jeff Galbraith had traveled this route from Tulare, he would have covered a distance of 240 miles in about five hours, and it was also shown that no trains left Tulare for the north within the time mentioned. The witness Ducker gave a detailed account of the automobile ride from Modesto to the café, and his testimony that Jeff Galbraith took part in the robbery of the café at 10:30 that evening was expressly corroborated by another witness who saw him on that occasion. Though the corroboration of the testimony of Ducker is meager, all the circumstances and inferences to be drawn from the evidence before the jury tended in themselves to corroborate his story of the movements of Jeff Galbraith on the day in question and to demonstrate the impossibility of the facts related by the defendant in his testimony.

In addition to this the defendant himself, in his endeavor to bolster up the story which he had previously given, testified that he fixed the time of his visit with Jeff Galbraith as the 13th day of January as the time when he boarded a freight train at Tulare shortly after 5:30 p. m., and proceeded to the town of Pixley, where he traded a waybill for a ticket, and that, pursuant to his employment by a man by the name of Smith, he boarded a cattle train at Pixley and took charge of the cattle in the course of their transportation to Los Angeles. He also testified that on the said 13th day of January he and Jeff Galbraith had breakfast in the City Restaurant in Tulare, and were waited upon by a girl, who was expressly named by him. This whole story proved to be false. The girl testified that she had not seen these men on January 13th, and that she had not worked in the restaurant mentioned by the witness until some time in June following. As to the cattle train incident, it was shown without question that the freight train did not stop in Tulare on that day; that he could not have taken a freight train to Pixley on that evening; that he had not been employed by Smith to take charge of cattle or in any other capacity at that time; that no waybill had been given to him and no ticket had been issued for his transportation to Los Angeles; and that he had not had charge of a shipment of cattle to Los Angeles at that time. On cross-examination in his own defense in the present case the defendant admitted that his previous testimony relating to the ticket and cattle incident was untrue; he also made certain denials regarding his testimony in the former case which were shown to be untrue by the production of the record.

[2] The whole case on appeal is based upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to corroborate the direct evidence of Ducker showing the falsity of the appellant's former testimony and that the instructions of the court were incorrect in regard thereto. This attack presents but one question, and that is whether in a prosecution for perjury, where the people depend upon the testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances, it is necessary that these corroborating circumstances must be proved by direct testimony specifically corroborating the testimony of the main witness. The purpose of the statute is to prevent an injustice to one individual by having him stand before a jury to answer the testimony of another charging him with falsification. In such a case the jury would be called upon to choose between the sworn testimony of the witness and the defendant. To prevent this, section 1103a of the Penal Code provides that perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses or of one witness and corroborating circumstances. It is appellant's contention that because of this section it is necessary that the corroborating circumstances must directly prove the truth of the chief witness, but this is not the meaning of the section. "Corroborating circumstances" in the section relate to circumstances which tend to corroborate the facts which are offered in evidence to show the falsity of the statements of the defendant on trial. Thus in People v. Casanova, 54 Cal. App. 439, 442, 202 Pac. 45, 47, the appellate court said:

> "The statute respecting the quantum of evidence necessary in perjury cases will be satisfied if there be the testimony of one witness to facts that are absolutely incompatible with the innocence of the accused, corroborated by circumstances which, of themselves and independently of such directly inculpatory evidence, tend, with a reasonable degree of certitude, to show that the accused is guilty as charged."

We have made a very careful review of the entire record in this case, and are satisfied therefrom that the appellant was given a fair and impartial trial, and that he was convicted upon evidence which was sufficient within the terms of the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

HOWARD v. HOWARD et al. (Civ. 4661.)

1. Quieting title 🔑1—Object to finally settle all conflicting claims.

The object of an action to quiet title under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, is to finally settle and determine as between parties all conflicting claims to property in controversy, and to decree to each such interest or estate therein as he may be entitled to.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1042(2)—Plaintiff held not injured by striking paragraphs from complaint where evidence thereof admitted.

Plaintiff, in action to quiet title under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, was not injured by ruling striking certain paragraphs from complaint, where all material facts stricken were subsequently admitted in evidence.

3. Deeds 🔑38(1)—Sufficiency of description of premises.

A deed will be sustained if it is possible from description to ascertain and identify land intended with reasonable certainty, either by calls of instrument as applied to land, or by descriptive features.

4. Deeds 🔑38(1)—If property can be identified by competent surveyor, nothing more required.

If property can be identified by description in a deed by competent surveyor, with or without aid of extrinsic evidence, nothing more is required.

5. Homestead 🔑57(3) — Evidence held to support finding that land could not be identified.

Evidence held to sustain finding that lands described in a declaration of homestead as bounded on three sides by the lands of mere squatters could not be identified with reasonable certainty.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1047(2)—Failure to rule upon admissibility of declaration of homestead held immaterial.

Failure of court to finally rule upon admissibility of declaration of homestead was immaterial where court held that parol evidence was insufficient to aid in location of homestead with reasonable certainty.

7. Judgment 🔑580—Judgment appealed from not evidence in bar of recovery in another action.

Where an appeal is pending, a final judgment, unless satisfied, is not evidence in bar of recovery in another action for the same cause, since only final judgment can be pleaded or proven as res adjudicata.

8. Appeal and error 🔑499(3)—Exclusion of testimony not considered in absence of showing in record that it was offered or marked for identification.

A contention that court erred in sustaining objection to introduction in evidence of testimony of witnesses, since deceased, in another case, cannot be sustained where record does not show that such testimony was offered or marked for identification.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. S. Preston, Judge.

Action by Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased, against W. H. Howard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Wessel, of Ukiah, and Chas. A. Shurtleff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Will Van Dyke, Chas. Kasch, and Mannon & Mannon, all of Ukiah, and Eden & Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action and appeal by Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased, for the benefit of the heirs of the said Rachael Howard, to quiet the title of said heirs to a tract of land, comprising some 445.37 acres, which, it is claimed, Rachael Howard owned in fee simple in her lifetime by virtue of survivorship of her husband, Mark W. Howard. The said Mark W. Howard had, on July 26, 1861, executed and recorded a declaration of homestead which it is claimed covered the tract in question, and grant title to which he afterward acquired for adequate consideration from grantees of the patentee of the United States, though at the time of such declaration he was merely a squatter under the purchase of squatters' rights on what he believed to be the public domain. Grant title to the property was obtained on December 17, 1867, and November 20, 1871. The title of Rachael Howard is claimed to be paramount to and to avoid all titles or claims in said lands claimed to be derived under four deeds executed by Mark W. Howard alone in the years 1890 and 1892 to Lucy S. Howard, Phalby Ann Cleveland, and Thomas B. Howard, three children of Mark W. Howard and Rachael Howard, covering four parcels, which together make the whole of the tract claimed to be covered by the declaration of homestead. Plaintiff, as part of his relief, asked that these deeds and other conveyances and incumbrances thereunder be canceled. Section 3412, Civ. Code. The defendants and respondents are surviving children of Mark W. Howard and Rachael Howard, representatives and heirs of other children of said couple, and the grantees, tenants for life, remaindermen, distributees, and mortgagees of the grantees under the aforesaid four deeds of Mark W. Howard, under conveyances, decree of distribution and incumbrances executed January 29, 1917, April 17, 1919, April 17, 1918, November 15, 1919, and May 6, 1920, by the grantees of the aforesaid deeds and their successors, and thereafter recorded in the office of the county recorder of Mendocino county, where the land is situate.

Trial resulted in a judgment adverse to plaintiff's claims, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

A former action, brought on April 17, 1918, by the administrator of the estate of Ann Cleveland, the same person called Phalby Ann Cleveland, and a grantee under one of the aforesaid four deeds of Mark W Howard, against Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased, to quiet title to that portion of the tract here in dispute covered by the deed to Phalby Ann Cleveland by Mark W. Howard, resulted in judgment in favor of the defendant and against any interest of the plaintiff in the particular parcel in controversy there. An appeal was noticed from said judgment, but no further steps were taken on such appeal because of a stipulation entered into between the respective parties to that action to the effect that Mark Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased, should bring an action to have determined that another parcel of land also included in the tract here in controversy, was the property of the heirs of Rachael Howard, subject to the administration of her estate, and that no further steps need be taken in the appeal aforesaid until the judgment in the action to be so brought should have become final. Plaintiff appellant claims, as part of his contentions, that the judgment in the case of Hopkins v. Howard is res adjudicata as to the matters there in dispute, and which were again raised in the present action by the plaintiff in the Hopkins Case.

Plaintiff-appellant thereafter brought the present action, in which as administrator he seeks to quiet title in the heirs of Rachael Howard, not only to the parcel mentioned in the stipulation made in the action of Hopkins v. Howard, but to the land in controversy in said action, the parcel with respect to which the stipulation was made, and a further piece, all three parts lying together in roughly parallel strips, and forming as a whole, from south to north in the order given, the tract covered by the complaint. It comprises in all 445.37 acres, having the Russian river for its western boundary.

The entire tract of land in controversy here was part of the great Yokayo Rancho grant of over 35,000 acres, made by the Mexican government through Governor Pio Pico to Cayetano Juarez in 1845, and confirmed to him in 1846. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo these lands came into the possession of the United States. The claim of Juarez for confirmation of his title by the United States was first rejected, and on appeal later confirmed to him, the final adjudication being made on April 17, 1863, and patent issued on March 8, 1867. Under the administration of the United States, and prior to the final confirmation in 1863, and possibly until 1867, when the patent issued, and survey made in 1866–67 on behalf of the grantees of Juarez, the lands of the vicinity were believed by early settlers to be public domain to be surveyed and open to be filed on at some later day. In this belief squatters settled there, holding various tracts at distances from each other sufficient to make each an occupant of the customary quarter section or 160 acres. Just prior to 1858 men named Beason and Stephens occupied part of the tract and had a house and other buildings thereon; land to the east of them was held by one Potter, to the north by Abbott, and to the south by "Bill" Stevens.

Mark W Howard, husband of the plaintiff's intestate, was living in Sonoma county in 1858 with his wife and 11 children, having arrived there after brief sojourns in other California counties following their arrival from Missouri in 1856. Mr. Howard came to Mendocino county in advance of his family, and bought the squatters' rights of Beason and Stephens, paying probably between $500 and $600 for them. He then brought his family to Mendocino county in September, 1858. Here they settled and lived continuously until the death of Mark W. Howard in 1900 and his wife in 1902. The year following their arrival in the county (1859) one Samuel Ackerman took possession of the land to the north formerly occupied by Abbott, and he, with Howard, proceeded to erect a fence between their holdings. From the time of the arrival of Mark W. Howard in the county until 1866–67 there were no known titles to the land, and though purchases of squatters' rights were said to be made of definite acreages no documents evidencing such purchases were produced.

By judicial deed to one S. Clinton Hastings in September, 1859, of the whole rancho, followed by reconveyances of shares therein by him to Currey, Currey to Carpentier, quitclaim from Cayetano Juarez to Currey, and conveyance of another share by Currey to Carpentier, the ranch Yokayo finally came, by power of attorney and deeds from Hastings, Currey, and Carpentier, to William Doolan, in 1867 and 1869. On December 17, 1867, a deed from Hastings, Currey, and Carpentier to Mark W. Howard, executed by William Doolan as attorney in fact, conveyed lot 93, 172 acres, as shown by "Healey's survey and map of the Yokayo Rancho," for the consideration of $2,000. On May 12, 1871, Doolan, for himself and as attorney in fact for Hastings conveyed to Mark W. Howard, for $450, another piece of the Rancho Yokayo adjoining lot 93 to the east, and being the southerly part of lot 98, containing 200 acres. On November 12, 1871, for the expressed consideration of $615.17, Hastings and Doolan, by conveyance of Doolan to M. W. Howard, transferred property having a slightly different description and referring to Healey's survey, but seeming to cover the same territory conveyed by the deed of May 12, 1871, with the addition of acreage to 273.37 acres. This is further described as the southeasterly part of lot 98, and with the addition of the 172 acres of lot 93 make up the 445.37 acres covered by the complaint here.

On June 6, 1892, one of the deeds sought to be canceled was executed by the same Mark W. Howard, to Lucy S. Howard, a daughter, for the expressed consideration of $5,000, covering 200 acres forming the central strip of lots 93 and 98 from west to east. "House furnishings and goods" were also included in this conveyance, but a life estate reserved to the grantor. On January 29, 1917, Lucy Howard by gift deed conveyed the same land to W. H. Howard, Taylor Howard, and Mack Howard (three brothers), and the survivor of them, for life, with remainder to Howard Martin and Grace Agnes Prichard. The consideration expressed is love and affection. Lucy Howard is dead, and Mack Howard was the administrator of her estate.

On June 16, 1892, a deed was executed by Mark W. Howard to Phalby Ann Cleveland, a daughter, of the part of lots 93 and 98 lying south of that conveyed to Lucy Howard, comprising 64 acres, for $300. Phalby Ann Cleveland is dead. Lucia Hopkins, her administratrix, was the plaintiff in the action of Hopkins v. Howard concerning this land, heretofore referred to several times.

February 25, 1890, for $1,000, Mark W. Howard deeded to Thomas B. Howard, a son, the northerly part of lot 93, bounded on the south line by Howard creek, and part of Lucy Howard's grant, of 40 acres, and on June 10, 1892, for the expressed consideration of $300, he conveyed to the same son the northerly balance of lot 98, 65 acres.

Thomas Howard died, probate of his will had been had, and decree of final distribution made on November 15, 1919, of the land covered by the deeds of February 25, 1890, and June 20, 1892, to Thomas B. Howard, referred to above, as well as other land and personal property. The decree recites that Mark W. Howard, the son, was entitled to all of the property of the estate under his father's will, but had conveyed a half interest therein to his mother by deed of April 17, 1919, of record. Distribution was made of the real property equally to the mother, Florence G. Howard, and the son, Mark W. Howard. On May 6, 1920, the son, Mark W. Howard, with his wife, Antoinette Howard, joined in a mortgage to Joseph Cunningham of the land described in the above deed from the son to his mother as security for a note of $6,000.

The various surviving children of the original Mark W Howard, the grantees, representatives, and heirs, devisees, and mortgagee under these instruments, are defendants here.

[1, 2] Errors assigned by appellant are grouped and separately denominated "issues." Thirteen "issues" are presented for our decision.

Under the first issue the point is made that the trial court erred in sustaining the motions of defendants to strike from the complaint certain enumerated paragraphs. The action is one to quiet title under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure. The object of such an action is to finally settle and determine as between parties all conflicting claims to property in controversy, and to decree to each such interest or estate therein as he may be entitled to. Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 81 Pac. 121, 109 Am. St. Rep. 107. The complaint, from which the court expunged all irrelevant and redundant matter, presents a cause of action under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure. It avers the death and intestacy of Rachael Howard and the appointment and qualification of the administrator, plaintiff-appellant herein; the death of certain heirs of said Rachael Howard, their testacy, and the appointment of executors, who are made defendants; the death of other heirs intestate and the appointment of administrators of their estates, also made defendants; the description of the land in question is given, and in connection therewith it is alleged that the senior Howards, father and mother, since deceased, during the year 1858, in good faith, for the purpose of actual settlement and acquiring a home for themselves and family, entered upon and into actual possession of the land; that said "Rachael Howard became, and was, and ever since and until the time of her death has been, the owner in fee simple" of the premises described, "and of each and every part thereof"; that the defendants named claim an interest in the premises adverse to the heirs of Rachael Howard, deceased, and the ownership of said heirs, and to the possession thereof by said heirs and this administrator, which claim or claims constitute a cloud upon title and are without right. Here we have every element of a complaint to quiet title. Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 384, 108 Pac. 278. It further appears that material facts, which appellant claims were improperly stricken by the trial court from the original complaint, were thereafter properly admitted in evidence at the trial. It is therefore apparent that plaintiff was not injured by the ruling of the court in this particular.

Issues 2 and 3 appertain to the validity of the homestead and the identification of lands therein described by parol evidence. Appellant complains that the trial court committed error in holding the declaration void on its face for uncertainty. It appears from the record that the trial court did not hold the homestead void on its face, but did hold, after parol testimony had been introduced in an attempt to identify the land, that the description contained in the declaration was such that the lands intended to be impressed with the homestead could not be identified with reasonable certainty.

[3, 4] Both appellant and respondents agree that the main question presented on this appeal is whether or not the description contained in the declaration of homestead can be applied, with the aid of extrinsic evidence, to the tract of land aggregating 445.37 acres involved in this action. Both agree that a description in a declaration of homestead need not be more particular than is required in the case of a deed. Generally speaking, a deed will be sustained if it is possible from the whole description to ascertain and identify the land intended to be conveyed with reasonable certainty, either by the calls of the instrument as applied to the land, or by the descriptive features of the grant. If the property can be identified by the description by a competent surveyor, with or without the aid of extrinsic evidence, nothing more is required. 9 Cal. Jur. § 157.

[5] The declaration of homestead upon which appellant's action is founded is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, M. W. Howard, of the county of Mendocino and state of California, do hereby certify and declare that I am married and that I do now reside with my family on the lot of land and premises situated in the county of Mendocino, state of California, bounded and described as follows, to wit: Bounded on the north by Samuel Ackerman's tract, on the south by William Stevens, on the east by Thomas Owens, on the west by Russian river—containing 160 acres, more or less.

"And that it is my intention to use and claim the said lot of land and premises, together with the dwelling thereon, and its appurtenances as a homestead, under the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act to amend an act to exempt the homestead and other property from forced sale in certain cases,' passed April 21, 1851, approved April 28, 1860 and the act thereby amended.

"[Seal.] [Signed] M. W. Howard."

Appellant's counsel says at page 234 of the opening brief:

> "It is an elementary proposition of law that the question as to whether or not a tract of land is capable of being identified is a pure question of fact." (Italics appellant's.)

In connection with the historical facts hereinabove narrated it is well to keep in mind the description contained in the declaration of homestead:

> "Bounded on the north by Samuel Ackerman's tract, on the south by William Stevens, on the east by Thomas Owens, on the west by Russian river—containing 160 acres, more or less."

A reading of this description evokes the impression that it should be possible for not only a surveyor, but a mere layman, to identify with reasonable certainty the land upon the face of the earth. The fact of the matter is that the only boundary mentioned capable of location with any degree of certainty is the Russian river. Ackerman, Stevens, and Owens were squatters upon the unsurveyed public domain. Their claims, nebulous in character, inchoate, imperfect, undefined, never ripened into right or title of any kind, and, so far as the record before us discloses any attempt to identify the land with the aid of the description in the declaration would be mere conjecture.

Ackerman never obtained title to any tract, and never owned at the time the said declaration of homestead was filed, or afterward, any tract of land in that vicinity. Owens never obtained title or owned any tract of land to the east of lands subsequently purchased by Mark W. Howard. Stevens never received title to any lands whatsoever. The record does not show what lands any of these squatters claimed in 1861 at the date of the filing of the declaration of homestead.

More than 30 years elapsed between the execution of the first deed and the filing of the complaint in this action. Almost 29 years elapsed between the execution of the remaining deeds and the filing of the complaint herein. No attack was made on these deeds during the lifetime of Rachael Howard, though she lived for 10 years after the execution of the last deed, and no attack was made upon these deeds for a period of 19 years subsequent to the death of Rachael Howard.

The testimony of plaintiff's witnesses Peter and Mack Howard, sons of Mark W. Howard and Rachael Howard, evidently did not disclose to the trial court's satisfaction the location with reasonable certainty of any boundary lines between the various holders, although there was an abundance of hearsay and contradictory evidence on the subject stricken out on objection or found against. These witnesses, aged 71 and 65 years, respectively, at the time of the trial in the lower court in October, 1921, were boys of 8 and 2 years when their parents came to Mendocino county, and 11 and 5 at the date of the declaration of homestead. The testimony of witness Peter Howard, upon which main reliance is placed by appellant, was not only inconsistent and ambiguous, but on cross-examination was materially impeached by that given by him on some of the same points in the former action of Hopkins v. Howard.

W. H. Howard, a son about 20 years of age at the time of the declaration of homestead, was also called as a witness for the plaintiff, but on cross-examination made admissions from which it might be inferred there was doubt as to the quantity of land included in the homestead.

There was also presented to the trial court for its consideration the testimony of R. E. Donahue, whom appellant admits is a civil engineer and land surveyor of ability. Mr. Donahue heard the testimony of Peter and Mack Howard, and was asked, assuming that such evidence was true, and taking the description contained in the declaration, whether or not he could locate the land. We think it may be fairly said that his answer was in the negative. But as this question was one of "pure fact" it was for the trial court to decide, and after a careful reading and consideration of a voluminous and somewhat difficult record we cannot say that the trial court was wrong in its holding.

Under issue 4 the question is asked:

> "Did the court err in sustaining the objection of counsel for defendants to the introduction in evidence of the declaration of homestead," and "in omitting to pass upon a subsequent offer in evidence * * * before the termination of the case or at all?"

The record disposes of appellant's contentions in this regard. It shows that at the trial in the lower court counsel for appellant offered the declaration of homestead in evidence four or more times. Three times he withdrew the offer. When the instrument was offered for the last time the trial judge expressed doubt as to whether or not a proper foundation had been laid for its introduction. He said that he would admit it subject to motion to strike, which was then made.

> "The point I had in mind," said the court, "was that I could decide this question when all the evidence was in, and decide the whole thing at the same time. It might be better to reserve the ruling upon the homestead until that is all in.
> "Mr. Wessels: So far as that is concerned I don't believe there would be any objection on our part to wait until the evidence is all in with reference to the admission of this homestead with the permission to renew our offer after the testimony is put in by the defendants."

And after appellant had rested the trial judge said:

"It is considered that the homestead is not in evidence, but it is offered, and the ruling on it will be reserved."

Thereafter respondents rested, and the court said:

"Anything further?"

"Mr. Wessels: Before we rest we now offer in evidence the declaration of homestead heretofore offered and under the ruling of the court with permission to reoffer the declaration of homestead.

"By the Court: It is already considered offered, and the ruling of the court upon its admission is reserved."

[6] Appellant complains that the record does not show that the court finally ruled upon the admissibility of the homestead, and that such omission is error. It is clear that the procedure followed by the court was with the acquiescence of appellant. The record shows that the principal subject of inquiry during the trial was concerning the identification of the lands described in the declaration of homestead. It seems to us to be wholly immaterial whether or not the declaration of homestead was admitted in evidence during the course of the trial, because if it had been admitted the court might well have held, as it did, that the parol evidence was insufficient to aid in the location with reasonable certainty of the land described in the instrument. Surely it is obvious that the ruling of the court was against the validity of the homestead; otherwise we would not now be considering this appeal.

Under issue 5 appellant argues that the deeds relied upon by respondents were invalid because not executed by both husband and wife. It is conceded that, if there was a valid declaration of homestead, the deeds relied upon by respondents conveyed no title. Under issue 6 appellant specifies that the trial court erred in overruling his objections to the admission of said deeds. This likewise relates to the question of the validity of the declaration of homestead, and requires no discussion.

In issue 7 appellant says that there was error by the trial court in not sustaining a motion to strike the deeds from evidence or to decide the point of their admissibility before the termination of the case. The record shows, as with the declaration of homestead, that the deeds were offered in evidence, there was an objection, and the deeds were admitted subject to a motion to strike, the trial court reserving its ruling.

The specification of error in issue 8 is as follows:

"The court erred in not holding and deciding that the judgment rendered by the superior court of Mendocino county on August 20, 1918, in the case wherein Lucia C. Hopkins, as administratrix of the estate of Ann Cleveland, deceased, was plaintiff, and Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased, was defendant, was res adjudicata as to the same issues and between the same parties in this action, and in sustaining the objection of counsel for the defendants to the introduction in evidence of the judgment roll in that case."

Before this action was commenced a stipulation was entered into between the parties to the cause referred to in issue 8, which provided in part:

"(2) That the plaintiff need take no further steps on her appeal aforesaid until after the judgment in such action, so to be commenced (referring to the case at bar), shall have become final and that the time of said plaintiff and appellant to file her transcript on appeal or her opening brief or to take any other step necessary to perfect her record on appeal shall be and is hereby extended to and including 30 days after judgment in said action so to be brought shall become final—it is the intention hereof that the said plaintiff and appellant shall have the right and she is hereby given the right to have said judgment appealed from reviewed on appeal on the facts and the merits in case final judgment shall be that the Lucy Howard land is not the property of the estate of Rachael Howard, deceased;

"(3) That, should it be finally adjudged that the Lucy Howard land is the property of the estate of Rachel Howard, the appeal from the judgment in Hopkins v. Howard shall be immediately dismissed and the land in controversy deemed a portion of the estate of Rachael Howard."

[7] It appears from the foregoing that the judgment in the case of Hopkins v. Howard was appealed from, and the effect of this stipulation is to regard that appeal as pending. Where an appeal is pending a final judgment, unless satisfied, is not evidence in bar of recovery in another action for the same cause. Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 546, 32 Pac. 589. Only final judgment can be pleaded or proven as res adjudicata. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 117 Pac. 539.

[8] In issue 9 appellant complains that the trial court erred in sustaining the objection to the introduction in evidence of the testimony of certain witnesses (now dead) in the case of Hopkins v. Howard. The record does not show that such testimony was offered or marked for identification, and there is nothing before this court which will enable us to determine whether the testimony was admissible.

Issue 10 is directed toward the rulings of the court in passing upon the admission of certain evidence. It is insisted that error was committed in sustaining objections to numerous questions asked and answered. Ruling on the admission or rejection of the evidence was rendered difficult by the fact that the principal witnesses testifying had lived for years on or near the land, and very naturally were inclined to state as facts relating to the time of entry on the land, and the time of the making of the declaration of homestead, and the extent of the land entered on, not only their conclusions, but matters which were clearly shown to have been established several years later, or matters which had been accepted for many years as current neighborhood tradition. We have read the record, and we believe that the learned trial judge committed no errors in passing upon the admissibility of evidence which are made the subject of this assignment.

In issues 11 and 12 appellant attacks the findings and judgment of the trial court as being contrary to law. It is also claimed that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence. These issues are submitted on the entire record. Likewise issue 13, which is that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for new trial. For the reasons heretofore herein given by us, it is manifestly unnecessary to discuss these last assignments of error.

Our opinion, based upon a painstaking study of the evidence and consideration of the points advanced by appellant and the law appertaining thereto, is that the judgment and order of the trial court appealed from should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

MAGNAUD et al. v. TRAEGER, Sheriff.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1924.)

1. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑45—Sheriff held bound to execute writ of possession despite stay of execution pending appeal.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1176, in an action of unlawful detainer, it was sheriff's duty to execute a writ of possession, notwithstanding an order staying execution pending appeal, where judge issuing such order was not the judge before whom case was tried and judgment rendered, and the fact that the case was tried in an extra session of the superior court pursuant to section 67b is wholly inconsequential.

2. Mandamus 🔑143(1)—Writ of mandate cannot be issued until 60 days after rendition of judgment.

The District Court of Appeal could not issue its writ of mandate to compel a sheriff to proceed with the execution of a writ of possession until expiration of 60 days designated for his return.

3. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑41—Writ of possession held functus officio as a writ of execution, where no levy made prior to return day and execution not stayed.

A writ of possession in unlawful detainer proceedings becomes functus officio in so far as it is a writ of execution commanding sheriff to satisfy that part of judgment awarding damages to plaintiffs, where no levy is made on judgment debtors' property prior to return day, and there is no order staying execution.

4. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑41—Writ of possession does not become functus officio by sheriff's failure to levy on property before return day.

Though a writ of possession in unlawful detainer for restitution of premises has become functus officio in so far as it is a fieri facias by sheriff's failure to levy on property before return day to satisfy the judgment for damages, it is still good, as it directs him to make restitution and may be executed after the return day.

5. Mandamus 🔑54 — Ordinarily proper to compel sheriff to enforce writ of possession.

Ordinarily mandamus is proper to compel a sheriff to enforce a writ of possession.

6. Sheriffs and constables 🔑98(3) — Sheriff will be protected when acting in obedience to court's writ or order showing jurisdiction on its face.

If a writ or order commanding a sheriff to do or to refrain from doing an act be legal upon its face and show an apparent jurisdiction, and court has jurisdiction of subject-matter, officer will be protected, when acting in good faith in obedience to such writ or order.

7. Sheriffs and constables 🔑98(2)—Under no legal obligation to obey a void judgment.

If a judgment be void for any reason, a sheriff is under no legal obligation to obey, and, even though jurisdiction of the subject-matter does exist, he may disregard court's fiat with impunity.

8. Mandamus 🔑54—Held proper to require sheriff to execute writ of possession in unlawful detainer proceedings.

Where sheriff refused to execute a writ of possession in unlawful detainer proceedings because of a void stay order, a writ of mandate would lie to compel him to execute the writ.

9. Sheriffs and constables 🔑98(2)—Will not be protected if obeying void precept of court.

If a court or judge is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter, a sheriff may not only refuse to obey court's precept, but will not be protected if he does obey it.

Application by Joseph Magnaud and another for a writ of mandate directed against William I. Traeger, Sheriff of Los Angeles County, to compel him to execute a writ of possession. Writ granted.

Cassell & Stafford, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Charles L. Chandler, of Los Angeles, and Melvin E. MacKinnon, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel respondent, the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to execute a writ of possession issued out of the superior court for that county in an action of unlawful detainer wherein these petitioners were the plaintiffs.

The action was tried in an extra session of the superior court for Los Angeles county before Hon. William P. Cary, a judge of the superior court for San Diego county, who presided in such extra session pursuant to the provisions of section 67b of the Code of Civil Procedure. On December 21, 1923, judgment was rendered in favor of petitioners for the restitution of the premises and for damages, and on December 31, 1923, the formal judgment, signed by Judge Cary, who meanwhile had returned to his own county, was filed. On January 2, 1924, a writ was issued out of the superior court for Los Angeles county and delivered to respondent whereby he was commanded as sheriff to place the plaintiffs in possession of the unlawfully detained premises. The writ, which was made returnable within 60 days after its receipt by respondent, also commanded the latter to satisfy the judgment for damages out of property of the judgment debtors. It thus will be seen that the writ partook of the nature of both a writ of possession for restitution of the premises and a writ of execution for the satisfaction of that part of the judgment which awarded damages to the plaintiffs in the action. No stay of proceedings upon the judgment was ever directed by Judge Cary. On December 29, 1923, a written order was signed and filed by Hon. Paul Burks, one of the judges of the superior court for Los Angeles county, ordering execution upon the judgment to be stayed pending any appeal by the defendants in the action, upon the filing of an undertaking in the sum of $2,000 pursuant to section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On January 2, 1924, the defendants filed their notice of appeal from the judgment and gave the undertaking required by Judge Burks' order. Judge Burks refuses to set aside his order and respondent insists upon obeying it. Hence the application to this court for a writ of mandate commanding respondent to proceed with the execution of the writ delivered to him on January 2, 1924.

[1] It was the duty of the sheriff to place petitioners in possession notwithstanding the order of Judge Burks. That order was a nullity. Only Judge Cary, before whom the case was tried and by whom the judgment was rendered, had jurisdiction to stay proceedings upon the judgment. In an action of unlawful detainer "an appeal taken by the defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment unless the judge or justice before whom the same was rendered so directs." Code Civ. Proc. § 1176. This section of the Code has been under review in several cases, among them the following: McDonald v. Hanlon, 71 Cal. 535, 12 Pac. 515; Gross v. Kelleher, 73 Cal. 639, 15 Pac. 362; Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong Co., 81 Cal. 222, 22 Pac. 594, 15 Am. St. Rep. 50; Cluness v. Bowen, 135 Cal. 660, 67 Pac. 1048; Bateman v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 140, 72 Pac. 922; Sarthou v. Reese, 151 Cal. 96, 90 Pac. 187; Kaiser v. Hancock, 25 Cal. App. 323, 143 Pac. 614. The language of the section is clear and unambiguous and is not in need of interpretation. By it the Legislature has declared in no uncertain terms that there can be no stay of proceedings upon an appeal from a judgment of restitution in an action of unlawful detainer unless the trial judge by whom the judgment was rendered so directs. The fact that the case was tried in an extra session of the superior court is wholly inconsequential. There is nothing in section 67b of the Code of Civil Procedure which in any wise affects the force of section 1176 and its unequivocal declaration.

It is contended by respondent that even though the order of Judge Burks be invalid the writ of mandate should not issue in this proceeding. The reasons assigned for this contention are: (1) That the life of the writ issued in the unlawful detainer action expired with the expiration of the return day named therein; (2) that because the stay order made by Judge Burks is regular upon its face respondent is neither obliged nor permitted to question it, but must obey it; and (3) that by this proceeding petitioners are attacking an order of the superior court, and that mandamus may not be used to accomplish that purpose.

[2] Has the writ which was issued to respondent as sheriff of Los Angeles county ceased to have any force? That writ, it will be recalled, was received by respondent on the day of its issuance, January 2, 1924, and was made returnable within 60 days thereafter. The present proceeding in mandamus to compel respondent to proceed with the execution of the writ was initiated in this court January 22, 1924. Not only has the full period of 60 days within which to make return of the writ now elapsed, but in the very nature of things no writ of mandate could have been issued by this court within the time designated for the sheriff's return, even though we had rendered our judgment immediately upon the submission of this proceeding. One-third of the time fixed for the sheriff's return had elapsed before the petition for mandamus was filed here; and this court has no jurisdiction to issue its writ of mandate until the expiration of 60 days from the rendition of its judgment. People v. District Court of Appeal (Cal. Sup.) 222 Pac. 353. The inquiry is thus reduced to the question whether the writ which was issued under the judgment in the unlawful detainer action has become functus officio by lapse of time.

[3] In so far as the writ is of the nature of a fieri facias, i. e., in so far as it is a writ of execution commanding respondent to satisfy that part of the judgment which awards damages to the plaintiffs in the action, its force has unquestionably been spent. No levy ever was made upon the property of the judgment debtors prior to the return day. In the enforcement of a writ of execution issued upon a common-law judgment for money the levy is the essential act by which the property is set apart for the satisfaction of the judgment, and the officer's authority to make the levy is limited to the return day of the writ. Southern California L. Co. v. Hotel Co., 94 Cal. 217, 29 Pac. 627, 28 Am. St. Rep. 115. Petitioners have cited authorities which support the proposition that when a stay of proceedings is ordered the time of the stay is not to be computed as part of the time in which the writ runs to the return day. We have no quarrel with this rule nor with the authorities which sustain it. But here there was no order staying execution. What purports to be such an order was a mere nullity. It was a stillborn, lifeless thing, and in the eye of the law was inexistent.

[4] Though the writ has become functus officio and ineffective in so far as it is a fieri facias commanding the sheriff to satisfy the judgment for damages it still possesses life and efficacy in so far as it is a writ of possession directing the sheriff to make restitution of the premises. In precepts for the sale of property under a decree foreclosing a lien upon specific real property the time within which the sale is directed to be made is but directory, and the sale may be made after the return day. Southern California L. Co v. Hotel Co., supra. In such cases the lien is not created by a levy, nor is it created by or under the writ. So, also, in cases of unlawful detainer, the right to dispossess is not the outgrowth of the writ. The judgment gives in terms the right of re-entry and restitution. The only office of the writ of possession is to enforce such right. In cases of that character the writ is the visible authority for doing in fact that which the judgment determines as done in law already. The position of the parties to the unlawful detainer action is the same before the return day as after, and no greater reason can exist why the writ of possession in such cases should be executed in whole or in part within the 60 days than must arise on a writ for the sale of real estate under a decree of court. It would seem, therefore, that the two writs are analogous, and that both may be fully executed after the return day. It was so held in Witbeck v. Van Rensselaer, 2 Hun, 55, affirmed in 64 N. Y. 27. Mr. Freeman, referring to this New York case, says that—

> "The latest and best-considered decision on the subject indicates that such writs [of possession] remain in force irrespective of the lapse of time, until their actual execution." Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) vol. 3, § 473.

[5] The fact that the order which Judge Burks signed is regular upon its face does not present an insuperable barrier to the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel respondent to restore petitioners to possession. The authorities are unanimous in holding that mandamus, under ordinary circumstances, is the proper means for compelling a sheriff to enforce a writ of possession. Fremont v. Crippen, 10 Cal. 211, 70 Am. Dec. 711; North Pacific Coast R. Co. v. Gardner, 79 Cal. 213, 21 Pac. 735; Quan Wo Chung & Co. v. Laumeister, 83 Cal. 384, 23 Pac. 320, 17 Am. St. Rep. 261; Webster v. Ballou, 108 Me. 522. Indeed, this much seems to be conceded by respondent. He insists, however, that it is not a sheriff's duty to sit in judgment upon judicial acts, and that therefore where, as here, a judge of the trial court has made an order staying proceedings, mandamus will not lie to compel him to disobey that order even though it be a nullity.

[6, 7] Without doubt, if a writ or an order commanding a sheriff to do or to refrain from doing an act be legal upon its face and show an apparent jurisdiction, and if the court issuing the writ or making the order has jurisdiction of the subject matter, the officer will be protected when in good faith he acts in obedience to the writ or to the order. But the rule which justifies an officer who acts under an apparently regular order or process is one of protection merely. It is a shield, but not a sword. Wilson v. Sawyer, 37 Ala. 631. If the court have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, then, even though its judgment be void, as, for example, if it be void for want of jurisdiction over the person, the officer, if sued for damages, may defend under the writ. 24 R. C. L., title "Sheriffs," § 88. But, though the sheriff may defend if he obeys the court's command, he cannot build any adverse rights upon a void order or upon a writ issued under a void judgment. Wilson v. Sawyer, supra. If the court have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the sheriff, if he obeys, will be protected; but if the judgment be void for any reason he is under no legal obligation to obey, even though jurisdiction of the subject-matter does exist, and he may disregard the court's fiat with impunity. In Ward v. Deadman, 124 Ala. 288, 26 South. 916, 82 Am. St. Rep. 172, the court said:

> "If the judgment was void, the constable could have availed himself of this, as a defense for not obeying its mandate; but in such case, the execution will operate to protect him in its execution." (Italics ours.)

In Commonwealth v. Magee, 8 Pa. 240, 44 Am. Dec. 509, the court, without expressly deciding the question, bases its decision upon the assumption that if a stay order be made by a judge who is without authority of law to make it, the sheriff is under no obligation to obey it, and he may proceed to execute the writ notwithstanding the judge's order. There the court used this language:

> "The inquiry is thus reduced to the single question, whether his [the judge's] order to stay proceedings was obligatory on the sheriff, or a nullity, commanding neither respect nor obedience."

The court then proceeds to show that in that case the judge did have authority to make the order, and that because the order was authorized by law its effect was to hang up the execution until after the return day, the court saying:

> "The power of acting residing in the judge, it is no part of the sheriff's business to inquire whether it has been executed in an orderly manner, or to determine how far the steps properly precedent to the order have been taken. In this respect, the fiat at chambers is analogous to a writ, which the sheriff is bound to execute, though it be irregular; the distinction being between process voidable for irregularity, and process void by lack of jurisdiction of the subject." (Italics ours.)

The cases relied upon by respondent are not in point. In the case upon which he seems to place the greatest reliance, Buffandeau v. Edmondson, 17 Cal. 438, 79 Am. Dec. 139, the order which directed the issuance of the injunction to restrain the sheriff from proceeding under the writ of execution was made by a court of competent jurisdiction; and though the order may have been erroneous, it certainly was not void.

[8, 9] We know of no case which questions the right of the sheriff to inquire into the jurisdiction of the court or judge to make the stay order. Indeed, many of the decisions expressly recognize such right. Thus, in Williams v. Stewart, 12 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 533, the court says:

> "The record shows the fiat of the circuit judge, directing the supersedeas to issue, and beyond this the sheriff need not look. It is not for him to inquire into the propriety of the grant of the fiat but only as to the jurisdiction of the court to grant it." (Italics ours.)

In the present case the stay order was a nullity. The subject-matter of the order, i. e., the stay of proceedings under a writ of restitution in an unlawful detainer action was one which lay wholly outside the jurisdiction of the judge who signed the order. It is well-established that if the court or judge is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter the sheriff not only may refuse to obey a precept from such court or judge, but he will not be protected if he does obey it. In such cases the officer is without authority to act under the void precept. 24 R. C. L., title "Sheriffs," § 88.

There is no merit in respondent's point that "mandamus is not the proper remedy to use to attack an order staying execution." The writ of mandate is not sought for the purpose of attacking the stay order. Its direct purpose is to compel respondent to perform a duty enjoined upon him by law. And if between that duty and its performance respondent sees fit to interpose a void order, it cannot be said that the purpose of the mandamus is to attack that order merely because it is our duty to disregard it and to treat it as an unbegotten thing.

It is ordered that the peremptory writ of mandate issue commanding respondent to execute the writ in so far as it is a writ of possession directing the sheriff to make restitution of the premises.

PEOPLE v. HINSHAW. (Cr. 2544.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1134(10)—Denial of motions to set aside information and in arrest of judgment and disallowance of demurrer reviewable only on appeal from judgment.

Orders denying motion to set aside amended information, disallowing demurrer, and denying motion in arrest of judgment, are not appealable, but will be reviewed on appeal from judgment.

2. Criminal law 🔑211(1)—Complaint need not state elements of crime charged with technical nicety of indictment or information.

Complaint is practically deposition only, and should state essential elements of crime charged to common certainty, but not necessarily with all technical nicety of indictment or information.

3. Indictment and information 🔑140(1)—Facts in motion to set aside information not taken as true without proof.

Facts in motion to set aside information will not be taken as true without proof, in absence of which there is no error in denying motion on ground stated in Pen. Code, § 995, that defendant was not committed by magistrate.

4. Criminal law 🔑213—Imperfections of complaint cured if magistrate's examination warrants commitment.

When magistrate's examination of charge and evidence warrants order holding defendant to answer, imperfections of complaint are cured, and commitment is legal.

5. Indictment and information 🔑137(5)—Sufficiency of complaint not questioned before committing magistrate cannot be attacked on motion to set aside information.

If sufficiency of complaint to justify warrant of arrest is not questioned before committing magistrate, it cannot be attacked on motion to set aside information, which is based on commitment, into which complaint is merged; district attorney being authorized to file information for any offense shown by depositions.

6. Criminal law 🔑211(1)—Complaint stating offense in terms of statute sufficient to authorize commitment.

Complaint stating offense in terms of statute vests magistrate with jurisdiction to consider evidence in support of charge, and hence is sufficient to authorize commitment, which depends on evidence rather than pleading.

7. Criminal law 🔑241—Indictment and information 🔑122(1)—Commitment held for offense charged in complaint, and to warrant information therefor in greater detail; "deposition."

Commitment stating that offense in "within deposition mentioned," etc., was committed, committed defendant for trial for offense stated in "complaint," the words as so used being equivalent, and hence warranted information charging such offense, though in greater detail.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deposition.]

8. Criminal law 🔑1144(9)—Preliminary examination presumed regularly held, and evidence sufficient to justify commitment received in absence of transcript.

In absence of transcript of testimony and proceedings on preliminary examination, in support of motion to set aside information, it must be presumed that preliminary examination was regularly held, and evidence sufficient to justify commitment received, especially as remedy, if evidence is insufficient, is specially provided by writ of habeas corpus under Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7.

9. Indictment and information 🔑161(9)—District attorney may amend information by describing offense in greater detail than complaint and commitment.

District attorney may amend indictment or information for felonious assault under Pen. Code, § 245, by describing same offense with more detail as to means employed and force used than is alleged in complaint and commitment.

10. Indictment and information 🔑161(9)—Error in Christian name of complaining witness held cured by correction before jury was impaneled and sworn.

Error in Christian name of complaining witness in complaint, commitment, and original and amended informations held cured by correction of the amended information made by permission before jury was impaneled and sworn.

11. Criminal law 🔑1167(1)—Error in Christian name of complaining witness held not prejudicial.

Error in Christian name of complaining witness in complaint, commitment, and original and amended informations held not prejudicial; surname being correctly alleged.

12. Indictment and information 🔑81(1)—Sufficiency of identification of criminal act held not affected by error in Christian name of complaining witness.

Sufficiency of identification of criminal act charged held not affected by error in Christian name of complaining witness as stated in information, under Pen. Code, § 956.

13. Assault and battery 🔑77—Indictment and information 🔑63, 65, 71—Information for assault held to sufficiently allege means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, and sufficiently certain, and not to plead evidence on conclusions.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 245, for felonious assault, amended information alleging assault with fists and hands on head and face, resulting in fractured jaw and other grievous injuries, held sufficient, as against demurrer on grounds stated in sections 950–952, and against objections of stating conclusions and pleading evidence, to charge assault "by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury," though "means" and "force" were charged conjunctively, and physical disparity between defendant and complaining witness or fact that latter was taken by surprise and struck from behind was not alleged.

14. Criminal law 🔑1159(1)—Evidence reviewed, on appeal from conviction of felonious assault, only to determine whether jury could have found that assault was felonious.

Supreme Court, on appeal from conviction of felonious assault (Pen. Code, § 245), will not determine facts, which are for jury and court below, but will review evidence only to determine whether, as matter of law, jury could have found that assault was felonious within statute.

15. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Insufficiency of amended information held not reversible error.

Insufficiency of amended information to allege felonious assault within Pen. Code, § 245, held not reversible error, in view of evidence; there being no miscarriage of justice, as required by Const. art. 6, § 4½, nor any prejudice to defendant within Pen. Code, §§ 960, 1258, 1404.

16. Criminal law 🔑165—When plea of once in jeopardy will lie stated.

Plea of once in jeopardy will not lie, in either felony or misdemeanor case, unless there has been former acquittal or conviction on valid indictment or information before competent court, and jury has been impaneled and sworn.

17. Criminal law 🔑178—Dismissal of complaint for simple assault before jury was impaneled and sworn not bar to conviction thereof in subsequent prosecution for felonious assault.

Dismissal of complaint charging simple assault (Pen. Code, §§ 240, 241) before jury was impaneled and sworn does not bar conviction thereof in subsequent prosecution, under section 245, for felonious assault.

18. Criminal law 🔑178—Further prosecution not barred by dismissal of misdemeanor complaint where felony complaint was filed before motion to dismiss.

Under Pen. Code, § 1387, declaring dismissal of misdemeanor complaint bar to further prosecution, unless order is explicitly made for purpose of amending pleading further prosecution is not barred where felony complaint was filed before motion to dismiss was made.

19. Criminal law 🔑406(6)—Defendant's admission of statement made held admissible to rebut presumption of innocence.

In prosecution for felonious assault, testimony as to defendant's admission that he stated in county jail that he had hit man and broken his jaw held properly admitted under Code Civ. Proc. § 1832, and section 1870, subd. 2, as tending to rebut presumption of innocence, though he did not deny assault.

20. Criminal law 🔑1168(2)—Admission of testimony as to defendant's admission of assault before establishment of corpus delicti held not prejudicial error.

In prosecution for felonious assault, admission of testimony as to defendant's admission of assault before establishment of corpus delicti held not prejudicial error, especially as assault was not denied.

21. Criminal law 🔑364(3), 368(3), 419, 420(1)—Statements of witness and defendant to officers after assault held hearsay, and not part of res gestæ.

In prosecution for felonious assault, testimony as to what complaining witness and defendant said to policeman and arresting officer, respectively, after defendant had left scene of assault, held properly excluded as hearsay, and not part of res gestæ.

22. Assault and battery 🔑84—Testimony as to defendant's hostile declarations concerning complaining witness held admissible.

In prosecution for felonious assault, testimony as to defendant's hostile declarations concerning complaining witness held admissible as tending to reflect defendant's state of mind at time of assault.

23. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—Refusal to permit cross-examination as to prior statement by witness held not error in view of his subsequent denial.

In prosecution for felonious assault, refusal to allow complaining witness to answer question, on cross-examination, as to whether he had not said to defendant before assault that he would make monkey out of him before he left, as testified to by defendant's witness, held not error, in view of his subsequent denial.

24. Criminal law 🔑742(1)—Acceptance of eyewitness' testimony solely for jury.

Whether eyewitness' testimony should be accepted is solely for jury.

25. Criminal law 🔑1035(3)—Error in court's remark to defendant while testifying not considered in absence of objection or request for admonitory instruction.

Error in court's remark to defendant, in effort to have him speak louder while testifying, need not be considered, in absence of objection or request for admonitory instruction at time.

26. Criminal law 🔑1171(1)—Objection to district attorney's remarks at time of application for probation not considered.

Objection to district attorney's remarks, at time of application for probation, after verdict and denial of motions for trial and in arrest of judgment, need not be considered.

27. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Omission from instruction of portion substantially given elsewhere not error.

Omission from instruction of portion substantially given elsewhere is not error.

28. Criminal law 🔑811(6)—Instruction singling out defendant as witness and charging as to his testimony improper.

Instruction singling out defendant as witness and charging as to his testimony is improper.

29. Criminal law 🔑814(17)—Instruction on circumstantial evidence held not objectionable.

Instruction that, if evidence, direct or circumstantial, was sufficient to establish defendant's guilt, jury should so find, held not objectionable as leading jury to consider circumstances not connected with case.

30. Criminal law 🔑761(11)—Instruction held not erroneous as charging that defendant started fight premeditating felonious assault.

Abstract instruction that self-defense is not available to one seeking quarrel to force deadly issue, and thus create real or apparent necessity for making felonious assault, held not erroneous as practically charging that defendant started fight with premeditation to make felonious assault.

31. Assault and battery 🔑67—Self-defense not available to one seeking quarrel to force deadly issue.

Self-defense is not available to one seeking quarrel to force deadly issue, and thus create, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, real or apparent necessity for making felonious assault.

32. Criminal law 🔑554—Whether defendant believed he was in danger at time of assault is for jury.

Jurors are final judges as to whether defendant believed he was in danger at time of alleged felonious assault, and may reject his testimony that he did so believe.

33. Criminal law 🔑770(3)—Hypothetical instruction on disputed question as to defendant's reason for flight held not error.

Hypothetical instruction on disputed question whether defendant left scene of assault because of consciousness of guilt or to avoid being struck by rocks thrown by complaining witness held not error.

34. Assault and battery 🔑55—Instruction to acquit if defendant did not use deadly weapon nor intend to commit murder held properly refused.

In prosecution for assault with intent to do great bodily harm, instruction to acquit if defendant did not use deadly weapon nor intend to commit murder was properly refused.

35. Assault and battery 🔑96(9)—Instruction that offense could be only misdemeanor unless means used was other than fists held misleading.

In prosecution for assault with intent to do great bodily harm, instruction that, unless means used was something other than defendant's fists, offense could be only misdemeanor, held properly refused as misleading, in view of evidence.

36. Criminal law 🔑814(1)—No issue as to deadly weapons being involved, instruction that fists and hands are not deadly weapons properly refused.

In prosecution for assault with intent to do great bodily harm, where it was not claimed that deadly weapon was used, instruction that fists and hands are not deadly weapons was properly refused.

37. Criminal law 🔑761(6)—Instruction held properly refused as invading jury's province on subject of self-defense.

In prosecution for assault with intent to do great bodily harm, instruction that breaking of jaw is not probable consequence of blow with bare fists, that defendant is not presumed to have intended such result, and that if he did not so intend crime could be no more than misdemeanor, held properly refused as invading jury's province on subject of self-defense.

38. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(6)—Instruction that disparity in size of parties had nothing to do with defendant's guilt held properly refused.

In prosecution for assault with intent to do great bodily harm, instruction that disparity in size of defendant and complaining witness had nothing to do with defendant's guilt or innocence held properly refused as violating Const. art. 6, § 19.

39. Assault and battery 🔑96(9)—Good reputation for honesty, truth, and integrity not involved in charge of assault to do great bodily harm.

Defendant's good reputation for honesty, truth, and integrity is not involved in charge of assault with intent to do great bodily harm.

40. Criminal law 🔑829(9)—Instruction on presumption of innocence held unnecessary.

Instruction on presumption of innocence held unnecessary in view of entire charge.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Mike Hinshaw was convicted of assault with intent to do great bodily harm, and appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction under section 245 of the Penal Code, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The inclusion in the notice of appeal of "all other orders * * * denying and overruling the various applications of the defendant * * *" probably refers to the orders denying the motion to set aside the amended information, disallowing the demurrer, and denying the motion in arrest of judgment, none of which is appealable. They will, however, be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment.

At the time of the trouble out of which the charge grew, the complaining witness, Robert Ritter, and the defendant were rival newsboys in the city of Los Angeles. Ritter was selling the Los Angeles Herald and the defendant the Los Angeles Express. At the time of the alleged assault they were selling papers at the corner of Fifth and Hill streets. One Isidore Gralla was also a newsboy. Before selling the Express in Los Angeles he attended a college in Berkeley and sold newspapers in Oakland. It was during this period that he met the defendant. While in Los Angeles he handled at Fifth and Hill streets three papers, including the Herald and the Express, and remained there until within two weeks of the alleged assault, when he established himself at Seventh and Alvarado streets, and employed the defendant to sell papers at Fifth and Hill streets for the purpose "of helping push the sales of the Express particularly." Gralla testified that "the Express sort of guaranteed me to make up for what I lost getting those Heralds for this reason, if I would give them a little special representation there on the Express; but they didn't really hire me." The people claimed that the defendant was under engagement with Gralla to get Ritter off of the corner of Fifth and Hill streets within a week, and that the week had not expired when Ritter was injured. A further statement of the facts of the case will later appear in a review of the evidence.

The defendant was arraigned upon the charge, and following the interposition and denial of a motion to set aside the amended information and the filing and disallowance of a demurrer he pleaded not guilty. Upon the trial the following verdict was rendered:

> "We, the jury in the above entitled action, find the defendant guilty of assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury, a felony, as charged in the information."

In due course the defendant was arraigned for judgment, and motions for a new trial and arrest of judgment were respectively interposed and denied; whereupon the defendant was sentenced to serve a term prescribed by law in the penitentiary at San Quentin.

1. The first point urged for reversal is that the court erred in denying the appellant's motion to set aside the amended information.

The grounds of the motion were:

> "(I) That before the filing of the amended information the defendant had not been legally committed by the magistrate; (II) that the transcript of the testimony taken before the committing magistrate [?] that no offense has been committed of which the court has jurisdiction; and (III) that the said transcript and testimony does not show that there was any evidence from which the committing magistrate could conclude that there was reasonable cause to believe the defendant guilty of any offense of which this court had jurisdiction."

When the case was called after the filing of the first information the district attorney moved for a continuance to file an amended information, which motion was granted, and subsequently the amended information was filed.

It is also urged in support of the motion that the amended information charged a different offense than that contained in the complaint and in the order of commitment. The complaint alleged that "the crime of assault, a felony, was committed by Mike Hinshaw, who, at the time and place aforesaid, did then and there, with force and violence, * * * in and upon the person of one William Ritter, make an assault, which said assault was likely to and did produce great bodily injury" upon the person of the complaining witness. In the order of commitment the language is:

> "The offense in the within deposition mentioned, to wit, assault, a felony, has been committed."

The allegations of the amended information appear in connection with the discussion of the demurrer. This contention is supplemented by the claim that "the crime charged in the complaint and the crime charged in the commitment are not crimes known and described in any sections of the penal laws of the state of California," and is apparently based on the theory—insisted upon by appellant throughout—that he was not charged with a felony in the complaint, nor in the amended information, nor was he held to answer for a felony, nor does the evidence show he was convicted of a felony. We shall consider under point 2 the sufficiency of the amended information as matter of pleading.

Two grounds are stated in section 995 for the setting aside of an information: (1) "That before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate"; and (2) that it was not subscribed by the district attorney.

[2] "The complaint is practically a deposition only. It should state the essential elements of the crime charged to a common certainty, but it is not necessary that it should do so with all the technical nicety of an indictment or information." 7 Cal. Jur. 103.

[3] With respect to the sufficiency of the complaint under a motion to set aside, it has been held that it is intended only as a basis for a warrant of arrest, and that objections thereto must be availed of while the defendant is under the warrant of arrest. 7 Cal. Jur. 103, citing, among other authorities, People v. Warner, 147 Cal. 546, 82 Pac. 196; People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 Pac. 1028; People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 Pac.

984. See, also, People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 Pac. 369. It is not claimed nor disclosed that the complaint was attacked before the committing magistrate on the ground it did not state a public offense. Facts in the motion to set aside an information will not be taken as true without any proof as to the matter, and without such proof there is no error in denying the motion on the ground the defendant had never been committed by a magistrate. People v. Williams, 84 Cal. 616, 24 Pac. 145.

> "When a charge has been examined by a magistrate and the evidence taken, and the examination warrants an order holding the defendant to answer, the imperfections of the complaint are cured, and the commitment is legal. People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 Pac. 894. In the late case of People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 Pac. 1028, in considering the point made by appellant in support of his motion to set aside the information on various grounds antecedent to the commitment by the examining magistrate, this court said: 'The object of the statute in providing for the issuance of a warrant of arrest is that the defendant may appear before a committing magistrate, and when he is once there, and an examination of the case is had in pursuance of the terms of the statute, and the defendant is held to answer, a foundation is laid for the filing of an information by the district attorney. The regularity of the proceeding by information did not, therefore, depend in any manner upon the affidavit on which the warrant of arrest was issued, and had no connection with it,' referring to the case of People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457. And, continuing: 'If there be anything inconsistent with these views in the two Department cases of People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043, and People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342, cited by appellant, they must be considered, so far as they are thus inconsistent, as overruled by the other cases above cited.' (Citing several cases.) The presumptions are that the proceedings leading up to the commitment of the defendant by the magistrate were regularly conducted, and it is necessary, therefore, for the appellant to produce some showing to the contrary, which has not been done in this case."

We quote from People v. Sacramento Butchers' Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 471, 478:

> "The instrument upon which the warrant of arrest is authorized to be issued by a magistrate in the case of an indictable offense is not a 'complaint' in the sense that it is a pleading, but is practically a deposition only, setting forth the facts stated by the informant, sufficiently showing the commission of an offense and its perpetration by the defendant to justify the issuance of a warrant of arrest by the magistrate. Pen. Code, §§ 811, 812. The commitment is based upon all the depositions and not alone upon the so-called complaint, and the information is in turn founded upon the order of commitment."

[5, 6] It is plain from the authorities that if the sufficiency of the complaint to justify the issuance of a warrant of arrest is not questioned before the committing magistrate, it cannot be attacked on a motion to set aside; that the information is based on the commitment, and not on the complaint—that the latter is merged in the former—and that the district attorney may file an information for any offense shown by the depositions. It follows that, considered with reference to the meaning of "legally committed," the complaint is sufficient in any case if it states an offense in the terms of the statute, for such a complaint would vest the magistrate with jurisdiction to consider the evidence offered in support of the charge so far as the subject-matter is concerned, and the holding of the defendant for trial would depend on the evidence, and not the pleading.

[7, 8] The question is then presented whether the commitment was sufficient to warrant the filing of an information in this case. It has been held that the word "deposition" in a commitment is the equivalent of "complaint." The appellant was therefore committed for trial for the offense stated in the complaint, and whether the holding over was justified must rest upon two propositions: Was the offense charged in the amended information the same as that for which the appellant was held for trial? and Was a preliminary examination held at which evidence was received? As to the first proposition it has been shown that the complaint upon which the commitment is made to depend did purport to charge the conventional offense of assault with means and force likely to produce great bodily injury as prescribed by section 245, and the identical offense is charged, only with more detail, in the amended information. With reference to the second proposition, we have not found in the record that the transcript of the testimony and proceedings on the preliminary examination was offered in support of the motion to set aside the information. It must therefore be presumed that a preliminary examination was regularly held, and that evidence sufficient to justify the commitment was actually received. People v. Williams, supra. Without regard to this question, however, and dealing with the meaning of the term "legally committed by a magistrate," it was declared in People v. Beach, supra:

> "It is contended that the defendants had not been legally committed because the evidence before the magistrate did not show that a public offense had been committed. If the magistrate had no power or jurisdiction to hold the examination, if no complaint had been made charging the defendants with a public offense, and perhaps if no evidence at all was taken by the magistrate, and there was no waiver by the defendants, it might be held that the defendants had not been legally committed. People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655. The phrase 'legally committed' refers to the examination of the charge and holding the defendant to answer by the magistrate. Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84. If a magistrate, upon a complaint duly made and charging a public offense, has heard the evidence and has committed the defendant, that ends the matter so far as concerns this motion.

> "The question here is not, as upon habeas corpus, whether a person is illegally deprived of his liberty, but whether he can legally be tried upon a criminal charge. A preliminary examination and commitment by a magistrate is required before an information can be filed, and an examination by a grand jury before an indictment, not so much to protect the liberties of the citizen as to protect them from being prosecuted upon slight evidence or mere suspicion, or at the instigation of private malice. A trial before a jury must still be had before a final judgment can be made depriving an accused person of his liberty. * * * The right to have a charge dismissed is regulated by statute, and, as we have seen, the phrase 'legally committed' means only that the accused has been committed by a magistrate who has jurisdiction to hold the examination, and who has actually heard the evidence and determined that probable cause exists for holding the defendant. The point was decided in People v. More, 68 Cal. 500. Counsel attempt a distinction on the ground that the alleged defect there was that venue was not shown, but the difference is not obvious. If the point was founded in fact there as here the evidence failed to show an offense for which the magistrate could legally hold the accused person. The decision was a construction of section 995 of the Penal Code, and holds that, on the motion to set aside the information, the superior court cannot review and overrule the finding of the magistrate that the evidence taken before him was sufficient."

In connection with the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the holding on preliminary examination it is proper to point out that a remedy is specially provided by the writ of habeas corpus under subdivision 7, § 1487, of the Penal Code.

[9] Referring again to the contention that the amended information charged a different offense than that covered by the complaint and the commitment we quote from appellant's brief:

> "The district attorney in filing the amended information in this action has taken greater liberties with this complaint and commitment than is allowed under the law. [Here follows a statement of what is alleged in the complaint.] There is no suggestion that it was by means or force likely to produce great bodily injury in the language of section 245 of the Penal Code. The district attorney * * * has no authority to amend or modify the complaint and commitment on which the defendant was examined. * * * He cannot add anything thereto in describing the offense for which he would try the defendant. * * * In the case at bar he charged the defendant with a different assault than the one on which he was examined, and against a different person. * * * So the district attorney was entirely wanting in authority to add to the description of the offense as he attempted to do in the amended information. Neither could he under the law charge the alleged offense to have been committed against Robert Ritter when the complaint on which defendant was examined by the magistrate alleged it to be committed against William Ritter."

Appellant has cited a number of authorites to the effect that the district attorney has no authority to file an information for a different offense than the one shown by the commitment. People v. Parker, 91 Cal. 91, 27 Pac. 537; People v. Wallace, 94 Cal. 497, 29 Pac. 950; People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043; People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342. These authorities involve section 809 of the Penal Code; but the distinction must be observed between charging a different offense and charging the same offense differently. The district attorney in drawing the information is not confined to the allegations of the complaint, provided he charges the same offense for which the defendant is held. This is the meaning of the authorities above cited, as well as People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514, 163 Pac. 506; People v. Miller, 34 Cal. App. 641, 168 Pac. 574; People v. Wilhite, 49 Cal. App. 246, 193 Pac. 151; People v. Liberty, 39 Cal. App. 360, 170 Pac. 868. It was said in Ex parte Chambers, 32 Cal. App. 476, 163 Pac. 223:

> "The amendment of an indictment or information by the district attorney is permitted, subject to the limitation that the amendment shall be [made] as to matters of form only and not in matters of substance."

In that case the amendment made more certain the date of the instrument set out in the indictment, which date formed the basis of the charge of perjury involved. As already stated, the complaint and the amended information herein charged and the commitment held appellant for the same offense. An assault, a felony, under that branch of section 245, was the basis of the prosecution, but the amended information in describing the offense went more into details as to the means employed and the force used in the commission of the assault. This was clearly within the rule. Although the appellant claims the amended information charges a different offense than the complaint, he has not pointed out wherein it does.

[10-12] With respect to the error in the name of the complaining witness in the complaint, the commitment, and in both informations, it may be stated that, according to the reporter's transcript, permission was given to correct the name in the amended information and the correction was made before the jury was impaneled and sworn. In any event no prejudice could have resulted, as the surname was correctly alleged. Moreover, it cannot be maintained that the criminal act was not sufficiently identified without the correct Christian name. Section 956,

Pen. Code. The motion to set aside the amended information was properly denied.

[13] 2. We will consider the demurrer under this head. It is insisted that the amended information fails to charge a felonious assault. The charging part of the first information reads:

> 'That the said Mike Hinshaw * * * did then and there, with force and violence, * * * feloniously in and upon the person of one William Ritter make an assault, which said assault was likely to and did produce great bodily injury to and upon the person of said William Ritter."

In amending the information the following allegations in brackets were added:

> "[In that he, the said Mike Hinshaw, did then and there * * * strike and beat the said Robert Ritter about the head and body and did then and there strike and beat the said Robert Ritter about and upon the head and face with his fists and hands with all the force and violence that he, the said defendant, Mike Hinshaw, was then and there able to exercise, and which said striking and beating did then and there cause the fracture of the jaw of the said Robert Ritter, together with other grievous bodily injuries, and which said striking and beating was by means likely to and which did produce great bodily injury to the said Robert Ritter.]"

Paragraphs (a) and (b) of specification I may be passed as not having any place in a demurrer. The remaining specifications—II, III, IV, V, and VI—are on the grounds mentioned in sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, to which are added certain special grounds. Section 954 is also mentioned, but we do not perceive its applicability. Apart from the conventional grounds of demurrer it is alleged that the amended information does not state the means used by which it was intended to charge that the appellant employed means likely to produce great bodily injury; whether the appellant used some other instrument than his fists and hands in order to do the injuries complained of, or whether "it is simply intended to charge that the defendant committed a battery upon the prosecuting witness, and no more;" "whether and by what means the force and violence complained of that did the damage and injury to the prosecuting witness was applied other than with his fists and hands;" and that it states no cause of action coming within the jurisdiction of the superior court, and is in fact nothing but a complaint for the commission of a battery. We quote from appellant's answer to the petition for hearing in this court:

> "The amended information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense under the laws of the state of California, in this: That there is no specification of the means used to produce great bodily harm other than the fist; * * * that the use of the fist is not the use and means likely to produce great bodily harm, and no other means are specified. The allegations of the pleader in the amended information that the said defendant 'did then and there strike and beat the said William Ritter about and upon the head and face with his fists and hands with all the force and violence that the said defendant Mike Hinshaw was then and there able to exercise' is not an allegation of fact, but simply a conclusion of the pleader, and the next portion of said amended information, which reads as follows: 'And which said striking and beating did then and there cause the fracture of the jaw of the said William Ritter, together with other grievous bodily injury'—is a pleading of evidence and not the statement of a public offense. The next assertion in said amended information, as follows: 'And which said striking and beating was by means likely to and which did produce great bodily injury to the said William Ritter'—is not an allegation of any of the elements of an assault, a felony, which says that the assault must be by means likely to and which did produce great bodily injury. The last quotation from the amended information is but a statement of a conclusion of the pleader, and not a statement of the fact."

Appellant has cited People v. Perales, 141 Cal. 581, 75 Pac. 170, which held that the phrase "with a heavy wooden stick" did not charge a felonious assault; People v. Brown, 42 Cal. App. 462, 183 Pac. 829, wherein "with a rawhide whip on the naked body" was declared sufficient to charge a felonious assault under that portion of section 245; People v. Emmons, 61 Cal. 487, holding the allegation that the defendant "with force and violence did then and there seize and throw out of the attic window * * * situate in the third story," referring to the complaining witness, sufficiently charged the offense; and People v. Pape, 66 Cal. 366, 5 Pac. 621, which declared sufficient an allegation of the means used in an assault with a deadly weapon—"by means of the explosion of gunpowder." Appellant also relies on the following language in People v. Munn, 65 Cal. 212, 3 Pac. 651, wherein murder was charged, and a verdict in the second degree rendered:

> "It may be conceded that an assault with the fist, or without the use of a deadly weapon, may be made in such a manner and under such circumstances as to make the killing murder, but the law draws a broad distinction in cases generally between an assault committed with a deadly weapon, and a simple assault and battery. The former amounts to a felony, whereas the other is merely a misdemeanor."

People v. Murat, 45 Cal. 281, is cited to the proposition that—

> "An assault made without the use of a deadly weapon with intent to do mere bodily harm and not to do murder, is a misdemeanor, nothing more."

This language is quoted:

> "But an assault made with intent not to commit murder, but only to do a lesser bodily harm, is not constituted a felony, unless such an assault were made with a deadly weapon, or by resort to means of a deadly nature. The character of the particular agency employed by the prisoner in making such an assault is of the substance of the offense, as constituting it a felony, for an assault made without the use of a deadly weapon, with intent to do mere bodily harm, and not to do murder, is a misdemeanor, nothing more."

The point to the contention is that, if there was any physical disparity between appellant and the complaining witness, or that the latter had been taken off his guard at the time he was struck, and either or both of these elements constituted the force behind the impact which rendered the assault felonious, such fact or facts should have been alleged. The statute uses "means" and "force" in the disjunctive, and the amended information charged in the conjunctive. It would be sufficient, however, if either "means" or "force" was alone alleged. In the course of the oral argument, in reply to a question put to him by the court, counsel for appellant answered that, if the physical disparity had been alleged, the pleading would have been sufficient. It is alleged that appellant, with all the force and violence he was able to exercise, did strike and beat the complaining witness about and upon the head and face with his fists and hands, and that such striking and beating fractured his jaw and caused other grievous bodily injuries.

Concerning section 245, it was said in People v. Perales, supra, as to the allegation that the means used was "a heavy wooden stick":

> "While it is the general rule that it is sufficient to charge an offense in the language of the statute, yet this rule is subject to the qualification that, where a more particular statement of facts is necessary in order to charge the offense definitely and certainly, it must be made. * * * The term, however, 'or by any means of [or] force' likely to produce great bodily injury, immediately following in the section, is a general and comprehensive term designed to embrace many and various means or forces, which, aside from a deadly weapon or instrument, may be used in making an assault. What these means or forces may be, other than that they must be such as are likely to produce great bodily injury, the statute does not declare or define. As an example of such means it specifies a deadly weapon; as to any other means its language is general and indefinite. * * * A 'heavy wooden stick' is not ex vi termini a deadly weapon, or a deadly instrument. Nor does this description suffice to show that it is either. Neither, as described, is it necessarily a means likely to produce great bodily injury. In fact, it is not described at all, except by the indefinite statement that it was 'heavy.' Describing a stick as 'heavy' imparts no certain information; the term is relative; a stick which in the hands of a boy, or a feeble person, would be considered heavy, in the hands of a robust person would be deemed light. Again, it might be heavy, and yet so large and unwieldy as to be useless, in the hands of a powerful man, towards the commission of an assault. It might, too, be heavy, and yet so small, or short, that no danger of bodily harm could reasonably be apprehended from its use.
> Aside from the use of the term 'heavy,' there is no description in the information as to the definite weight, strength, or size of the stick, or other qualities, properties, or characteristics, showing that it was a means likely to produce great bodily injury."

The allegation in the case at bar differs from that involved in People v. Perales, supra. In the latter case there is no description as to how the stick was used, upon what part of the body the assault was made, and no indication of the degree of force used by alleging the result of the assault or otherwise. In short, the facts were not alleged from which danger of bodily harm might be reasonably apprehended. The pleading here, by way of describing the means employed and the force used and where the force was directed, alleges that the assault was made with the fists and hands upon the head and face and that the result was a fractured jaw and other grievous injuries. Such allegations, under the circumstances of this case, describe both the means employed and the force used, which we think meet the language of the statute, "by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury," and are "not the details of probative matter or particulars of evidence by which these material elements are to be established." Pomeroy's Code Remedies (4th Ed.) p. 555. The suggested allegation of physical disparity would not necessarily indicate the force used, for it would be the force of the impact and the circumstances under which the force was applied rather than the relative size of the men which would constitute the assault, for a small man might deliver a blow with more force than a larger one. The evidence is in conflict as to the events immediately preceding the blow, and as to the position of the principals; but, in view of some of the evidence of the prosecution that at the precise moment the assault was made the complaining witness was taken by surprise and struck from behind, it would be proper to so allege by way of describing the force with which the blow was delivered and the gravity of the assault. People v. Perales, supra, in our opinion, is clearly distinguishable.

It was said in People v. Brown, supra, with reference to the allegation of an assault with a rawhide whip upon the naked body, that it came within the rule followed in People v. Perales, supra. Where a rawhide whip is applied to a naked body, less force would be necessary to constitute a felonious assault than if the body were protected by clothing, just as a blow on the jaw when the assaulted party is not prepared for it or is not moving away from it may have graver consequences. The statement in the case of People v. Munn, supra, that death resulting from a blow of a fist without aggravating circumstances does not constitute murder is undoubtedly correct. The defendant in People v. Murat, supra, was indicted for an assault to kill and murder, and convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, but it was not alleged that the assault was made with a deadly weapon, and, as there was no allegation to support the crime of which the defendant was convicted, the judgment was properly reversed.

[14, 15] 3. But, even if the demurrer and motion in arrest of judgment should, in strictness, have been granted, we do not think the error constituted a miscarriage of justice. The constitutional rule of decision on appeal (article 6, § 4½) includes error in any matter of pleading, and we will examine the evidence in the light of this provision.

According to the evidence, the complaining witness was 29 years old, weighed between 132 and 135 pounds at the time of the injury and 128 at the time of the trial. He was not athletic, and had never boxed; he complained of a weak heart, but the doctor who gave him a physical examination after the injury stated the patient appeared undernourished, but not diseased. Ritter gave up a job as a driver of a delivery wagon because the work was too heavy for him. He testified that he had commenced selling the Los Angeles Evening Herald on this particular corner about April 1, some 14 days prior to the alleged assault, and that about April 7 the defendant started selling the Los Angeles Express on the same corner; previous to April 7 he had seen him on that corner several times, "but he wasn't working—standing around there." Appellant's version was that he commenced selling the Express on that corner about April 1, and that Ritter was selling the Herald at the same time. The difference in the testimony as to when appellant started work on the corner probably is due to the fact that he counted himself working when Ritter assumed he was only being broken in on the job. At all events, it is clear that appellant was engaged on the corner from April 1, but he probably did not start selling papers right away. Isidore Gralla, in testifying for the defense, said he saw Ritter run in front of defendant to sell papers; that "Mike wasn't fast enough to get up to any customers as fast as Ritter was"; and overheard Ritter say what he was going to do to Hinshaw several days before the accident:

> "Ritter says, why he could make sort of a monkey out of him—make him act around like a monkey. In other words, Ritter was supposed to be the boy on the corner that was selling the papers and getting around fast, and made him stand there like a dumbbell."

Ritter also testified there was no trouble between them before appellant started to work, "only he kept shoving me around a lot, but that's what he done all the time; I never paid any attention to it." According to Ritter, on the occasion in question he had made a sale to a lady who gave him a quarter, and just as he put his hand and arm out to give her the change appellant, who was behind him, delivered the blow that fractured his jaw; the blow dazed him, and he sank to his knees on the box "that had two rocks on it that held the newspapers from the wind blowing them away, and as I fell on these, and as I fell I picked them up, and as I got up Hinshaw run. * * * I threw one rock at him, and the next one I couldn't throw at all—just dropped on the sidewalk. * * * I staggered over to an officer there, and all the people started hollering." He testified:

> That appellant had said to him when no one else was present: "You ain't going to last here a week."
> "Q. By Mr. Hill: Just before you started to sell this paper to the lady, had you had any encounter with the defendant at all? A. None whatsoever.
> "Q. Had you had any trouble there between you? A. No hard feelings between me, but he always had hard feelings toward me.
> "Q. What I am getting at is this, Mr. Ritter: I believe you stated that there had been some shoving around there. A. Yes.
> "Q. I want you to state what had happened in that regard. A. Why, I seen a woman come up for a paper, and I dashed over to give it to her, and I just sold one to a man, and I turned around to sell it to a lady, and just then he kicked me in the shins; I never paid no attention; and she gave me 25 cents, and I was making change, and just as I was about to make change I got struck."

Ritter denied saying he would make a monkey out of appellant. His wife and his brother, George P. Ritter, testified as to the shoving and pushing. For instance, upon one occasion when the wife approached her husband the appellant shoved her, and stepped on her foot in trying to sell her a paper. She testified that the day before the injury she overheard the following conversation between Abe Gralla, the brother of Isidore Gralla, who had employed appellant, and appellant:

> "He said to Mike Hinshaw, 'What did we put you here for?' * * * and he says, 'I told you I would have him gone in a week, so give me the week—the week ain't up; give me a week, will you? So shut up.' Q. Who said that? A. Michael Hinshaw."

George P. Ritter, the complaining witness' brother, testified that when he walked up to his brother, Robert, appellant stepped in and shoved him away and shoved a paper into his face. When he said he didn't want a paper the appellant turned and said to the complaining witness, "I'll get you yet." He further testified that his brother "was kind of scared of him," referring to appellant.

Dr. C. E. Early testified that he attended the complaining witness at Golden Gate Hospital; that "he had a swollen jaw, and the lower jaw was fractured on both the left and right sides, and both fractures were compound—that is, broken through the soft structures into the mouth; and he was bleeding from the mouth. * * * The fracture on the left jaw * * * broke through the socket to the last jaw tooth, allowing the fractured bone on the inside to be partially exposed on the inside of the mouth. The fracture on the right side was a little forward, also transversely to the long angle of the jaw, and broke between the sockets of two teeth"; that the patient could not readily open and shut his mouth, his teeth were loosened, and that the left third molar had to be extracted in order to get the fracture in alignment.

Dr. G. F. Boehme testified that he made a complete physical examination of the complaining witness: "He had a contusion of the side of his jaw * * * and a fractured mandible."

Les Roches, a witness on behalf of the people, testified that in the presence of a number of persons in the county jail some time between the middle of April and the middle of May he heard the defendant say he hit a man and broke his jaw.

> "Q. Just state what you heard Hinshaw say that time. A. I heard him say that they asked when they brought him in what they brought him in for, and he said he hit a man down the street and broke his jaw."

Reuben Barr, a witness for the defense, who was an eyewitness of the affair, testified that appellant "slipped a little bit and rubbed up against" the complaining witness, who "fell off the curb"; that the complaining witness saw appellant coming, and kicked back, and then appellant kicked frontwards twice, and the complaining witness "stood up like he was going to strike."

The appellant testified:

> "I stepped up to get a sale, and he stepped on my toes, and he kicked back like that (indicating), and I kicked that way (indicating), and that way (indicating), and I turned around to see."

On cross-examination he said his fist was doubled up when the blow was struck; that there was not much force; that Ritter had his arm raised; that appellant was behind Ritter when the sale was made—that is, Ritter was between appellant and the customer; that Ritter stepped on his toes and kicked back twice; that he kicked forward twice, walked around facing Ritter, and then struck the blow.

In the opening address to the jury the attorney for the people said that the evidence would show certain facts, among others, that appellant was trained in the art of boxing, and that he weighed considerably more than the complaining witness, his weight being about 152 pounds. In replying, the attorney for appellant stated the evidence would show that he took part in only one prize fight, and that was when he was 16 years old. We have not found any testimony in the record showing appellant's weight or whether he had engaged in prize fighting. The weight of the complaining witness was given, however. But, apart from the testimony, the jury could have determined the question of the relative size of the men from their appearance in the courtroom.

In thus reviewing the evidence we have not attempted to determine the facts, for that is a matter committed to the jury and to the court below. We have surveyed it only as to its legal import, with the view of determining whether the jury could have found that the assault was the result of a conspiracy between Isidore Gralla and appellant to drive the complaining witness away from the corner; whether when the assault was made the complaining witness was taken unawares; whether the blow was intended to and did incapacitate him; and whether the assault was by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury. In other words, viewing the evidence as matter of law, could the jury have found that the assault was felonious within the meaning of section 245?

It follows that, even if the amended information did not allege the offense sufficiently, the omission was supplied by the evidence received on the trial. We have therefore found there was no miscarriage of justice. 8 Cal. Jur. 605. Among the cases cited in the note to Cal. Jur. is People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 Pac. 80, which held, under article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, the failure to allege in a case of rape that the complaining witness was not the wife of the defendant—a distinct element in the crime—did not constitute a miscarriage of justice where the proof showed the relationship did not exist. This court denied a petition for hearing herein. The following authorities are also cited in the note: People v. Brown, 37 Cal. App. 101, 173 Pac. 621; People v. Ruiz, 39 Cal. App. 593, 179 Pac. 691; People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 Pac. 521; People v. Lauman, 187 Cal. 214, 201 Pac. 459; People v. Evanoff, 45 Cal. App. 108, 187 Pac. 54. Nor was appellant prejudiced within the meaning of sections 960, 1258, and 1404 of the Penal Code.

[16, 17] 4. We will next consider appellant's assignments of error occurring during the trial. The first is that the court erred in denying his application to enter a plea of once in jeopardy for a "misdemeanor growing out of the said act so that the same would estop any further proceedings in the event that the jury found the defendant guilty of a simple assault or a battery." It was stipulated that a complaint charging a misdemeanor was filed in the police court, the docket reading thus:

> "The prosecuting attorney, felony charge pending, charge dismissed and defendant discharged."

Therefore, while the complaint was pending the felony complaint was filed. The point first made was that appellant was once in jeopardy as to the felony charge. When People v. Brown, 42 Cal. App. 462, 183 Pac. 829, was cited, counsel for appellant conceded that point was not well taken. The record shows that appellant sought by the plea of once in jeopardy in the misdemeanor case to be in a position to urge it in the event the jury returned a verdict for simple assault. The court refused to entertain the plea and said:

> "Before the conclusion of the case I will entertain any further motions you may make and rule upon them without prejudice by any former rulings."

As the verdict was for a felony, it would seem there was no occasion for a further ruling on the point. However, a plea of once in jeopardy will not lie in either a felony or misdemeanor case unless there has been a former acquittal or conviction upon a valid indictment or information before a competent court and a jury has been impaneled and sworn to try the charge. Ex parte Harron (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 728.

[18] Here there was no trial of the assault and battery charge. Counsel for appellant at one point in the proceedings, however, spoke of a plea in bar, and referred to section 1387 of the Penal Code. But the provision of that section that a dismissal of a misdemeanor complaint is a bar to a further prosecution unless the order is explicitly made for the purpose of amending the pleading was met in this instance, for, as has been stated, before the motion to dismiss the first complaint was made the complaint charging the felony was on file.

[19, 20] It is next claimed that the court erred in allowing, over appellant's objection, testimony of an admission by appellant that he had said in the county jail that he hit a man down the street and broke his jaw. The ruling was clearly proper, for the admission (subdivision 2, § 1870, and section 1832, Code Civ. Proc.) tended to rebut the presumption of innocence, and the fact that appellant had not denied the assault rendered the admission no less provable. The prosecution was entitled to make out its case in chief without regard to whether appellant denied the assault. It is true that the corpus delicti should first have been established, but we cannot say, and especially in view of the fact the assault was not denied, that the action of the court in yielding to the prosecution as to the order of proof was prejudicial.

[21] The ruling excluding testimony as to what the complaining witness said to the policeman after the assault had been committed, upon the ground it was hearsay, was proper. It was claimed by appellant to be a part of the res gestæ. The statement itself does not appear in the record, and it is shown that the conversation was not sought from the complaining witness during his direct examination by the people. When he spoke to the policeman appellant had left the scene of the assault, and what was said may have been merely the narration of a past event. This is also true of the point as to what the appellant said to the arresting officer after the assault.

[22] There is no merit in the objection to the testimony of Mrs. Ritter and George P. Ritter as to the hostile declarations of appellant concerning the complaining witness on the two occasions already referred to. It is argued the testimony was no part of the res gestæ. But the declarations were admissible as tending to reflect the state of mind of appellant at the time he committed the assault.

[23] Error is assigned to the refusal of the court to allow the complaining witness to answer on cross-examination whether prior to the assault he had not said to appellant "that you would make a monkey out of him before you left there?" It is claimed that if the witness had been allowed to answer the question he would have corroborated the testimony of Isidore Gralla on the point. This claim seems to be without foundation, in view of the fact that later the witness denied he made the statement.

[24] It is sufficient to say with regard to the claim that the testimony of Reuben Barr, referred to in appellant's brief as the only other eyewitness of the assault, should have been accepted by the jury, that it was solely for the jury to pass on that question.

[25] Error is predicated on a remark made by the court to appellant in an apparent effort to have him speak louder when he was testifying. As it does not appear that any objection was made or admonitory instruction to the jury requested at the time, the incident calls for no further comment.

[26] 5. An objection, apparently made for the first time in appellant's opening brief, is addressed to the remarks of the district attorney "at the time of passing on the application for probation in pronouncing sentence," and it is assigned as misconduct. As the jury had rendered its verdict 15 or 16 days before, and it was after the motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment had been denied, it will not be necessary to pursue the point.

6. Appellant also complains of errors in six instructions which were given to the jury. We shall, for convenience of reference, discuss them in the order of their presentation in appellant's opening brief in the District Court of Appeal, and designate them as (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f), respectively.

We find no error in instruction (a). There is no basis for the claim that an attempt was made by the court to intimate to the jury that it had an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of appellant. The instruction follows the introduction to subdivision 1 of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, and correctly declares the respective functions of the court and the jury in matters of evidence.

[27, 28] The portion omitted in instruction (b) was substantially given elsewhere. One omitted portion had the vice of singling out the appellant as a witness and charging as to his testimony.

[29] Instruction (c) is not open to the objection that it led the jury "to consider circumstances which had no connection with the case." It correctly declared the rule of circumstantial evidence, and stated that, if the evidence was sufficient to establish appellant's guilt, the jury should so find, whether the evidence be direct or circumstantial.

[30, 31] There is no foundation for the assertion that by instruction (d) the jury was practically charged that appellant "started this fight with the premeditation beforehand to make a felonious assault." The instruction is given in the abstract, and correctly states the recognized principle of law "that self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for making a felonious assault."

[32] The objection to instruction (e) is that it "practically makes the jurors judges of whether the defendant believed that he was in danger, or not. The question was: How did it appear to the defendant at the time and not how it appeared to the jury at the time of the trial." The jurors are the final judges as to whether a defendant believed he was in danger at the time he takes the law into his own hands, and they may or may not reject his testimony that he did so believe.

[34-37] Appellant also complains of the rejection by the court of several instructions proposed by him. Taking such instructions in the order they appear in the clerk's transcript, it may be said of the first that it was erroneous in stating that, if appellant did not use a deadly weapon and did not intend to commit murder, the verdict must be for him; the second declared that unless the means used was something other than his fists the offense would be only a misdemeanor. This was misleading in view of the evidence, and it was open to the additional objection that it charged that, if the jury found appellant was arrested and taken before the justice's court, and the charge dismissed by the prosecution, such dismissal is a bar, the court is without jurisdiction, and they must acquit him. This statement referred to the charge of assault and battery, and for the reasons already given was erroneous. The third declared that the use of fists and hands is not regarded as a deadly weapon. It was not claimed that a deadly weapon was used. The balance of the instruction covered a part of the preceding one. By the next instruction the jury is charged, among other things, that the breaking of the jaw is not a probable consequence of a blow with the bare fists, and he is not presumed to have intended that result, "and if he did not so intend the crime committed could be nothing more than a misdemeanor." We have added the italics. The rest of the instruction invades the province of fact on the subject of self-defense.

[38] Appellant's next proposed instruction violates section 19, art. 6, of the Constitution, for it tells the jury "that the fact of the disparity in size has nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of the defendant."

"Given elsewhere" was the proper endorsement to the next instruction.

[39] The next instruction may be disposed of by the statement that appellant's "good reputation for honesty, truth, and integrity" was not involved by the charge.

[40] In view of the entire charge, it was not necessary that this instruction on the ject of the presumption of innocence should have been given.

We find the final proposed instruction was objectionable on the ground that it again charged the jury that, if they found appellant was only guilty of the offense provided by section 240, and punishable by section 241 of the Penal Code, the dismissal of the first complaint is a bar, and the jury must therefore acquit him.

The points call for no further discussion.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

STATE COMPENSATION INSURANCE FUND v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10830.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1924. Rehearing Denied July 10, 1924.)

Master and servant ⚷375(1)—Injury to hotel maid while leaving premises on day off held compensable, as "arising out of and in course of employment."

Injury to a hotel maid from slipping on adjoining sidewalk, while leaving hotel on a personal errand on her day off, held compensable, as "arising out of and in course of employment," where her contract of employment required her to live at hotel in part payment of wages and to use the exit she did, and contemplated that she enjoy her day off.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

In Bank.

Proceedings for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission of California by Florence R. Glennan, claimant, opposed by Fairmont Hotel, employer, and State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carrier. The Commission awarded compensation, and the insurance carrier petitions for certiorari. Award affirmed.

F. J. Creede, T. W. Slaven, and B. E. Pemberton, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Annette Abbott Adams and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, Justice pro tem. The petitioner, State Compensation Insurance Fund, is the insurance carrier for the Fairmont Hotel. It is here seeking annulment of an award made by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission to the other respondent, Florence R. Glennan, a maid employed in and living at the hotel, who was injured by a fall while leaving the premises by the servants' entrance. The accident was caused by unsafe conditions of the entrance and adjacent runway across the sidewalk, created by employees of the hotel in the discharge of their duties. The maid was not on duty at the time, but was leaving the building for a personal errand on her "day off." It is the contention of the petitioner that at the time the employee sustained the injury on which the award was based she was not performing any service, either growing out of or incidental to her employment, and was not at the time acting within the scope of her employment.

Maids employed at the Fairmont were not compelled, as is the case in some hotels, to live in the building. When respondent Glennan applied to the hotel management for employment, she was offered two forms of contract, either of which she was at liberty to accept. Under the terms of one she could enter the employment, be paid a flat wage of $50 monthly and lodge where she pleased. Under the other she would be given what is referred to in her testimony as "the protection of the building," lodgings in the hotel, and be paid $40 monthly. For the reason that it was more expensive for the maids to rent a room outside than to make an allowance of $10 monthly for one at the hotel, the respondent signed the form of contract which permitted her to live on the premises. Her wages were therein fixed at $40 a month, in addition to board and lodging, stipulated before the commission to be of the value of $30. The maids were not allowed to be in parts of the hotel where they were not employed, and in going to and from the building were required to use an entrance on the Sacramento street side of the hotel, where the time clock was located. Other than the requirement about the use of this entrance maids were free to "come and go and do" as they pleased, provided they did their work and ate their meals within the hours provided.

At the time of the injury in question the entrance referred to was also used as a passageway for trucks. As it opened on to a sloping street, the cement walk between the building and the outer edge of the sidewalk was made rough, forming a sort of runway. On the day of the accident Miss Glennan started to leave the hotel at the required entrance, which she stated was used to take out ashes. She found other employees of the hotel "sweeping out the slush" and "washing out the entrance with soapy water." As she walked through the passageway her shoes became wet, and, in stepping off the runway on the sidewalk, outside the entrance, in an attempt to avoid walking in the water thereon, her feet slipped, and she fell, striking against a projection of the building, and received a severe injury to the base of the spine. For this injury compensation was allowed her, and the award was affirmed on rehearing before the respondent Commission.

Some contention is made by petitioner that the injury did not arise out of the employment, as required by the statute, and this position is based upon the reasoning that as the injury to the applicant was sustained on the sidewalk on a public street, entirely outside the premises of the employer, it resulted from a hazard to which all the public was exposed and not from any peculiar or particular hazard to which the applicant was subjected by reason of her employment. Respondents in reply to this contention point out that the contract of employment in this case contemplated the use of the entrance and passageway where the injury occurred, as a necessary incident to the employment. Where the employment itself involves peculiar and abnormal exposure to a common peril, which peculiar exposure is annexed as a risk incidental to the employment, it has been repeatedly held that the risk is incidental to the employment within the meaning of compensation statutes. Judson Mfg. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 300, 184 Pac. 1 and cases therein cited. The fact that the accident happens upon a public road or at a railroad crossing, and that the danger is one to which the general public is likewise exposed, is not conclusive against the existence of such causal relationship, if the danger be one to which the employee, by reason of and in connection with his employment, is subjected peculiarly or to an abnormal degree. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Parramore, 44 Sup. Ct. 153, 68 L. Ed. —.

In the instant case there is a direct causal connection between the injury received by the employee and her employment by the hotel. The injury directly resulted from the condition of the entrance to the premises of the employer, which, under the regulations governing her employment, Miss Glennan was compelled to use, which caused her to get her feet wet, combined with her natural effort to avoid the water and slush upon the runway immediately adjacent to said entrance, which water and slush had been placed there by employees of the hotel.

It seems clear, therefore, that the injury arose out of the employment. But a more serious problem is encountered in the next contention of petitioner, which is that the injury did not occur in the course of the employment or while the employee was performing service incidental thereto. Upon this essential element of the case respondents rely upon a recent decision of this court in which it was held that a number of ranch hands, who, by reason of the situation of the ranch and the nature of their employment, were compelled to sleep in the bunkhouse provided by the employer for their use, were in the course of their employment and performing a service incidental to the employment in which they engaged at a time when they had completed their work and were in the bunkhouse waiting for supper. Larson v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 224 Pac. 744. Petitioner relies with equal confidence on another decision of this court. Associated Oil Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 744. It is contended that this case is determinative against respondents, because it is said therein that the test to be applied to situations where an employee is injured while upon the premises of the employer after working hours, and because of the fact that he is living upon said premises, is "whether or not the workman is given a choice in the matter and is free as possible to come or go as he pleases." However, it was pointed out in said case, citing Schneider on Workmen's Compensation Law, that—

> "The general rule appears to be that, when the contract of employment contemplates that the employees shall [not must] sleep upon the premises of the employer, the employee, under such circumstances, is considered to be performing services growing out of and incidental to such employment during the time he is on the premises of the employer."

And again, in said case it was emphasized by the court that:

> "The men were not required to stay there, and it was no part of the contract of employment that they should do so."

And we think this is a vital distinguishing feature between this case and the instant case. In the instant case Miss Glennan, it is true, had a choice, when she applied for employment, of making a contract by which she would be paid $50 a month and furnish her own room, or a contract by which she would receive $40 a month and accept a room in the hotel in lieu of the other $10 a month in wages. At the time she had this choice she had not entered upon her status as an employee. It was a preliminary choice which she was given before entering upon the employment. When she had made her choice and signed the contract of employment by which she accepted a room in the hotel as part compensation for her labor, she then, and then only, sustained to the hotel the relationship of employee to employer; then her rights were fixed by contract, as were those of the hotel. It cannot be said, then, that she had any further choice. Her contract for employment was a monthly one, and she was bound during that month, at least, to accept a room in the hotel in lieu of $10 additional wages. She was under the compulsion of a contract obligation. It was a distinctive part of her contract of employment that she should occupy a room in the hotel. It was contemplated by the contract of employment that she should sleep in this room, and that she should enter and leave the building by the servants' entrance. It was also contemplated by the contract that she was to have one "day off" each week, and, assuredly, it was implied in said contract that she should leave and enter the building by the servants' entrance upon that "day off." An employee is in the "course of his employment" "when he does those reasonable things which his contact with his employment expressly or impliedly permits him to do." Novack v. Montgomery Ward & Co. (Minn.) 198 N. W. 290, 292.

Miss Glennan was to be furnished all of her meals at the hotel as a part of her compensation for her labor. It was a part of the express written contract creating her status as an employee that she should live at the hotel and receive her meals there. That was her residence solely because of her employment, and she was upon the premises to sleep and eat her meals, because room and meals were the exchange in which she was paid in part for her labor. She was in the course of her employment when she was collecting this remuneration just as much as when she was performing the labor that earned the remuneration. The contract between the parties was reciprocal.

In the case of Hackley, etc., Co. v. I. A. C., 165 Wis. 586, 162 N. W. 921, an employee of a lumber company had been working at one of its camps for some months, when he decided to give up his employment for a time and take a vacation. He so stated to his foreman, and was given a statement of his time of service, to be used in collecting the money due him. It was necessary for him to go to the office of the company to collect his "pay," and this was some distance from the camp, and was reached by train. The employee was injured while riding on this train which was furnished by the company as a conveyance for its employees. It was contended that the injury was not in the course of the employment, as the employee had definitely terminated his employment before leaving the camp. The court said:

> "The essential elements of the contract of employment were that the employee should render services for the employer, and in return therefor the employer should pay him an agreed compensation. The duty to pay and the right to receive the compensation were integral parts of the contract of employment. * * * So in going to get his pay he was but fulfilling a duty imposed upon him by the employer and using the means of conveyance which the employer furnished his employees for such purpose. * * * If we turn to the text-books and decided cases on this subject, we find that they sustain the view that an employee going in the usual manner for his pay to a place designated by the employer is performing a service within his employment. 1 Bradbury, W. C. 438; 1 Honnold, W. C. 356; Lowery v. Sheffield Coal Co., 1 B. W. C. C. 1; Nelson v. Belfast Corp., 1 B. W. C. C. 158; Riley v. Holland & Sons, 4 B. W. C. C. 155; Re R. V. Phillips, 1 Bull. Ind. Com. of Ohio, 49. In Lowery v. Sheffield Coal Co., supra, the facts were these: A collier left his work at 5 o'clock on a Saturday morning. At noon of the same day he went for his wages for a fortnight past. He went along a footpath which had been made by the employer for its workmen, and was going along the Great Central Railway Line, which ran through the employer's premises, when he was knocked down by an engine and injured. He was not going to resume work till the following Sunday night. The court held that the employee was entitled to compensation."

The other cases cited and discussed in the opinion in the case of Hackley, etc., Co., v. I. A. C., supra, are directly in point here, because an analysis of the facts in the instant case discloses that the respondent Glennan, in sleeping in the room at the hotel, was but collecting a portion of her wages. The medium of exchange in which wages happen to be paid is a mere accidental circumstance, and should not be permitted to cloud the issue. Here the respondent Glennan was to be paid, by the written express contract between the parties, $40 in money and $30 in room and meals. She was collecting her wages when she came for her meals and when she occupied her room, just as much as when she called for the balance of her wages to be paid in cash. In occupying her room (collecting a portion of her wages) she incidentally used the entrance provided by the employer for that purpose. It would seem, upon principle, that her legal situation was precisely the same as if upon a day when she was not actually working for her employer—when she had a "day off," or for some other reason was not working—she had gone to his premises by the entrance designated by the employer to collect the portion of her wages to be paid in cash, and had been injured in the same place and manner as she was injured. In either instance, in the language of the decision in Hackley, etc., Co. v. I. A. C., supra:

> "The employee * * * was still performing a duty imposed upon him by his employer and one necessary to perform before the terms of the contract of employment were mutually satisfied."

We think the foregoing discussion distinguishes this case from the "Jones Case" (Associated Oil Co. v. I. A. C., supra) upon principle, and that the instant case falls within the rule announced by this court that "when the contract of employment contemplates that the employees shall sleep upon the premises of the employer, the employee, under such circumstances, is considered to be performing services growing out of and incidental to such such employment during the time he is on the premises of the employer" (Associated Oil Co. v. I. A. C., supra). There is involved here the same legal principle as in the case of Larson v. I. A. C., supra. In the Larson Case the employees were held to be in the course of their employment and performing a service incidental thereto when sleeping in a bunkhouse, because the situation of the ranch and the nature of their employment practically precluded them from living elsewhere. In the instant case neither the situation of the hotel nor the nature of the employment demanded residence at the hotel, but the written contract under which the employee was working provided for such residence as a partial payment for services. In the one case, there was the compulsion of circumstances, and in the other, as we have stated, the compulsion of a written contract.

Applying the language of the Associated Oil Company Case, supra, i. e., "When the contract of employment contemplates that the employees shall sleep upon the premises of the employer, the employee, under such circumstances, is considered to be performing services growing out of and incidental to such employment during the time he is on the premises of the employer," and applying, by analogy, the case of Larson v. I. A. C., supra, to the facts of the instant case, we think the employee was in course of her employment and performing services growing out of and incidental to such employment when she was leaving her place of employment (her residence, also, by reason of her contract of employment, and furnished to her as part compensation for her labor under such contract) by the exit designated by the employer, to enjoy her "day off"—an intermission in her labor contemplated by said contract of employment.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., v. SECARA et al.
(S. F. 9944.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑226—Irrigation district not invalid by reason of uncertain description of boundary.

An irrigation district was not invalid for uncertainty of description of boundary as the right bank of a stream, in view of Civ. Code, § 830, regarding boundaries of lands on tide water.

2. Boundaries 🔑8—Question of location always question of intention.

Question of location of boundary line is always question of intention of parties framing description or making agreement or conveyance containing description.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑216—Finding of board of supervisors of irrigation district as to validity of assessment conclusive to what extent.

As against any attempt to question validity of organization of irrigation district in any proceeding to contest the validity of an assessment other than direct attack in certiorari, the conclusive evidence provision of Irrigation District Act, § 72, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1370, should be given its full effect.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑216—Statute of limitations as to assessments held invalid.

Thirty-day statute of limitations prescribed in Irrigation District Act, § 69, regarding actions to determine validity of assessments, when regarded merely as a statute of limitations, is void as not allowing a reasonable period of time to property owner who has not received legal notice of hearing before board of equalization within which to commence an action.

5. Constitutional law 🔑55—Legislature empowered to prescribe rules of evidence.

Legislature is empowered to prescribe rules of evidence subject to limitations placed upon it by Constitution.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Action to quiet title held collateral attack on assessment.

Action to quiet title by landowner as against lien of irrigation district was a collateral attack upon validity of assessment as distinguished from direct attack.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑225—Conclusiveness of resolution declaring irrigation district duly organized in suit to quiet title.

Conclusiveness of resolution of board of supervisors of irrigation district declaring that district was duly organized is in no way qualified or lessened in a suit to quiet title as against lien of district by fact that question of validity of district is still open to be determined in a certiorari proceeding; suit to quiet title not having been brought within 6 months after resolution as required by Irrigation District Act, § 72, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1370.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Assessment held shown to have been made for proper purposes.

Board of irrigation district levying an assessment held to sufficiently state purposes for which levy was made under Irrigation District Act, §§ 39, 61.

9. Evidence 🔑584(1)—Effect of prima facie evidence is not destroyed by introduction of contradictory evidence.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1824, 1833, effect of prima facie evidence is not destroyed by introduction of contradictory evidence, but it stands as proof of that particular fact unless and until it is both contradicted and overcome by such other evidence.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Assessment book prima facie evidence of assessment requiring contradiction.

An assessment book showing unpaid assessments is prima facie evidence of validity of assessments, notice, etc., under Irrigation District Act, § 49, and compels finding of validity in absence of contradicting evidence which overcomes it, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1824, 1833.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux, Inc., against J. A. Secara and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco (Gail C. Larkin, of Los Angeles, and Joseph C. Sharp, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an action to quiet plaintiff's title against the lien of an irrigation district assessment upon the ground of the invalidity of the organization of the defendant Madera irrigation district, and the invalidity of an assessment of $35,859.96 levied by the board of directors of such irrigation district. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants.

The defendants claim that the defendant district was properly organized, and that the plaintiff, by suing the Madera irrigation district as such, and alleging that it is claiming to be and acting as an irrigation district, has admitted at least that the defendant was a de facto district, and therefore that plaintiff cannot attack the validity of its organization in his action, which is in the nature of a collateral attack thereon.

The first objection to the validity of the district is that the description of the district in the proceedings for organization is uncertain, and therefore that the whole proceedings are void because of the fact that the lines of the district cannot be ascertained. This contention is based upon the alleged impossibility of locating the right bank of the Fresno river, which is made one of the boundary lines of the district. The portion of the description attacked by the plaintiff is as follows:

> "Thence east along section lines one and three-fourths miles more or less to the intersection of the south line of section 14, said township, with the left bank of Ash slough; thence southwesterly along the left bank of said slough to the right bank of the Chowchilla canal in block 25 of subdivision No. 1 of the Chowchilla ranch, according to the official map of said subdivision on file in the office of the county recorder of said county of Madera; thence southeasterly along the right bank of said Chowchilla canal to the right bank of the Fresno river, which said river runs through blocks 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of subdivision No. 2 of the Chowchilla ranch according to the official map of said subdivision on file in the office of the county recorder of said county of Madera, thence easterly along the right bank of said Fresno river 7½ miles more or less to its intersection with the west line of sections 16 and 21, township 11 south, range 16 east." (Italics ours.)

[1] The plaintiff's point is that the river divides in several branches; that each of these branches is shallow and that the banks are not well defined; that the river "bank" is the bank at high water, and that this is never the same, for the reason that the river spreads out into a great sheet of water several miles wide, and that the edge of this sheet cannot be located because it is never at the same place during the flood season of different years.

It appears from the evidence that the government maps of this locality of 1853 show a single line passing through blocks 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of subdivision 2 of the Chowchilla ranch, which the field notes show indicates the right bank of the Fresno river. The surveyors employed by the defendants testified that they had no difficulty in locating the right bank of the Fresno river where it passed through the blocks in question, and it also appears from the testimony that there is only one branch of the river which flows through the particular blocks referred to in the description. In one place for about 600 feet only was it difficult to ascertain the location of the bank. At this point there is no very well-defined bank. The surveying level, however, showed where the edge of the water would be in passing from the defined bank to the next defined point in the bank 600 feet down stream, and the surveyors accepted such line on the high land across this space as the bank of the river. The method of locating the line of high tide by ascertaining the intersecting line of the plane of water at mean high tide with the surface of the land, and using this line of intersection as the boundary line between the tide lands of the city and the adjoining lands of the defendants, was used in the case of City of Los Angeles v. San Pedro, etc., R. Co., 182 Cal. 652, 189 Pac. 449, although a slight change in elevation resulted in a variation of a mile or more in the line of high tide. Indeed, this is the only possible method of locating the boundary line fixed by statute (section 830, Civ. Code) as the boundary of lands bordering on tide water. The plane of ordinary high tide is an imaginary plane fixed by observation and calculation as to the average high tide, and its location is fixed by running of this level on the shore. No reason is suggested why a similar process should not be used to locate the line of the bank for the hiatus of 600 feet between the well-defined points of the bank shown upon the ground, as was done by the engineers who testified in this case.

It should perhaps be stated that the map referred to in the above description of the Chowchilla ranch does not show the east bank of the Fresno river, but the reference to this map serves to determine which of the numerous channels of the Fresno river it was intended to adopt in the description; that is, the branch flowing through the blocks referred to as shown on this map. This being ascertained, the exact location upon the ground could be made in any way adapted to ascertain the location of that bank. The fact that the map does not definitely locate the right bank of the river merely requires it to be otherwise ascertained. It might be said also that, where the stream spreads out indefinitely, and becomes a great sheet of water extending over a wide expanse of the territory, the location of the edge of which changes many miles from year to year, the reference in the description to the "right bank" of the river could not be intended to mean the extreme edge of this sheet of water, which would vary so greatly with every storm and every flood, but should be taken to be the bank of the stream as indicated on the ground.

[2] The question of the location of a boundary line is always a question of the intention of the parties framing the description, or making the agreement or the conveyance containing the description.

> "Intention, whether express or shown by surrounding circumstances, is all controlling; and that which is most certain and definite will prevail over the less certain and indefinite." 9 Corpus Juris, p. 152, § 2, page 193, § 78.

We think the line located by the defendants' engineers, with the help of the surface indications on the ground, and the field notes of the government survey of 1853, and adopted by the court in its findings, was evidence of the sufficiency and certainty of the boundaries described in the proceedings for the establishment of the district.

[3] Appellant contends that the defendants failed to establish that the alleged district had either a de jure or de facto existence. The allegations of the complaint itself, which were not denied by the answer, were sufficient to establish the de facto existence of the district at the time this action was commenced. We are of the opinion that the evidence introduced was sufficient to warrant a finding that the district had been at least a de facto district since January 12, 1920, the date or the resolution of the board of supervisors finding and declaring it to be duly organized as an irrigation district. Indeed, the appellant does not seriously oppose this conclusion, but urges rather that, in the absence of sufficient proof of the valid organization of the district, appellant was entitled to prove herein that its lands were not benefited thereby, and therefore should have been excluded therefrom, and could not be lawfully assessed for the expense thereof. Appellant offered to prove these things at the trial of this action, to which defendants' objection was sustained by the trial court, and appellant specifies this as prejudicial error requiring a reversal. Appellant concedes that, if the district had in fact been lawfully organized, pursuant to sufficient petitions therefor, and after a hearing before the supervisors pursuant to notice to the property owners whose lands were proposed to be included in the district, giving to such property owners a reasonable opportunity to appear and litigate before the supervisors the questions of benefit and the inclusion or exclusion of their lands, and if the supervisors, acting at such hearing upon competent evidence, had decided these questions adversely to appellant, it would then have been precluded from litigating them in the present action. But it argues that, in the absence of proof herein of such hearing and action by the supervisors and of the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction upon them to determine those questions, appellant had a constitutional right to litigate them in this action. This brings us to a consideration of the validity and effect of the provisions contained in sections 68, 69, 72, and 4 of the Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254). Section 68 provides for the bringing of an action in rem in the superior court by the directors of the district to determine the validity of such an assessment. Section 69 provides that at any time within 30 days after the levy of an assessment any district assessment payer may bring an action in the superior court to determine the validity thereof. Section 72, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1370, provides:

> "No contest of any thing or matter herein provided shall be made other than within the time and manner herein specified, and in any such action all findings of facts or conclusions of said board of directors, or of the board of supervisors upon all matters shall be conclusive, unless such action was instituted within six months after such finding or conclusion, was made."

Section 4 of the act as amended by St. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 139, provides that—

> "A finding of the board of supervisors in favor of the genuineness and sufficiency of the petition and notice shall be final and conclusive against all persons except the state of California upon suit commenced by the attorney general. * * *"

This court decided in Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 208 Pac. 304, that said section 4, "in so far as it would give conclusive validity to the order of the board of supervisors in the absence of notice and hearing and would deprive the property owner at every subsequent stage of the proceedings of any right to contest the question as to whether or not his lands would be benefited, would be violative of the due process of law clauses of the federal and state Constitutions." It was said therein that said section 69 provides "for proceedings by the property owner to contest the validity of the assessment, but it is evidently not intended that this contest should include an inquiry into the validity of the proceedings for the organization of the district. * * *" This court there concluded that the jurisdiction vested in the courts by the Constitution to issue writs of certiorari for the purpose of reviewing proceedings of an inferior tribunal or board exercising judicial functions in order to ascertain whether or not such inferior tribunal or board was acting within its jurisdiction cannot be taken away by the Legislature, and that the sections above referred to, in so far as they purport to deprive the courts of their jurisdiction to review the proceedings of the board of supervisors, or to make the findings of the board of supervisors conclusive, "if construed to prohibit the inquiry upon direct attack in certiorari into the question of whether or not the supervisors conformed to the constitutional requirements of due process of law in exercising their jurisdiction, * * *" are to that extent void. The opinion in that case did not expressly hold, but strongly implied, that the provisions here in question are valid as against any other attack than the direct attack in certiorari.

[4] In the former opinion in this case it was held that the 30-day statute of limitations prescribed in section 69 of the act, when regarded merely as a statute of limitations, is void as not allowing a reasonable period of time to the property owner who has not received legal notice of the hearing before the board of equalization within which to commence an action to contest the assessment. To that conclusion we adhere. Hayes v. Douglas County, 92 Wis. 429, 65 N. W. 482, 31 L. R. A. 213, 53 Am. St. Rep. 926; Lamb v. Powder River Live Stock Co., 132 Fed. 434, 65 C. C. A. 570, 67 L. R. A. 558, and cases cited therein. The result of the invalidity of that statute of limitations is to permit the assessment payer to bring such an action within a reasonable time (Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 548, 199 Pac. 1042), and this action, which was commenced within three months, must be held to have been commenced in time. We think there is no room to doubt that the six months' limitation prescribed in section 72 of the act is not unreasonable, particularly in the light of the fact that the assessment payer would know from the provisions of the law that the date of the levy would in all likelihood be some time within the month of September.

[5, 6] A six months' statute of limitations was impliedly held valid in Capuccio v. Caire, 189 Cal. 514, 209 Pac. 367. We see no reason, therefore, why the provision of section 72 that "in any such action all findings of facts or conclusions * * * of the board of supervisors upon all matters shall be conclusive, unless such action was instituted within six months after such finding or conclusion was made," should not be given full effect as a rule of evidence in this action. We agree with counsel for appellant that a total lack of jurisdiction due to absence of notice sufficient to constitute due process of law cannot be cured by a curative act or by a curative provision in the statute, but we see no reason why such a defect may not be cured, in effect, by a statute of limitations, provided the latter is not unreasonable, and is therefore valid. We also agree that a conclusive evidence clause such as that contained in section 72 in so far as it purports to debar all inquiry into the question of jurisdiction of the supervisors in forming the district "must be held unavailing to prevent such inquiry where that board has proceeded without jurisdiction." We so held in Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, supra, but this conclusive evidence provision was there held to be unavailing only to the extent that it purported to "prohibit the inquiry upon direct attack in certiorari into the question of whether or not the supervisors conformed to the constitutional requirements of due process of law in exercising their jurisdiction." It was strongly, if not necessarily, implied in that decision, that, as against any attempt to question the validity of the organization of the district in any proceeding to contest the validity of an assessment other than the direct attack in certiorari, the conclusive evidence provision of section 72 should be given its full effect. This is the interpretation which we place upon that opinion, and we think that it should be adhered to. The Legislature is empowered to prescribe the rules of evidence, subject to the limitations placed upon it by our state and federal Constitutions. Nothing therein has been called to our attention which would prohibit the Legislature from making the record of a proceeding of a judicial or quasi judicial character conclusive as against a collateral attack or from limiting the scope of the inquiry upon such collateral attack, the opportunity being open to test all jurisdictional questions by means of a direct attack, as was held in Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, supra. It is clear that this action is a collateral attack upon the validity of the assessment as distinguished from the direct attack under consideration in that case.

Plaintiff argues that the words "such action" in section 72 refer back to section 69, and that the provisions of section 72 are therefore applicable only to the action provided for in section 69, to wit, an action by an assessment payer to contest the validity of the assessment. Plaintiff asserts that this is not such an action, but is a suit to quiet title, and that therefore the provisions of section 72 are not applicable herein. There is no merit in this contention. This is plainly an action to contest the validity of this assessment—nothing more and nothing less. Plaintiff in its complaint herein alleged title to the premises in itself, and that the defendants claimed some interest therein, which claim was without right, and called upon them to set forth in their answer the nature of their claim. Defendants in their answer admitted plaintiff's ownership of the premises, claimed in behalf of the defendant irrigation district a lien thereon to the amount of this assessment, and disclaimed any other interest therein. If this action had been for any other purpose than to contest the validity of this assessment plaintiff thereupon would have dismissed its action or would have taken judgment upon the pleadings quieting its title subject to the lien. If this is not an action to determine the validity of this assessment it must follow that plaintiff is entitled to no relief herein other than that which defendants freely concede to it.

plicable herein for the reason that this action was commenced within six months after the session of the board of directors as a board of equalization and after the levy of the assessment in question. It is true that this action was commenced within six months after the levy of the assessment, and it follows therefrom that the finding and conclusions of the board of directors in levying the assessment are not conclusive herein, and the plaintiff is therefore at liberty to litigate herein the question of the validity of the assessment. But, on the other hand, the resolution of the board of supervisors, wherein it found, concluded, and declared that the district was duly organized as an irrigation district under the provisions of the California Irrigation District Act, was adopted much more than six months prior to the commencement of this action, and it follows that, when that resolution was introduced in evidence herein, the validity of the organization of the district was conclusively established so far as this action is concerned. The conclusiveness of this proof for the purpose of this action is in no way qualified or lessened by the fact that the question of the validity of the organization of this district is still open to be determined in the pending certiorari proceeding. Plaintiff introduced evidence at the trial hereof to prove the pendency of that certiorari proceeding. We are unable to conceive of the relevancy of this evidence except to a plea in abatement. It would be an unusual thing for a plaintiff to plead in abatement of its own action that there was another action pending, instituted by it, which involved the same question. No such plea was filed herein, but it is not improbable that the trial court herein, if it had been requested so to do by the plaintiff, might have granted a continuance of this action pending the determination of the proceeding in certiorari. It is sufficient to say that the plaintiff made no such request, but, on the contrary, elected to pursue the present action to a conclusion. The pursuit of the present action carried with it the consequence that under the provisions of section 72 the trial court was compelled to find that the district was duly and lawfully organized. In this state of the evidence the trial court committed no error in refusing to permit the plaintiff to offer evidence for the purpose of showing that its lands were already irrigated, that they would not be benefited, and that plaintiff had unsuccessfully endeavored to have its lands excluded from the district. Those questions were for the determination of the board of supervisors, and its determination thereof is not subject to review by the court in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, at least not in a collateral attack such as the present one. The provision of section 78, excepting from certain assessments lands irrigated by water pumped from an underground source or sources, is clearly inapplicable to plaintiff's land, none of which was so irrigated.

[8] There is no merit in the contention that the assessment was void because not shown to have been made for a purpose for which the board can make an assessment. We find no provision in the act which requires the board in levying an assessment to state expressly and in detail the specific purposes for which the money is to be raised; but, assuming that the law does so require, we think the requirement is complied with in the resolution levying the assessment herein. It recites that the sum of $78,620.70 is required to meet outstanding warrants which have been issued in accordance with the provisions of the act. This is one of the purposes specified in section 39 for which such assessment shall be levied. It further recites that—

> "Before the 1st day of January, 1921, there will be required by the district for the purpose of organization and for other purposes of said act the further sum of $63,993."

This is expressly authorized by section 61 of the act. It recites that the further sum of $46,790.91 will be needed to meet the obligations of the district that will be incurred before the time for levying the next annual assessment. This also is expressly authorized by section 39 of the act. These three items added together make up the amount of the assessment which was levied in the sum of $189,404.51.

Appellant most earnestly contends that the assessment was void because no sufficient notice thereof and of the meeting of the board as a board of equalization thereon was given as required by the statute. The requirements of the statute herein are found in section 37, which provides:

> "On or before the first Monday in August in each year, the assessor must complete his assessment book, and deliver it to the secretary of the board, who must immediately give notice thereof, and of the time the board of directors, acting as a board of equalization, will meet to equalize assessments, by publication in a newspaper published in each of the counties comprising the district. The time fixed for the meeting shall not be less than twenty nor more than thirty days from the first publication of the notice; and in the meantime the assessment book must remain in the office of the secretary for the inspection of all persons interested."

The meeting of the board of equalization was set for September 2, 1920. At the trial affidavits of publication were introduced, showing that notice thereof was published in three newspapers in Madera county on August 5th, 12th, and 19th, respectively, in each of those papers, together with an affidavit showing that such notice was published in a paper in Merced county on August 23, 1920, which was but 10 days prior to the date of the meeting. In the former opinion filed herein it was assumed as a fact established beyond controversy that no other publication was made. This assumption was a natural one in the light of the circumstance that in all of the briefs filed herein up to that time all of the arguments on both sides of the case were predicated upon this assumed fact, with the exception of a single short paragraph in respondents' brief. Proceeding upon that assumed fact, this court interpreted the statute as requiring but a single publication in each county, but as requiring further that such publication should be made in each of the counties not less than twenty nor more than 30 days prior to the date of the hearing, and concluded that the publication thus assumed to have been made was insufficient to meet the requirement of the statute. It further concluded that the requirement of publication in more than one of the counties was not essential to due process of law, and therefore might have been dispensed with by the Legislature, and that when the Legislature had provided for publication in each of the counties it might have added thereto a provision to the effect that, if such publication should be made in one of the counties, the failure to so publish in the other county would not invalidate the assessment unless an action was brought to contest the same within 30 days thereafter, and that the Legislature did so provide in effect in sections 69 and 72 of the act, and that the omission was cured thereby. 5 Cal. Jur. 872–875, citing Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81; Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352; Board of Education v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 515, 93 Pac. 117; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 116 Pac. 750; Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 Pac. 976; Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 161 Pac. 113; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 186 Pac. 753.

[9, 10] The petition for rehearing was granted herein in order that we might give further consideration to the validity of these conclusions. Upon such consideration we have arrived at the conclusion that these questions are not involved in a determination of this appeal. Section 49 of the act provides as follows:

> "The assessment book or delinquent list, or a copy thereof, certified by the collector, showing unpaid assessments against any person, or property, is prima facie evidence of the assessment, the property assessed, the delinquency, the amount of assessments due and unpaid, and that all the forms of the law in relation to the assessment and levy of such assessments have been complied with."
> "Prima facie evidence is that which suffices for the proof of a particular fact, until contradicted and overcome by other evidence." Code Civ. Proc. § 1833.

It is to be noted that the Code does not say "until contradicted or overcome by other evidence," but "until contradicted and overcome by other evidence." Therefore, when prima facie evidence of a given fact has been introduced, its effect is not destroyed by the introduction of contradictory evidence. It stands as proof of that particular fact unless and until it is both contradicted and overcome by such other evidence. "Proof" is something more than merely "evidence." It is "the establishment of a fact by evidence." Code Civ. Proc. § 1824. The defendants introduced the assessment book in evidence at the trial, and no question was made then or since as to the genuineness thereof or the correctness of the entries therein or the manner of making and keeping the same. By so doing the defendants established a prima facie case of the validity of the assessment and of the fact that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy had been complied with. This showing would not only justify but would compel a finding to this effect unless it was both contradicted and overcome by other evidence in the case. The plaintiff introduced no evidence which even tended to contradict it. The defendant, however, introduced affidavits of publication showing the publication of the notice three times in each of three papers in Madera county and one time in one paper in Merced county. This was all the evidence introduced or offered upon this subject. It may be doubted that this evidence can justly be said to contradict the prima facie case thus made. It presented no irreconcilable conflict therewith, for the reason that other publications of the notice may have been made in other newspapers in both counties or in the same newspapers. If at this stage of the trial the burden had still rested upon the defendants to prove the validity of their assessment, then the trial court might justly have inferred that no other publications were made than those they proved; but, the introduction of the assessment books having established a prima facie case of the validity of the assessment, the burden then rested upon the plaintiff to produce evidence to contradict and overcome that showing. As the plaintiff did not offer any evidence to show that no other publications were made, it was the reasonable and natural inference that such other publications were in fact made, and that they were sufficient. See Corson v. Crocker, 31 Cal. App. 626, 632, 161 Pac. 287; Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 745, 751, 81 Pac. 138, and cases there cited. If the trial court had found that the publication of notice was insufficient, a nice question would have been presented as to whether or not in this state of the evidence such finding would be legally justified. But the trial court did not so find. If found, by necessary implication, that the publication was sufficient. We must hold that this finding was justified, if, indeed, it was not compelled, by the state of the evidence. This finding is conclusive upon this appeal.

"Where the facts established may reasonably authorize either one of two opposite inferences and the trial court has adopted one and rejected the other, its decision is binding upon the appellate court. * * *" 10 Cal. Jur. p. 741; Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider appellant's contention that the notice as published did not conform to the requirements of section 1705 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 4459 of the Political Code. Nevertheless we adhere to our former conclusions upon these points that section 1705, Code of Civil Procedure, is inapplicable to this situation, and that the notice set forth in the affidavits of publication was substantially in compliance with section 4459 of the Political Code. The finding of the trial court that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provisions of sections 68, 69, and 72 of the act was predicated upon an erroneous conclusion of law; but, as this finding is in no way essential to support the judgment, the error is immaterial.

(Unless otherwise stated the sections herein referred to are those in the California Irrigation District Act, No. 1726, General Laws 1915, p. 661 et seq., and amendments thereto in Codes and General Laws 1921, p. 1436 et seq., being the act of 1897 [Stats. 1897, p. 254], and amendments thereto.)

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TORRES. (Cr. 2640.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1924.)

1. Prostitution 🔑1—One dealing with third person to procure inmate guilty of "pandering."

One negotiating with third person to procure a female to be inmate of house of prostitution is guilty of pandering, under St. 1911, p. 9.

2. Prostitution 🔑4—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for pandering.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction for pandering, under St. 1911, p. 9.

3. Criminal law 🔑863(2)—Jury held not misled by re-reading of instruction and statute.

In prosecution for inducing, persuading, or encouraging complaining witness to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, held, that jurors were not misled by re-reading of statute to jury, including part concerning inducing, persuading, or encouraging one to remain in house of prostitution, and that there was no prejudice.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Marina Torres was convicted of pandering, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Dalton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant, Marina Torres, was charged by information in three counts: (1) With the crime of pandering in procuring, persuading, and encouraging a female to become an inmate of a house of prostitution; (2) with feloniously aiding, abetting, encouraging, and assisting one John Doe in the commission of the crime of rape upon the complaining witness, a female under 18 years of age; and (3) with the crime of rape in having aided, abetted, encouraged, and assisted one Richard Roe to accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with the said complaining witness. It may be assumed on appeal that one Miguel Mayo, alias "Mike Flores," in the city of Los Angeles, brought the complaining witness to a house of prostitution kept by the defendant, and that she allowed the minor to become an inmate thereof. The defendant was prosecuted on counts 2 and 3 on the theory that she was a party to the crime of rape as alleged to have been committed respectively by the procurer, and the crime of rape alleged to have been committed by a visitor at the house of prostitution.

The defendant went to trial on the three counts, and a verdict of guilty was rendered on count 1. She was acquitted on counts 2 and 3. Upon the denial of defendant's motion for a new trial she was sentenced to serve a term in the penitentiary. An appeal was taken by the defendant to the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, and we adopt and make a part hereof the following portions of the opinion of that court in deciding the appeal:

"The defendant was charged with the crime of pandering as defined in the statutes of this state. Stats. 1911, p. 9. The particular charge against the defendant was that she did procure, persuade, and encourage a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. On the trial she was found guilty of the offense charged. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and an order denying a motion for new trial.

"Appellant assigns as grounds for reversal that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the court erred in instructing the jury.

"The evidence shows that Dorothy Hall, a girl 16 years of age, left her home in the city of Los Angeles in February, 1923, with one Miguel Mayo, and that the two lived together as man and wife in various hotels and lodging houses in said city up to April 23, 1923. During this time the said Dorothy Hall in these various hotels and lodging houses practiced prostitution under the direction of the said Mayo, the two sharing in the profits of her prostitution. On April 23, 1923, she entered defendant's house with Mayo, where they lived until the house was raided by the police of said city on April 28, 1923. In the house of the defendant, and during her stay there, she and Mayo continued to cohabit as man and wife, and she continued to practice prostitution as she had done prior to taking up her residence there. The evidence is beyond question sufficient to establish the fact that the house of the defendant at the time said Dorothy Hall became an inmate thereof, and during all the time she resided there, was a house of prostitution. The arrangements for Dorothy Hall to enter defendant's house were made with defendant by Mayo, and the terms agreed upon were that defendant was to receive $4 per week for the rent of the room and 50 cents for each act of sexual intercourse indulged in by the said Dorothy Hall while an inmate of defendant's house. These terms were complied with by the parties thereto during the time that Mayo and Dorothy Hall occupied a room in defendant's house. The evidence further shows that Dorothy Hall speaks the English language, but neither speaks nor understands the Spanish language; that the defendant speaks the Spanish language but neither speaks nor understands the English language; and that Mayo speaks and understands both the English and the Spanish language.

[1, 2] "The claim of appellant is that there is no evidence that she either procured, persuaded, or encouraged Dorothy Hall to become an inmate of her house. Appellant argues that as Dorothy Hall was unable to speak the Spanish language and the defendant was without any knowledge of the English language, it was impossible for them to have any communication one with the other, and therefore it would be impossible for defendant to procure, persuade, or encourage the girl to enter the house of the former. It is true that this state of facts might preclude the two persons named from having any direct communication with each other. In this proceeding, however, it appears from the testimony that Miguel Mayo, acting for Dorothy Hall, arranged for the latter to enter the house of the defendant. Had the defendant dealt directly with the Hall girl and agreed with her that she was to enter defendant's house with the understanding that defendant was to receive the compensation agreed upon, there is no doubt that the defendant would be guilty as charged. Is she any the less guilty of the offense when she carries on these negotiations with a third person? In her dealings with Mayo she had but one object in view, and that was to procure the Hall girl to become an inmate of her own house. Her efforts in this direction were successful, and in so doing she violated the plain provisions of the statute. We are therefore of the opinion that the evidence justifies the verdict of guilty as rendered against the defendant in this action.

"The next objection to the judgment interposed by the appellant is that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. The court, at the request of the prosecution, gave the following instruction:

" 'You are instructed that Act 865, General Laws, provides as follows: "Any person who shall procure a female inmate for a house of prostitution, or who, by promises, threats, violence, or by any device or scheme, shall cause, induce, persuade or encourage a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, or shall procure for a female person a place as inmate in a house of prostitution, or as an inmate of any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state, or any person who shall, by promises, threats, violence or by any device or scheme, cause, induce, persuade or encourage an inmate of a house of prostitution or any other place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed, to remain therein as such inmate, or any person who shall, by fraud or artifice, or by duress of person or goods or by abuse of any position of confidence or authority, procure any female person to become an inmate of a house of ill-fame, or to enter any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state, or to come into this state or leave this state for the purpose of prostitution, or who shall receive or give, or agree to receive or give, any money or thing of value for procuring, or attempting to procure, any female person to become an inmate of a house of ill-fame within this state, or to come into this state or leave this state for the purpose of prostitution, shall be guilty of a felony, to wit, pandering." '

"During one of the occasions when the court had the jury returned to the courtroom for the purpose of ascertaining whether they had agreed upon a verdict, a juror asked the court the following question: 'Would it be all right for me to ask you the meaning of the word "pandering"? Does it mean allowing to remain in the house, or does it mean going out and getting the girl to come?' The court replied to this question as follows: 'Now, the statute itself describes what pandering is, and one instruction has that section of the statute copied.' The court then read to the jury the foregoing instruction, and followed such reading by the following remark: 'So, a person who does any of these things, who, by promises, threats, and so on, shall cause or induce or persuade or encourage a female person to become an inmate or who shall procure for a female person a place as an inmate, or any person who shall by promises, threats, and so forth, cause or induce an inmate of a house of prostitution to remain there in a house of prostitution, or shall, by fraud or artifice procure any female person to become an inmate of a house of ill fame, or to enter any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state, or to come into this state, and so on, is guilty of pandering.' It is now claimed by appellant that the court erred to her serious prejudice, both by the giving of the instruction originally and by afterwards reading it to the jury and commenting upon it in the manner as shown by the above remarks of the court. The charge against appellant, as we have already noted, was that she did procure, persuade, and encourage the said Dorothy Hall to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. She was not charged with causing, inducing, persuading, or encouraging said Dorothy Hall to remain therein as an inmate. Appellant therefore contends that by the giving of said instruction and by the re-reading thereof, and by commenting on, that portion of the statute which provided that any person who shall cause, induce, persuade, or encourage an inmate of a house of prostitution to remain therein is guilty of pandering, the court misled the jury into the belief that they could find the defendant guilty of pandering in this action, if the evidence showed that she had caused, induced, persuaded, or encouraged the girl to remain an inmate of her house."

It is shown by the record that, after the jury had been deliberating some four hours and thirty-five minutes, they were returned into court. The exchange between the court and several of the jurors elicited the fact that the jury stood eleven to one for conviction. It further developed that the divergence of opinion between the eleven jurors on the one hand and the unconvinced juror on the other was as to the state of the testimony upon two questions of fact. One of these questions was as to the complaining witness' age, "as to the birth certificate or evidence of her age at the time," and the other was whether Mayo, when he first went to the house of prostitution, "was accompanied by the girl, or whether the girl did not come until the second visit; or whether he was accompanied on his first visit by this man, and then went back and brought the girl in the evening?" Later the court declined to answer the following question: "A Juror: May I ask would the girl be in the juvenile court if over eighteen years old?" It was finally decided by the jurors that the reading of the testimony would make no difference "in the disagreement." One of them said that reading the testimony as to whether Mayo was accompanied by the complaining witness on the first visit would not help the situation—that "it is on a different point altogether, and depends upon the age of the girl." The dissenting juror was then asked whether reading the testimony as to her age "would clarify things," and he answered, "not for me." One of the jurors remarked:

> "May I say a word? I am sorry to say it, but I think I am voicing the sentiment of all of us here; there is an impossible situation; we cannot meet."

The court, however, refused to discharge the jury and they retired for further deliberation without any of the testimony being read.

An hour and a half later, upon again being brought into court, the foreman of the jury, in answer to the question of the court as to whether an agreement had been reached, replied:

> "We have not, your honor; but the one voting for acquittal has voted the same on every ballot since entering the jury room, and says if we vote from now till doomsday their opinion will never be changed; so it doesn't seem necessary to the rest of the jurors to remain longer."

Whereupon the court indicated it would not discharge the jury, and remarked, referring to what developed on the previous occasion concerning the age of the complaining witness, that it was immaterial under count 1 of the information whether "she was under age or over age, or how old she was." Then the following occurred:

> "A Juror: I am the person who has voted not guilty—
> "The Court: I don't know that I care—
> "The Juror: I do this as the jury felt I ought to have done it before; I thought that it was right to do it and I want to do it. It is over the discussion of the instructions and not the evidence; the instructions as to whether this girl came there or was brought there, or came of her own volition, that is what the discussion is. I have read time and again your instructions on the last page, and it is a matter of procuring or encouraging, and I have read over every word to see to what extent the defendant is responsible for this individual's coming. I don't think—
> "The Court: That is a question turning upon the facts. I think the instructions are clear on that as on most other points. I don't believe there is anything I can add to the instructions to clarify them, and, if there should be any particular instruction that any juror does not understand, I would be very glad to make— * * *"

The court next read the instruction in question as already set forth.

The situation presented to the trial court was this: One of the jurors had been voting throughout for acquittal—the other eleven for conviction. It is evident that the former was confused in stating that his perplexity was over "the instructions and not the evidence," for he said that the point was "whether this girl came there or was brought there, or came of her own volition, that is what the discussion is." That the juror was concerned with the evidence rather than the instructions is further shown by the contentions over the evidence; the principal point being whether the complaining witness accompanied Mayo the first time she went to the house of prostitution. Moreover, the court, in answering the juror, said, "That is a question turning upon the facts." It would seem then that the juror was not induced to change his vote by the circumstance that in re-reading the instruction the court repeated the clause—"to remain there as such inmate." The juror who acknowledged he voted for acquittal appeared to be in doubt on two points—the age of the complaining witness, and whether she went to the house of her own volition. The court cleared up the first point when it stated that her age was immaterial under count 1, and it must be assumed that the juror, in joining in the verdict on count 1, finally concluded she was induced, persuaded, and encouraged by the defendant "to enter the house," and that she did not become an inmate of her own volition. In other words, his point of perplexity was not whether the mistress of the house allowed the girl to remain there within the meaning of the clause in question, but whether she induced the girl to become an inmate in the first instance.

In giving the charge originally the court read the entire statute to the jury, and that it was merely intended to repeat it is evidenced by the remark, of the judge: "I think I can put my hand on the particular instruction covering the matter;" that is to say, the part objected to was not given to the jury as an element in count 1. The meaning of the word "pandering" was the point of the inquiry, and the juror who propounded the question evidently was thinking of the defendant with reference to the arrival of the minor at the house in the first instance, for the inquiry is, "Does it mean allowing to remain in the house, or does it mean going out and getting the girl to come?" It is not claimed that the defendant brought the complaining witness to the house, and, this being so, it is as consistent with the evidence that by the words "allowing to remain in the house" the juror meant allowing the girl to remain when Mayo first brought her to the house as it is that he had reference to the period after she had been installed as an inmate.

It is made abundantly clear that the action of the court in merely re-reading the statute is not susceptible of the construction sought to be put upon it, namely, that by repeating the phrase "or to remain as such inmate" it was meant to convey to the jury that the defendant could, under the evidence, be convicted of that element of the statute. But, apart from this, it is not apparent to us how any prejudicial effect could attach to the action of the court in failing to omit the phrase objected to. After re-reading the statute, the court finally said:

> "And then the last three pages of the instructions specifically define if you find certain things set forth in those instructions, then your verdict should be so and so. Read those last three pages. I think that will cover the matter also. I am desirous of making the law as clear as possible, but I think they are clear."

The other instructions thus referred to included the following, given at the request of the defendant:

> "The court instructs you that the crime of pandering consists in the procuring of a place in a house of prostitution for one who becomes an inmate thereof. In order to complete this offense it must be proved to your satisfaction beyond every reasonable doubt:
> "First. That a place was procured in a house of prostitution for a female person; and,
> "Second. That, following such procuring of such place in such house, the female person for whom such place was so procured actually occupied such place or room in such house.
> "If either the first or the second of these elements is lacking, then the crime of pandering cannot be said to have been committed.
> "In this case I instruct you, therefore, that before you can find the defendant guilty of the crime of pandering you must find:
> "(1) That the home of the defendant at 1217 Temple street in the city of Los Angeles, was a house of prostitution, or house where prostitution was allowed or permitted by the defendant.
> "(2) That a place or room in such house was procured by the defendant for Dorothy Hall, and that the defendant induced or persuaded Dorothy Hall to enter said house and become an inmate thereof and occupy a room therein for the purpose of practicing prostitution.
> "(3) That following such inducement or encouragement of said Dorothy Hall by the defendant and in response to such inducement or encouragement on defendant's part Dorothy Hall did so enter defendant's home, become such inmate, and occupy a room for such purpose.
> "And unless you so find it is your duty to acquit the defendant of the crime of pandering.
> "The court instructs the jury that, if you find and believe from the evidence in this case that Miguel Mayo, otherwise known as Mike Flores, procured or persuaded or encouraged Dorothy Hall to enter the home of the defendant at 1217 Temple street in this city of Los Angeles, and that this defendant did not aid, abet, assist, or participate in procuring, or persuading or encouraging said Dorothy Hall to enter her home at said location, then your duty is to acquit the defendant."

[3] It is plain beyond dispute that the jury could not have understood and did not understand the court to charge that the defendant might be convicted of inducing, persuading, or encouraging the complaining witness to remain in the house of prostitution as such inmate. That branch of the statute was not included in count 1 of the information, and, although it was read to the jury both originally and on the second occasion when they were returned to court, their consideration was expressly limited throughout the charge, and, when the jury was again before the court, to the acts charged in count 1 of the information.

We are satisfied the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict under count 1, and that no prejudicial error is shown by the record.

WORES v. IMPERIAL IRR. DIST. et al.

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1924. Rehearing Denied June 27, 1924.)

1. Statutes 🔑74(1), 76(1)—Act for government of irrigation districts of more than 500,000 acres not invalid as special legislation.

St. 1915, p. 1, providing for government of irrigation districts having an area of more than 500,000 acres, is not obnoxious to Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring general laws to have uniform operation, or article 4, § 25, subd. 33, prohibiting special laws where general one can be made applicable, especially in view of amendment of article 11, § 13, in 1914.

2. Constitutional law 🔑48, 70(1)—Question of classification primarily one for legislative power.

Question of classification of irrigation districts for governmental purposes is primarily one for legislative power, to be determined in light of its knowledge, and presumption is in favor of fairness and correctness of determination by legislative department, and that determination will not be overturned unless plainly without warrant in facts.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Board of equalization of irrigation district may equalize assessments without formal petitions.

Under General Irrigation Act, § 38, board of equalization of the Imperial irrigation district could assume and exercise power to equalize assessments without presentation before it of formal petitions or requests by interested property owners.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Court held not authorized to override conclusions of directors of irrigation district acting as board of equalization.

Reduction of 50 per cent. in valuation of properties within incorporated cities and towns and unincorporated subdivisions within the Imperial irrigation district, by the board of directors acting as a board of equalization, held not subject to review by the court under General Irrigation Act, §§ 37, 38, where complaints were made to the board and discussed, and no fraud was shown.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Board of directors of irrigation district held empowered to provide income by tolls.

Under General Irrigation Act, § 55, board of directors of Imperial irrigation district held authorized, in addition to levying assessments, to provide income by tolls and charges for irrigation.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Board of directors invested with large discretion in fixing tolls.

In fixation of tolls and charges for use of water, board of directors of Imperial irrigation district is invested with a very large discretion, and remedy of landowner for imposition of undue burden by assessments or tolls or both is that of effecting a change in directory.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Board of directors of irrigation district not limited to 2 per cent. of aggregate value of lands.

Board of directors of Imperial irrigation district, in raising moneys required for uses and needs of district, actual or potential, is not confined to 2 per cent. of aggregate value of lands within district, under General Irrigation Act, § 39, as amended in 1915.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; George R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Charles R. Wores against the Imperial Irrigation District and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied, MYERS, C. J., dissenting.

W. B. Mathews, of Los Angeles, and Phil D. Swing and Chas. L. Childers, both of El Centro, for appellants.

Harry W. Horton and Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, all of El Centro, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Imperial county in favor of the plaintiff, in an action instituted by him against the defendant Imperial irrigation district and the members of the board of directors of said district, to have it adjudged and decreed that certain assessments, tolls, and charges levied, assessed, and imposed against the property owners and tax and assessment payers of said district are null and void, and that they be canceled, annulled, and set aside and that an injunction issue restraining said defendants and each of them from enforcing or collecting said assessments, tolls, and charges against the said plaintiff and the other property owners and tax and assessment payers of said district. The amended complaint of the plaintiff herein, in brief, alleges that on the 18th day of September, 1923, the then existing board of directors of the said Imperial irrigation district undertook to levy an assessment upon the lands within said district, through the passage and adoption of a certain resolution, wherein it was recited that the assessed valuation of the real property within said district, according to the equalized assessment rolls of said district, is the sum of $43,010,893, and that, after deducting from said valuation 15 per cent. thereof for anticipated delinquencies, there would remain a net valuation of said property in the sum of $36,559,259.05. It was therefore resolved by said board of directors of said irrigation district that it was necessary that the sum of $1,005,452.95 be raised by assessment for the general current expenses of the district during the ensuing calendar year and that it was necessary that the sum of $812,500 be raised by assessment to meet the interest due or that will become due on the outstanding bonds of the district on the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of the next ensuing year; and to that end that there be and was thereby levied an assessment of 27.5 mills upon the dollar of said assessment valuation of said property for the general expenses of said district, and an assessment of 22.5 mills upon the dollar thereof to meet the interest due and to become due upon said bonds. The said complaint further alleged that the said board of directors of said district did also, by resolution duly adopted, elect, in lieu of levying all amounts required for 1924 by assessment, to in part fix rates of tolls and charges for the ensuing calendar year for the supply for irrigation and other public uses of the water furnished by said district; and, in arriving at the amount and rates of said tolls and charges, did estimate and fix such rates as would raise the sum of $1,489,500 by the sale of said water; and that the said board of directors of said district did accordingly, by resolution duly entered, adopt and fix a schedule of water rates to become effective on January 1, 1924, and wherein it was provided that the tolls and charges for water furnished for general irrigation throughout said district should be $1 per acre foot, except as otherwise in said resolution provided; that the charges for water furnished and used exclusively for washing, silting, and sluicing sand dunes or high land should be $1 for each delivery when water was available and not required for irrigation; that the charges for water service to school districts should be $1 per month; that the charge for service pipes not to exceed two inches in diameter for domestic and stock use should be $12 per year, payable semiannually in advance; that the minimum charge for water furnished to regular delivery gates for stock and domestic uses should be $1 per day. This resolution further provided that when the 1923–24 assessment on any particular tract of land assessed on the acreage basis was paid the owner of said tract should be entitled, upon presentation of his assessment receipt therefor, to receive thereon 2½ acre feet of water per acre upon his land and order without additional charge on or before December 31, 1924, provided said land is valued for assessment purposes at $100 per acre; but, if said land is valued at more or less than $100 per acre, then the amount of free water to which the owner thereof should thus become entitled should be increased or decreased in the ratio which the assessed valuation bears to $100. The amended complaint then proceeds to allege that the real property within the corporate limits of the cities of Calexico, El Centro, Holtville, Brawley, and Calipatria are not being assessed on an acreage basis within the meaning of the above resolution, although the said cities are within the lands comprising the Imperial irrigation district; and that is true, or the reason that on the 14th day of September, 1923, the said board of directors, acting as a board of equalization for said Imperial irrigation district, passed and adopted the following resolutions, viz.:

> "Resolved that the assessed valuation paid on all real estate within incorporated cities in the district is higher than its actual value and for the purpose of equalization the same ought to be and is hereby reduced 50 per cent. on each respective parcel."
> "Resolved that the valuations on the following subdivisions be and they are hereby reduced 50 per cent. from present assessed valuation as placed by the assessor of the district, Dixie, Heber, Niland, Seeley, Westmoreland."

The amended complaint alleges that these resolutions—

> "were adopted for the fraudulent purpose of throwing additional burden on plaintiff and all other district assessment payers owning land within said Imperial irrigation district and lying without the boundaries of said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions, and that said reduction in said valuation was not made on any basis of actual cash or other value of said property, but made solely for the purpose of fraudulently relieving said real property within said incorporated cities and subdivisions from their just and fair proportion of the assessment thereafter to be levied for the year 1924 by said irrigation district, and also for the fraudulent purpose of throwing an illegal and unequal burden of taxes on the lands lying within said irrigation district and without said cities and subdivisions, and that unless said assessments hereinbefore purported to be made and levied by said board of directors and irrigation district is annulled and set aside this plaintiff and all other assessment payers in said district and owning property without said cities and subdivisions will be irreparably damaged and without any adequate recourse at law."

The amended complaint further and finally alleged that the estimated revenue of said irrigation district exceeds in substantial and gross amounts the legal estimated expenditures of said district as determined by said board of directors for the calendar year of 1924, and that said assessments are for that reason also illegal and void. Wherefore the plaintiff prays that the said assessments be adjudged null and void, and that the said defendants be restrained from the enforcement or collection thereof and of the tolls and charges imposed in aid thereof.

The amended answer of the defendants contains numerous denials of the averments of the plaintiff's amended complaint, but those which appear to be essential to the determination of the questions presented upon this appeal consist in their denials that in the adoption of the resolutions set forth in the plaintiff's amended complaint, or any of them, and particularly of those purporting to equalize the assessment of lands lying within said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions, the said board of directors acted in any degree fraudulently or for the fraudulent purposes, or any of them, asserted in the plaintiff's amended complaint; and they deny that the reductions in valuations of the lands lying within said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions were not made upon any basis of actual cash or other value of said properties, or that the same were made for the purpose of fraudulently relieving the owners of such properties of their just and fair proportion of the assessments to be levied for the year 1924. They admit that said reductions in the valuations of said properties were made solely upon the direction of the board of directors of said district, but deny that they were made solely upon the instigation of said board, or without any request therefor by interested persons, or that the same were made without valid reason or justification therefor, based upon the actual cash or other valuation of the property affected thereby. The defendants also deny that the estimated revenue of said irrigation district exceeds in substantial or any amounts the legal estimated expenditures of said district, or that the assessments levied by the board of directors of said irrigation district are illegal or void for that or any other reason. For a further and separate defense the defendants aver that the Imperial irrigation district is an irrigation district organized and existing under and by virtue of the California Irrigation District Act, approved March 31, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254), and of the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and that it is and ever since the organization has been a district having an area of more than 500,000 acres of land within its boundaries, all located within the county of Imperial, state of California. Wherefore the defendants pray that the plaintiff take nothing by his amended complaint.

The trial of the cause came on for hearing upon the issues as thus framed, and at its conclusion and submission the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein the court found that the board of directors of the irrigation district had duly and regularly adopted the several resolutions set forth in the plaintiff's amended complaint and admitted by the defendants' answer. The court then proceeded to find that the assessor of the Imperial assessment district had duly assessed all real estate located within the incorporated cities and the unincorporated subdivisions specified in the pleadings herein at the actual cash value thereof, and that the reductions in said valuations, as attempted by the two resolutions of the board of directors of said district were not made or based upon any basis of actual cash or other value of said properties, but were made and passed for the purpose of relieving the real property within said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions from their just and fair portion of the assessment thereafter to be levied for the year 1924, and also for the purpose of throwing an additional burden of taxes upon the lands lying within said Imperial irrigation district, but without said incorported cities and unincorporated subdivisions, and that said reductions were made solely at the instigation or direction of said board of directors, and without any petition or request therefor being filed by any interested person and without any evidence or testimony being taken under oath, and without any evidence being presented in support of the change of valuations and without any valid reason or justification therefor based upon the actual or other valuation of any of said property. The trial court therefore concluded and found that said reductions were void. The court further found and concluded that the assessment as purported to have been levied by the board of directors of said irrigation district was illegal and void in any and all amounts that the same exceeded the amounts and purposes authorized by any of the provisions of Act 1726 of the General Laws of the state of California. The court further found that as to the rates of tolls and charges adopted by the aforesaid resolutions of said board these were also illegal and void to the extent that such tolls and charges exceed, together with the amount of the assessment levied by said board of directors, the amount that is provided and permitted to be raised by section 39 of the California Irrigation Act, and that the amounts to be raised by said tolls and charges are illegal and void as in addition thereto. As conclusions of law from its foregoing findings of fact, the trial court found that the assessment levied by the board of directors—

"is void as to any sum or amount in excess of the sum of $812,500, as and for the payment of interest due or to become due in the year 1924 upon the outstanding bonds of the Imperial irrigation district and a sum not exceeding 2 per centum of the aggregate value of the lands within said Imperial irrigation district according to the last duly equalized assessment roll thereof, and that plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against the collection or enforcement of any portion of the assessment or tax levied by the board of directors of the Imperial irrigation district in excess of, first, the sum of $812,500 found by said directors to be sufficient to raise the interest due or that will become due on all outstanding bonds of the said Imperial irrigation district on the 1st day of next ensuing January and on the 1st day of the next ensuing July; second, plus an amount not exceeding 2 per centum of the aggregate value of the lands within said Imperial irrigation district according to the latest duly equalized assessment roll thereof. Further that the collection or enforcement of rates of tolls or charges for the sale of water to any amount in excess of the sum of $812,500, plus an amount not exceeding 2 per cent. of the aggregate value of the lands within said Imperial irrigation district, according the latest duly equalized assessment roll thereof, is illegal and void, and that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against the enforcement or collection of tolls and charges for water by the said Imperial irrigation district for water ordered or to be delivered to lands within the Imperial irrigation district during the calendar year of 1924. Further, that the orders and resolutions of said board of directors reducing the values of the real property within the incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions within said Imperial irrigation district 50 per cent. are illegal and void, and the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against the collection or enforcement of the assessment or taxes or the enforcement or collection of tolls or charges by said Imperial irrigation district, based upon such reduction or other than upon the assessed valuation of the property within said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions as fixed and assessed by the assessor of said Imperial irrigation district."

It is to be noted that the court nowhere expressly finds or concludes that the board of directors of the Imperial irrigation district, or any of the members thereof, acted fraudulently in connection with the passage and adoption of any of the resolutions or other acts of the said board of directors of said district, having relation to the adoption or equalization of the assessments assailed by the plaintiff herein, or to the adoption of the resolution relating to the collection of tolls and charges for the use of the water of said district by the inhabitants thereof. The conclusion arrived at by the trial court as to the validity of the action of the board of directors of said district in the levy of the assessment in question, and the equalization thereof as to certain of the lands to be affected thereby, and as to the tolls and charges imposed upon the users of the water of said district, whether in connection with or addition to the amounts properly raisable by assessment, is apparently based upon its conclusion that the act of the Legislature, approved January 21, 1915, and entitled "An act to provide for the government irrigation districts having an area of more than 500,000 acres, etc." (Stats. 1915, p. 1), is void as special legislation, and hence that the Imperial irrigation district and its board of directors, which purported to act under the authority of said statute in their attempted levies of the assessments, tolls, and charges assailed in this action, were acting without authority of law and in violation of the provisions of the general irrigation acts which the act of 1915 was intended to supplement and alter with regard to irrigation districts having areas in excess of 500,000 acres in extent. The briefs of counsel herein are almost exclusively devoted to the discussion of this question, and to it we shall primarily direct our inquiry.

[1, 2] The main objection which the respondent urges to the validity of the act of 1915 is, first, that it is not a general law; and, second, that as special legislation it is invalid because it deals with a subject to which a general law could be made applicable. The act of 1915, as its title states, was an act to provide for the government of irrigation districts having areas in excess of 500,000 acres, and to provide additional powers for boards of directors of such districts. The act is both by its title and its terms supplementary of the General Irrigation Act approved March 31, 1897, and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof. It is the contention of the respondent herein that the act of 1915 is not a general law, for the reason that it is confined in its operation to the government of irrigation districts having an area of more than 500,000 acres, which, as the respondent contends, furnishes no proper basis for a classification. We are unable to agree with this contention. It may be stated as a general rule that the question of classification is primarily one for the legislative power, to be determined by it in the light of its knowledge of all the circumstances and requirements. The presumption in the courts is in favor of the fairness and correctness of the determination by the legislative department, and the courts are not privileged to overturn that determination unless they can plainly see that the same was without warrant in the facts. "This," as was said by this court in the case of In re Cardinal, 170 Cal. 519, 150 Pac. 348, L. R. A. 1915F, 850, "is but a statement of well-settled doctrines applicable in considering such questions as the one before us." See, also, Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 Pac. 578; In re Martin, 157 Cal. 51, 106 Pac. 235, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242; Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 679, 98 Pac. 1059; Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 138 Pac. 365; Reclamation Dist. v. Riley (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 762; Matter of Burke, 160 Cal. 300, 116 Pac. 755; Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 27 Sup. Ct. 289, 51 L. Ed. 499.

Applying the principle enunciated and applied in the foregoing cases to the act before us, we are unable to say that a proper basis for classification does not exist in the case of irrigation districts embracing more than 500,000 acres of land. In the recent case of Tarpey v. McClure (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 983, this court held, in construing the California Water Storage District Act of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1727), that said act could not be said to be local or special, in that it provided for the initiation of proceedings under it either by a petition signed by the holders of a majority in value of the lands within the proposed district, or by not less than 500 landowners representing not less than 10 per cent. in value of the land. Here was a classification based in some degree, at least, upon acreage of the larger water districts, but the act was held to be not the less a general law for that reason. It requires no labored reasoning nor undue stretch of imagination to arrive at the conclusion that irrigation districts having areas in excess of 500,000 acres may require the application of different rules and regulations for their government and for the raising of the necessary moneys for their successful operation than would be required for irrigation districts of smaller areas and of less diversified situations. The Imperial irrigation district seems to us to furnish an apt illustration of this. It lies along the west bank of the Colorado river, with its lands lower than the bed of that stream, and hence under the constant menace of disastrous overflow through breaches in the levees which restrain it. It embraces an area of more than 600,000 acres in California and of an additional several hundred thousand acres in Mexico. It owns and operates about 3,000 miles of main and lateral ditches fed from the waters of said river. It contains within its boundaries 5 incorporated towns and cities, and supports a population of about 50,000 people who are, in the main, either directly or indirectly employed in connection with the intensive production of the region made possible by the existence and activities of the irrigation district itself. It has in the past presented, and may at any moment in the future be confronted with, problems of water control requiring immediate and inestimable outlays of effort and money to restore safety and avert widespread, if not permanent, disaster. There would seem, therefore, to be obvious reasons why irrigation districts having the areas and subject to the conditions and possible emergencies of this one should have applied to them different methods of administration and finance than those applicable to districts of smaller areas and of a lesser diversity of conditions and eventualities. We are therefore of the opinion that the act of 1915 under consideration is a general law, for the passage of which a sufficient basis of classification existed. Looking to the title and terms of the act itself, we are also of the opinion that it is a general law having uniform operation upon all irrigation districts coming within its classification, and is not, therefore, obnoxious to section 11 of article 1 of the state Constitution. This conclusion disposes also of the respondent's contention that the act in question is in violation of subdivision 33 of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, which declares that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws where a general law may be made applicable. It may be noted in this connection that the state Constitution, as to article 11, section 13 thereof, was amended in the year 1914 by adding to the former inhibition thereof against the passage by the Legislature of any law delegating to special commissions, private corporations, associations, or individuals power to deal with municipal affairs or to perform any municipal functions, the following exception, viz.:

> "Except that the Legislature shall have power to provide for the supervision, regulation and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state."

While it is true that this court held in the case of Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 441, 192 Pac. 40, that in the exercise of these granted powers the Legislature is still subject to the general requirements of the Constitution governing the manner in which the power of legislation when conferred or possessed shall be exercised, and hence that the Legislature could not, under this grant of added powers, violate the provision of the Constitution requiring uniformity in the operation of general laws, still it must be conceded that, when this requirement of the Constitution is satisfied by finding a sufficient basis of classification in the attempted legislation, the Legislature, in all matters touching the regulation and conduct of the affairs of these classes of governmental agencies, has been given an enlarged discretion by the terms of the aforesaid amendments to the Constitution, and hence that very clear reasons must appear for whatever objections are urged against the particular provisions of a statute enacted subsequent to the adoption of said amendment to the Constitution before the courts would be justified in declaring them void.

These observations bring us to a consideration of the particular terms of the statute under review for the purpose of determining whether the changes wrought by it in the General Irrigation Act of 1897 and the amendments thereto, which it was designed to supplement, are to be deemed valid as within the discretion thus conferred upon the Legislature. The act of 1915, by section 1 thereof, provides:

> "The board of directors of irrigation districts having an area of more than five hundred thousand acres may expend such sums as may to them seem necessary for the protection of the canal system of such district or of lands within such districts from damage by flood and from the overflow of rivers and may contribute funds for that purpose to be expended by or jointly with the government of the United States of America, or other governments or persons benefited by the same protective work or works. The board of directors of any such irrigation district may also do all things necessary to insure such irrigation system and the lands within such district from any such damage by flood or overflow without first receiving a petition of landowners or freeholders for holding an election to authorize such expenditure."

Section 4 of said act provides:

> "The board of directors of any such irrigation district shall within fifteen days after the close of its session as a board of equalization, levy an assessment sufficient to raise the annual interest on any outstanding bonds of such district and for any year in which any bonds shall fall due, must increase such assessment to an amount sufficient to raise a sum sufficient to pay the principal of the outstanding bonds as they mature, also, sufficient to pay in full all sums due or that shall become due from the district before the time for levying the next annual assessment, also, sufficient to pay in full, the amount of any other contract or obligation of the district due or to become due within the succeeding twelve months and such further sum as, with the other revenue of the district, will meet the estimated current expenses of the district including cost of flood prevention for the succeeding twelve months."

The important change which the foregoing provisions of the act of 1915 makes in the powers and duties of boards of directors of irrigation districts, as defined by the General Irrigation Act of 1897 and the amendments thereto, is that the act of 1915 empowers boards of directors of the districts to which it applies to levy assessments for the purposes set forth in section 4 of said act, but without the limitation which was imposed by the General Irrigation Act through the amendment of section 39 thereof, adopted in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 514), and continued in force in the amendments of 1917 and 1919, restricting the amount of the annual assessments to a sum—

> "not exceeding two per centum of the aggregate value of the lands within the district according to the latest duly equalized assessment roll thereof, as the board of directors shall determine to be needed to be raised by assessment for any of the purposes of this act." Stats. 1917, pp. 751–765.

Neither the amendment to the General Irrigation Act made in 1917, nor that enacted in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 472) purported expressly or by implication to annul or affect the supplementary act of 1915 in the foregoing or any other respect, and hence cannot be given the effect of limiting the powers of boards of directors of districts affected by and operating under the act of 1915, relieved by it from such former limitation.

The conclusion that the act of 1915 under review is a general law and is valid as such answers every constitutional objection which the respondent urged against it, and leads to the inevitable deduction that the trial court was in error in that portion of its decision wherein the assessment levied by the board of directors of Imperial irrigation district is held to be void in so far as it exceeds the 2 per cent. limitation imposed by the terms of the General Irrigation Act as amended in 1911, 1917 and 1919.

[3, 4] The other questions involved in this appeal relate, first, to the regularity of the action of the board of directors of Imperial irrigation district sitting as a board of equalization with special reference to the reduction of the assessed valuation of those properties which lie within the limits of the incorporated towns and cities and of certain unincorporated subdivisions of lands within said district; and, second, as to the validity of the action of the said board of directors in fixing tolls and charges for the use of water by the users thereof within said district. As to the first of these questions the undisputed facts, as shown by the evidence in the case, are these: On or about September 1, 1923, the board of directors of Imperial irrigation district met as a board of equalization for the purpose of equalizing the assessment of the properties of said district which had theretofore been made by the assessor thereof for the current year. The said board met upon said date pursuant to the notice required to be given of such session by the provisions of section 37 of the General Irrigation Act, and which notice it is conceded was duly and regularly given. When thus assembled the board proceeded to act as such board of equalization under the powers conferred upon it as such by the terms of section 38 of said General Irrigation Act, which reads as follows:

> "Upon the day specified in the notice required by the preceeding section for the meeting, the board of directors, which is hereby constituted a board of equalization for that purpose, shall meet and continue in session from time to time, as long as may be necessary, not to exceed ten days, exclusive of Sundays, to hear and determine such objections to the valuation and assessments as may come before them; and the board may change the valuation as may be just. The secretary of the board shall be present during its session, and note all changes made in the valuation of property, and in the names of the persons whose property is assessed; and within ten days after the close of the session he shall have the total value, as finally equalized by the board, extended into columns and added."

Acting in pursuance of the powers thus conferred, the said board of directors proceeded and continued to sit as a board of equalization during a period of about 10 days. The testimony as to what the board acting in that capacity did during that period is wholly contained in the testimony of Mr. Ira Aten, president of said board, Mr. F. H. McIvor, the secretary thereof, and Mr. Mark Rose, one of the members of said board. There was before the said board, during its session and proceedings as a board of equalization, a copy of the assessment roll which had theretofore been prepared by the assessor of said irrigation district. The trial court made certain findings with respect to the action and the regularity thereof of said board while sitting as a board of equalization, which, if supportable and if sufficient to support its judgment, must find such support in the testimony of the foregoing witnesses, and the action of the board thereof viewed in the light of the law applicable to the powers and duties of such boards of equalization. For example, the trial court found, with reference to the reductions in those valuations of the properties lying within incorporated towns and cities and also of those lying within certain unincorporated subdivisions:

> "That said reduction of valuations of said real property within said incorporated cities and unincorporated subdivisions was made solely from the instigation and direction of said board of directors and without any petition or request therefor being filed by any interested person, and without any evidence or testimony being taken under oath, and without any evidence being presented in support of the change of valuations, and without any valid reason or justification therefor based upon the actual or other valuation of any of said properties. That said reduction is void."

In so far as said finding purports to find that whatever reductions in said valuations were made by said board of equalization, were made solely from the instigation of said board, its findings in that regard are wholly unsupported by the evidence of these witnesses upon that point, which shows indisputably that during the 10 days' sessions of said board numerous complaints were made to the board and to the several members of the board, and which were by them conveyed to it that the valuations of city properties, as shown by said assessment roll, were too high, and that said board as a board, and also the individual members thereof, investigated these complaints, and that the members of said board discussed almost daily during the said sessions thereof as a board of equalization these complaints and the individual investigations made by its members as to the merits thereof.

In so far as the trial court, by its said findings, purports to find that whatever changes were made by said board in the valuations of the aforesaid properties were "without any valid reason or justification therefor based upon the actual or other valuation of any of said properties," the said evidence fails to support it, since the testimony of said witnesses upon that matter is to the contrary. The above-quoted finding of the trial court was apparently in its entirety based upon a misconception of said court as to the powers and duties of boards of equalization under the broad and general terms of section 30 of the General Irrigation Act above set forth. It is nowhere required therein that the board of equalization shall have filed with it or presented before it formal petitions or requests by interested property owners, or that evidence or testimony be taken under oath as a prerequisite to the assumption and exercise of power to equalize assessments. We are cited to no authority by the respondents herein which goes to the extent of holding that boards of equalization which are vested with the general power conferred by the said provision of the General Irrigation Act shall be required to have formal complaints in writing presented or filed before them or to have the testimony of sworn witnesses presented in order to the exercise of their equalizing powers and functions under said act. On the contrary, it is the general rule, supported by ample authority, that such formalities of procedure are not required. Rickard v. Council of Santa Barbara, 49 Cal. App. 58, 192 Pac. 726; Pierce v. Santa Barbara Co., 40 Cal. App. 302, 180 Pac. 641; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Comm'rs, etc., 20 Kan. 141; Fields v. Russell, etc., 38 Kan. 720, 17 Pac. 476; St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Surrell, 88 Ill. 535; Case v. Dean, 16 Mich. 12. The discussion of this subject brings us naturally to a question which is vital to the determination of the branch of this case under immediate consideration. That question is as to what power, under the facts of this case as disclosed by the undisputed evidence therein, the trial court or this court possesses to override the action and conclusions of the board of directors of said irrigation district acting as a board of equalization thereof in equalizing the property values within said district, in the absence of fraud or of a manifest abuse of its powers. In the case of La Grange, etc., Co. v. Carter, 142 Cal. 560, 565, 76 Pac. 241, this court declared the general rule applicable to the powers and duties of boards of equalization to be that—

> "A board of equalization of a county possesses great powers under our Constitution and statutes as to raising or lowering assessments. It seems, in the absence of fraud or malicious abuse of its powers, to be the sole judge of questions of fact and of the values of property. Such powers should be used with caution, after investigation, and with the sole purpose of doing equal and exact justice to each and every taxpayer, whether rich or poor, corporation or private citizen. To it the taxpayer can go for relief when assessed for more than his property is worth. To it the taxpayer may go when through fraud, favoritism, or ignorance of values some taxpayer is about to escape his just burden of taxation. We must presume in all cases that as a public official body it has performed his duty."

In the case of Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277, this court approved the foregoing rule and amplified it by the statement that—

> "It is not disputed that the conclusion of assessing officers as to the value of property for purposes of taxation, when honestly arrived at and when not made in pursuance of some fixed rule or general system the result of which is necessarily discriminatory and inequitable, is conclusive on the courts, however erroneous the conclusion of those officers may be. The law necessarily leaves the determination of the question of fact of value to certain officers, and when it appoints tribunals for that purpose, as in this state primarily the assessor, and, for purpose of review, the board of supervisors acting as a county board of equalization, the conclusion of those tribunals on such a question of fact constitutes a judgment that is not collaterally assailable in the courts. This is the universal rule, and it has been so held in this state. (San Jose Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Henne v. Los Angeles Co., 129 Cal. 297 [61 Pac. 1081]. See, also, Gray on Limitations of Taxing Power, § 1460 [31 C. C. A. 537].)"

The court in that case, however, proceeded to say:

> "But it is likewise universally held that a taxpayer may so assail an assessment in the courts where it was 'fraudulently and corruptly made with the intention of discriminating against him, and for the purpose of causing him to pay more than his share of the public taxes,' and it has that effect, or where there is something equivalent to fraud in the making of the assessment, producing such effect."

In the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. San Diego County, 183 Cal. 543, 191 Pac. 931, this court approved both the general rule and the exception to it as enunciated in the case last above cited but held that where it was shown to a board of equalization by evidence, without substantial contradiction or conflict, that certain property was assessed at nearly twice its real value, while other property similarly situated was assessed in pursuance of a "systematic, willful, and intentional scheme to so do, at not to exceed twenty-five per cent. of its real value," and that the board of equalization, with full knowledge of the existence of these facts, refused to take any other action than to deny the injured taxpayers' application for relief, such a situation would present a case showing "something equivalent to fraud" which would entitle the taxpayer to relief in the courts, regardless of the denial of his application by the board of equalization, and this entirely regardless of the motives of the members of the board. In the still more recent case of Birch v. Orange County, 186 Cal. 736, 200 Pac. 647, this court gave application to the same doctrine both in its general rule and in the exception, holding that "a grossly inequitable and palpably excessive overvaluation of property for taxation may be held constructively fraudulent," and cited a long line of cases in support of this conclusion. In both of the cases last above cited, and in all of the authorities upon which the aforesaid conclusion rests, it was made to affirmatively appear that there was no basis in reason or in the facts educed before the board of equalization in each case or before the court for any differentiation between the property subjected to the alleged unjust assessment and other properties of the same class similarly situated for purposes of taxation, and that no reasonable justification could be found or offered for the inequality of the assessment. In the case before us, however, no such situation exists. The properties with respect to which the board of directors of Imperial irrigation district undertook to exercise their discretion in making a horizontal reduction in their assessment were the lots and properties lying within the several incorporated towns and cities, and also those lying within certain specified subdivisions, all within the exterior boundaries of said district. It is obvious that as to such properties, when the same are being subjected to assessment for any purpose, a different principle and basis of valuation is to be applied than that applicable to acreage properties or agricultural lands lying outside of such towns, cities, or subdivisions, and that no proper comparison can be made as to such valuations upon the basis of acreage or of valuation for agricultural or like productive purposes. It is obvious that the assessor of this district must have recognized this differentiation between the bases of valuation of these two classes of the properties within said district in making up his assessment roll, and that if such assessment roll had been spread before us in this record it would disclose that he had done so. The question which was thus presented to this board of equalization was not as to whether the properties located within said incorporated towns and cities and said unincorporated subdivisions were as a whole assessed too high in comparison with the acreage areas of the district, but whether the assessment of these properties, considered as a whole, and in their own particular class for purposes of taxation, was too high as compared with the actual values of that class of assessable property. In the case of Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. County of Los Angeles, supra, this court pointed out that under the provisions of section 3673 of the Political Code county boards of equalization were invested with the power "to increase or lower the entire assessment roll, or any assessment contained therein," and we can see no reason why like power should not reside in the board of equalization of an irrigation district. The question thus resolves itself into the inquiry as to whether, upon the record before the trial court or before us on appeal, there is anything to show that in making the reduction of 50 per cent, in the valuation of properties within that particular class of property lying within those incorporated cities and towns or the particular unincorporated subdivisions enumerated in its order the said board acted either arbitrarily or in such grossly inequitable and palpable disregard of the actual valuation of said properties for purposes of assessment as to lead to the conclusion that their action in so doing was either actually or constructively fraudulent. We are entirely satisfied that there is no such showing upon the face of this record. As to any actual fraud, while it is true the plaintiff's amended complaint does charge in general terms that the said board acted fraudulently in the premises, not only was there no effort made to prove such averment, but the trial court entirely refrained from deciding that the said board acted fraudulently; while as to either constructive fraud or as to any arbitrary action on the part of said board the undisputed evidence shows that the subject of the excessive valuation of the properties in question was brought to the attention of said board by numerous complaints made both to the board and to the individual members thereof, and that it was the main topic of investigation and discussion during the ten days or more consumed in the sessions of said board sitting as a board of equalization. The only evidence upon which the respondent relies as a foundation for his averments or for the finding of the trial court as to the actual value of the properties thus subjected to a reduction in their assessed valuations is the assessor's rolls and the presumption arising therefrom that he has properly performed his official duty. But a similar presumption arises as to the performance on the part of the board of equalization of its official duty in the matter of equalizing said assessment, in addition to which the record shows not only a prolonged investigation as to the facts, but also an express finding on their part that the assessed valuation of said properties as shown by the assessor's figures was too high. In such a state of the record we are constrained to give application to the general rule above stated to the effect that the finding and conclusions of the board of equalization in the instant case and its order based thereon were not the proper subject of review by the court.

[5-7] The remaining subject for discussion and determination in this case refers to the regularity and validity of the action of the board of directors of the Imperial irrigation district, sitting as such, in adopting the schedule of tolls and charges which it did adopt and sought to impose upon the various classes of water users within said district. While the respondent herein makes a general assault upon the validity of the resolution of said board imposing tolls and charges for the use of the water of the district upon the users thereof, upon the ground that the said board, having already provided by the method of assessment for the raising of all funds required by the district during the ensuing year, had exhausted its power, and hence could not provide for the raising of additional sums of money beyond the needs of the district as thus fully provided for by means of tolls and charges, it is to be observed that the trial court does not follow the respondent thus far, but confines itself in its findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgment to holding that the resolution of said board fixing and imposing such tolls and charges is illegal and void "to the extent and amount that such tolls and charges exceed, together with the amount of the assessment levied by said board of directors, the amount that is provided and permitted to be raised by the California Irrigation District Act." In making this finding of fact and in the conclusion of law which follows it, and also in its judgment which adopts and embodies said conclusion, the trial court was evidently proceeding upon the misapprehension that the board of directors of said district in the matter of raising the moneys required for the uses and needs, actual or potential, of the district for the ensuing year were confined to the limitation of 2 per cent. of the aggregate value of the lands within said district as provided in the General Irrigation Act of 1897 and the several amendments thereto; but, since we have heretofore held herein that the said board of directors of said district under their enlarged powers under the act of 1915 applicable to said district are no longer subject to such limitation, it follows that the trial court was in error in that regard. As to the general strictures of the respondent upon the validity as a whole of such imposed tolls and charges and of the resolution of the said board imposing the same, we are of the opinion that they are unwarranted by the facts of this case. In the first place it nowhere appears, either from the evidence in the case or from the resolutions of said board of directors or from the findings of the court, what the actual or potential expenditures required to be made by or on behalf of said district during the current year would be, or what it was estimated they would be by said board in making said assessment. It has therefore been neither proven nor found that the sum or sums to be provided by said board of directors through the method of assessment do more than pay in part the necessary or potential outlays of the district for the current year. This being so, the power of the board of directors to provide for the raising of such additional money for the needs of said district, over and above that provided by the means of an assessment, is to be found within the terms of section 55 of the General Irrigation Act, which provides that—

> "The board may in lieu (either in part or in whole) of levying assessments as herein provided for, fix rates of toll and charges, for irrigation and other public uses declared by this act, and collect the same," etc.

The phrase in parentheses in the above quotation from said act plainly means that the board of directors may employ both methods of raising money for the purposes of the district as defined by law. In the fixation of tolls and charges for the use of its water by the various classes of users to whom it is to be supplied, the board of directors of the district is invested with a very large discretion by the general terms of the law giving that power, and which the courts ought not to interfere with in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of that discretion. The remedy of the landowner or water user for the imposition of an undue burden by assessments or tolls or both is that of effecting a change in the directory of the district by the means provided in the acts relative to the selection of those who are from time to time intrusted with the conduct of the affairs of the district.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE'S STATE BANK v. PENELLO.

SAME v. BERTAINA.

(Civ. 2695, 2696.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1924.)

1. Bills and notes 🔑497(5)—Indorsee of notes procured by fraud had burden of proving itself an innocent holder.

Indorsee suing on notes shown to have been procured by fraud had burden of proving that it was an innocent holder.

2. Bills and notes 🔑357, 497(2)—Proof that notes were assigned before maturity as collateral security held to sustain burden of proving that plaintiff was an innocent holder.

Proof that notes were assigned to plaintiff before maturity as collateral security for payment of debt held to sustain plaintiff's burden of showing that it was an innocent holder, shifting on makers the burden of showing circumstances creating presumption that plaintiff knew the facts impeaching their validity.

3. Bills and notes 🔑525—Evidence held insufficient to warrant inference that indorsee had knowledge of fraudulent inception.

In action by indorsee on notes given for purchase price of corporate stock, evidence held insufficient to warrant reasonable inference that indorsee had knowledge of fraud by which notes were procured at time of indorsement.

4. Bills and notes 🔑525—Evidence held insufficient to warrant inference that bank was holding notes for collection only.

In bank's action on notes procured by fraud and transferred to bank as collateral security, evidence that bank agreed to reduce notes to judgment and to apply proceeds to payment of payee's note to bank, and that it was not defraying expenses of litigation, held not to warrant inference that bank was holding notes for collection only.

5. Novation 🔑1—Corporation's execution of renewal note indorsed by stockholders held not to constitute "novation."

Corporation's execution of renewal note indorsed by stockholders held not to constitute novation under Civ. Code, §§ 1530, 1531, though original note to secure which the notes sued on were pledged as collateral security, was signed by the corporation only.

6. Novation 🔑5—Rule as to establishment of novation by implication stated.

The release of original debtor by a novation cannot be established by implication, unless there is evidence showing facts and circumstances from which it might be reasonably inferred that the creditor intended to release the old debtor or to extinguish the old obligation.

7. Trial 🔑112—Limitation of argument to issue of attorney's fees held proper.

Where court directed verdict for plaintiff and submitted to jury merely the question as to attorney's fees, it was proper to limit the argument to such issue.

Appeals from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the People's State Bank against B. Penello and against George Bertaina. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. W. Henderson and Henry W. Longsdorf, both of Merced, for appellants.

W. N. Graybiel, of Turlock, and Andrew R. Schottky, of Merced, for respondent.

YOUNG, Justice pro tem. These two actions were consolidated and tried together before the same jury. Judgments were rendered in favor of plaintiff on directed verdicts, and from these judgments the defendants appeal. The actions have been twice tried, and this is the second time that they are before this court. The first trial resulted in verdicts and judgments in favor of defendants, and upon appeals prosecuted by plaintiff, the judgments were reversed. See People's State Bank v. Penello, 59 Cal. App. 174, 210 Pac. 432. The actions were commenced on April 22, 1921, and they were first tried in October of that year. The trial resulting in these appeals was had in November, 1923. In each action the plaintiff, hereinafter referred to as the bank, sues on three promissory notes for the aggregate sum of $1,000, made by the defendant in favor of Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company, a California corporation, and by it transferred to the bank. The notes were given for subscriptions for stock of the said company, and the defendants claim they were induced to sign them by fraudulent representations made by the stock salesmen. They admit the execution of the notes, but resist payment on three grounds, predicated on their fraudulent inception: First, that the bank took the notes with notice of the fraud; second, that the bank is a holder for collection only; and, third, that with notice of the fraud the bank entered into a new arrangement with the company, and with the assignee of the company, which said new arrangement constituted a novation and released defendants from liability. Practically the same defenses were made by the defendants in the first trial and it was held by this court on the former appeal in these causes that the evidence was insufficient to establish such defenses. On the second trial the trial court directed the verdicts for plaintiff upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to support these defenses, nor any of them.

The principal ground urged by defendants for the reversal of the judgments is that the court erred in directing the verdicts for plaintiff because there was substantial evidence showing, first, that the bank had notice of fraud, and, second, that the bank was a holder of the notes for collection only, and, third, novation.

[1] There was substantial evidence of the fraudulent nature of the representations made to induce the execution of the notes in suit. Indeed, the evidence on this phase of the cases was strong and convincing, and stands uncontradicted in the record. Proof of the fraud having been thus shown, the burden was cast upon the bank to show that it was an innocent holder of the notes. The rule governing courts in the determination of the sufficiency of the evidence in cases of this kind is set forth in Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873, as follows:

> "Upon proof by the defendant of fraud or illegality in the inception of the note, the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder. This the latter may do by showing that he purchased the note before maturity, or from an innocent indorsee for value, in the usual course of business. When this is done, unless the evidence shows that the note was taken by the plaintiff under circumstances creating the presumption that he knew the facts impeaching its validity, the burden is cast upon the defendant to show, if he would defeat the plaintiff in his action, that the latter took the instrument with notice of the defendant's equities."

The rule is quoted with approval in Commercial Bank v. Moretti, 177 Cal. 256, 170 Pac. 419, and also in the opinion of this court in the former appeal of this action.

[2] The bank has shown in these cases that the notes in dispute were assigned to it before maturity as collateral security for the payment of a debt owing by the Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company, assignor, to it as assignee. This being the case, the bank has sustained the burden cast upon it by the indorsement of the notes. It therefore follows that the burden rested upon the defendants to show that the bank took the notes under circumstances creating the presumption that it knew the facts impeaching their validity.

It is argued by the defendants that under the rule of law as above quoted they have sustained the burden of showing that the bank took the notes under circumstances which show that it had knowledge of the fraud, and they rely principally upon the evidence of J. E. Weaver, the president of the bank, called as their witness, to establish their contention. By the testimony of this witness it is shown that for months prior to the transfer of the notes in suit the company had been indebted to the bank in the sum of $10,300, evidenced by notes for $1,500, $5,600, and $5,000, respectively, the amounts due on the two former notes being $1,300 and $4,000, respectively. The loans were only partially secured, and payments were not being made. The bank knew of heavy losses by the company, and was dissatisfied with the condition of the loans, and urgently insisted upon a rearrangement. On July 16, 1920, in compliance with the demand of J. E. Weaver for payment of part of the loan and additional security for the balance, the company, acting through Bontz, paid the $1,300 note, and transferred the notes in suit and other notes to the bank. The principal part of Weaver's testimony relied on by defendants to show circumstances from which it can be inferred that the bank knew of the facts impeaching the validity of the notes, is, in substance, as follows:

> "At the time the bank took the notes I surmised in a general way that Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company was heavily involved. I knew that the first year of their storing sweet potatoes there that they could not help but to have made a loss, because they stored a good many potatoes and they rotted to a great extent. I knew in a general way they were heavily involved. I suspected that they had not made any money, that was sure, but as to their actual condition I don't know to this day. I would not say what Mr. Bontz said to me as to what the company had taken the notes for. My understanding was that some of them had been for stock of Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company, and others for seed potatoes. I knew the company was trying to sell stock. This note (one of the notes in suit) was the first note that the Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company ever gave the bank indorsed by the principal stockholders. Since that time every note made by the company to the bank has been indorsed by the stockholders."

Weaver further testified in reference to a transaction had on May 17, 1921, when a new note was demanded of the company by the bank:

> "To make that clear, they (Mr. Hunt, Mr. Jewett, and Mr. Bontz) called upon us at the bank and in a conversation about the notes we entered into this agreement. The substance of it was that we would renew this note and give them six months in which to pay the balance on it if they would pay all except $5,000, which they proceeded to do. And the question of these other notes came up that suit is being brought on. The suit had already been started before that, and we agreed with them that we would press the suit and give them credit on these notes for whatever funds came from them at any time that we made any collections on them. That is on any other notes we had, and they was to be given credit on this note regardless of its having been a time note, and for the remainder of this note they were to have six months in which to pay it off."

[3] We are satisfied that from the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence no reasonable inference can be drawn to the effect that the bank had knowledge of the fraudulent inception of the notes in suit at the time they were indorsed, and therefore the evidence would not furnish a sufficient basis upon which to rest verdicts in favor of the defendants, and it is our conclusion that the trial court did not err in directing verdicts on this issue.

[4] The contention of defendants that the bank is a holder of the notes in suit for collection only is based principally upon the fact that on May 21, 1921, the company's note for $5,000, held by the bank, for which these notes were held as collateral security, was renewed, and that at the time of the renewal the bank entered into an agreement with the principal stockholders of the company to press these suits and to apply the proceeds of its recovery against defendants to the credit of the company. We think that the bank's agreement to reduce these notes to judgment, and to apply the proceeds of any collection made by it to the payment of the company's note furnishes no evidence from which it might be inferred that it was holding the notes for collection only. If the credit of the company was impaired, as the evidence shows, it was to the interest of the bank to realize on its security and to reduce the company's indebtedness to it, if possible. Nor do we think that the further fact, shown by the evidence, that the bank is not defraying the expenses of this litigation, furnishes any evidence that the bank is a holder for collection only. It was to the interest of the bank to collect the notes without expense on its part, and for it to arrange with the company to pay expenses of the litigation was only a matter of business expediency. We think the evidence furnishes no issue on this point that should have been submitted to the jury.

[5] Defendants contend that the following transaction shows novation: The original note of the company for which the notes in suit were given as security was signed only by the company. The renewal note given in May, 1921, was indorsed by the stockholders of the company. We see nothing in this transaction that would not be reasonably expected as a matter of business prudence on the part of the bank. The company was involved, and the effort of the bank to obtain further security for the indebtedness is only evidence of business expediency on its part, and we think this transaction furnished no evidence upon which to submit the issue of novation to the jury, and the trial court was justified in directing the verdicts as to the same.

In October, 1921, the company made and delivered to the bank a note for $15,000, and at the same time executed a trust deed on real estate to secure the same. It is not shown that the indebtedness evidenced by the $5,000 note was included in this larger note.

Novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one. Civ. Code, § 1530 It is made either by the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties with intent to extinguish the old obligation, or by the substitution of a new debtor in place of the old one, with intent to release the latter. Civ. Code, § 1531.

"A renewal note does not extinquish the debt represented * * * for which it is given in lieu, unless there is a distinct and unqualified agreement that it shall so operate." Andrews v. First National Bank of Los Angeles, 55 Cal. App. 138, 203 Pac. 156; Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 28, 54 Pac. 273; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724. 72 Pac. 352.

[6] Defendants argue that the release of the original debtor by a novation of a contract may be established by implication. It is conceded that such is the law. Such implication cannot arise, however, until there is evidence showing facts and circumstances from which it might be reasonably inferred that the creditor intended to release the old debtor or to extinguish the old obligation. We perceive that no such facts and circumstances have been shown.

It appears that the Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company, in April, 1922, conveyed all its business and assets, both real and personal, to California Sweet Potato Corporation, subject to its liabilities, and that the grantee assumed to pay such liabilities; and it further appears that the Hunt-Jewett-Bontz Company thereafter became inactive in business, and that the California Sweet Potato Corporation has been paying the interest on the note held by the bank. It also appears that the bank knew that the interest was being paid by the California Sweet Potato Corporation. Defendant urges that this also shows novation. We think there is no substantial evidence of novation, and therefore that the court did not err in directing the verdicts.

Defendants complain of rulings of the trial court in sustaining objections to questions propounded by their counsel. There are many of these questions, and we can see no good purpose to be served in setting them out. An examination of these questions convinces us that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in the exclusion of evidence. Some of these questions were proper in form, and elicited evidence pertinent to the inquiry. An examination of the record shows, however, that as to each of them the evidence called for was produced in response to other questions. As to other questions, to which answers were not permitted, we are satisfied that the rulings of the trial court thereon were proper.

[7] The trial court limited the argument of counsel to the issue of attorney's fees, and defendants complain of this as error. Since the court properly directed the jury to return verdicts in favor of plaintiff on the main issue involved, and submitted to them the question as to attorney's fees alone, it was proper for it to limit the argument to the issue as to the attorney's fees.

Defendants complain of the ruling of the trial court in denying their motion for a new trial. No points are made as to this ruling not above discussed, and we think the court did not err in this ruling.

We think the judgments should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PYE v. EAGLE LAKE LUMBER CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 15, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 12, 1924.)

1. Evidence 🔑113(1), 525—How value of "mill run" of a mill may be proved stated.

To prove value of "mill run" of any mill, a witness who, after showing knowledge of lumber market, of mill, and of forest from which it was cutting, could have been asked direct question as to what was market value as of specified date of such "mill run" as such mill and such forest would have produced, or such value could have been proved by the different grades in which "mill run" of that particular mill would sort, and the different percentages of each of these grades, and then by proof of the market value of these grades in their several quantities; "mill run" meaning the lumber that comes from the mill in the ordinary process of its operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Mill Run.]

2. Damages 🔑96—Sum to be awarded is for jury, where substantial damages are shown and their amount is difficult to ascertain.

In cases where substantial damages are shown, and their amount is entirely uncertain or extremely difficult of ascertainment, the sum to be awarded is a question for the jury, in the exercise of a sound discretion.

3. Damages 🔑6—That full amount of damages is speculative not ground for refusing damages.

That the full extent of damages must be a matter even of speculation is not ground for refusing all damages.

4. Evidence 🔑114—Proof of what "mill run" had been tended to prove what subsequent "mill run" would be.

What the "mill run" of a mill had been while delivering over 1,500,000 feet of lumber is some evidence of what it would be while sawing the next 1,400,000 feet.

5. Sales 🔑417—Evidence on question of damages for breach of contract to supply lumber held to support judgment.

In action for breach of contract to deliver first 3,000,000 feet board measure of mill run white pine lumber to be cut in defendant's mill, defendant having delivered only about one-half designated amount, testimony offered by plaintiff upon question of damages within rule announced in Civ. Code, § 3354, to show what would have been character of mill run of defendant's mill for period it would have been cutting lumber to supply the contract, in absence of its breach, held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Findings of trial court resting on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where evidence conflicted as to market value of lumber contracted to be delivered, at time of breach of contract, findings of trial court having support in the evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

7. Sales 🔑409½, New, vol. 21A Key-No. Series—In action for failure to deliver to third person to whom plaintiff had agreed to resell such person held not necessary party.

Where contract between plaintiff and third person, which purported to assign to third person plaintiff's rights in upper grades of lumber to be delivered to plaintiff by defendant, amounted merely to resale to third person, and did not establish any privity between third person and defendant, third person was not necessary party in action by plaintiff for defendant's breach of contract.

8. Parties 🔑80(3)—Defendants' failure to plead nonjoinder in answer held waiver of right to object.

Defendants' failure to plead, in their answer, a nonjoinder held a waiver of their right to object to such nonjoinder.

9. Parties 🔑80(4)—General denial held not to raise issue of nonjoinder.

General denial in the answer held not to raise the issue of nonjoinder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by B. J. Pye, doing business under the name of the California-Oregon Lumber & Box Company, against the Eagle Lake Lumber Company, and others. From a judgment against them, defendants Thomas Coulter and Frank L. Spencer appeal. Affirmed.

Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for appellants.

J. J. Lermen and Oliver Ellsworth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem. The Eagle Lake Lumber Company was a corporation maintaining and operating a sawmill at Termo, in Lassen county, California. It owned or had under contract 1,600 acres of timber land which it held in connection with its mill.

On June 25, 1919, the defendant Eagle Lake Lumber Company entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby the company was to sell to plaintiff, the respondent herein, "the first 3,000,000 feet board measure of mill run white pine lumber" to be cut in the company's mill. The cutting was to begin immediately, and the plaintiff was to have all of the cut continuously until the entire 3,000,000 feet had been delivered, excepting that the company reserved the right to sell locally 200,000 feet board measure and 800,000 feet board measure to make into railroad ties. This contract left the rapidity with which the lumber was to be supplied, and the time in which its delivery should be completed, indefinite, and by a later supplemental contract it was provided that not less than ¾ of all of the cut of the mill during the period from June 25 to December 15, 1919, should be delivered to plaintiff, the respondent herein, and that during that time the entire 3,000,000 feet contracted for should be delivered. The contract made no provision as to what the quality of the lumber should be, other than that it should be "three million feet board measure of mill run white pine lumber," except that it was provided that the company agreed that unless the percentage of "No. 2 shop and better" white pine lumber sold under this agreement should equal 35 per cent. of the total, then that a readjustment of the contract price should be made on the basis of agreed prices for the different grades into which the lumber might be divided, of which the contract specified eight grades, designated as box lumber, numbers one and two shop, numbers one, two and three clear, and numbers one and two common board.

Under this contract the parties are in agreement that 1,526,210 feet of lumber were delivered, and that 1,473,790 feet remained undelivered. It is likewise undisputed that the conditions under which the defendant company failed to make delivery amounted to a definite breach of the contract. The defendants Coulter and Spencer were sued as stockholders of the defendant Eagle Lake Lumber Company. Judgment went against them in sums proportionate to their shares, and, from this judgment, these two defendants have taken this appeal.

[1] At the trial the parties were in substantial agreement that the measure of the plaintiff's damage, if any, was the difference between the contract price of the lumber, $22 per thousand, plus a slight cost for reloading, and the price at which similar lumber to that contracted for could have been purchased in the market nearest the place of delivery, as provided for in section 3354 of the Civil Code.

Out of the efforts of plaintiff to show what the market value of the undelivered portion of the lumber was arose the differences resulting in this appeal.

It will be noted that the lumber agreed to be delivered, and which defendant admittedly failed to deliver, was to have been "mill run white pine lumber" board measure. Appellants contend that the way in which to prove the market value of lumber thus described was to produce a qualified witness who knew the forest from which the lumber was to have been cut, and to ask him, in terms, what was the market value of such lumber as the "mill run" would have been from defendant's mill cutting logs from this forest. Respondent insists that there is no such grade of lumber as "mill run," and that the value of the lumber contracted for should be shown, and could only be shown, by finding out what grades the mill run from defendant's mill would sort into, and the percentages of the different grades, and then by proving the market values of the lumber in the different grades. It would seem that either method would be correct, provided it were properly done. There is no such grade of lumber as "mill run" known to the trade in the sense in which "box lumber" or "No. 1 clear," for example, are known. But the term, as a description, has a very definite meaning, and that is the lumber that comes from the mill in the ordinary process of its operation. "Mill run" of any one mill might differ from the "run" of any other mill, or a number of mills might so nearly approach each other in the character of the timber which they were sawing that their "runs" might be practically identical. The value of the "mill run" of any mill would, of course, depend upon the timber it was sawing, and whether or not this timber was of a kind which would produce a large or a small percentage of the higher quality and more valuable grades of commercial lumber.

To prove the value of the "mill run" of any mill, a witness could have been put on the stand, as contended for by appellants, and after showing knowledge of the lumber market, of the mill, and of the forest from which it was cutting, he could have been asked the direct question as to what was the market value as of a specified date of such "mill run" as such mill and such forest would have produced, and his answer would have been competent evidence. But that answer would have necessarily been based upon the quality of the "mill run" and the different amounts of the different commercial grades of lumber of which it was made up. On cross-examination, such a witness would have to develop this knowledge in great detail, or his testimony would be of no value. Respondent approached the matter from the other end. He sought to prove the different grades into which the "mill run" of this mill would sort, and the different percentages of each of these grades, and then to prove the market value of these grades in their several quantities. He contends that to prove the value of the different parts of the whole is, where the mere variety is not an element of value in itself, to prove the value of the whole. In this we think he is correct.

[2-5] Appellants insist that the evidence offered by respondent under this latter contention to show what the character of the "mill run" of the mill for the period it would have been cutting the lumber to supply the contract would have been, was insufficient. They contend that the defendant company had 1,600 acres of standing timber from which to cut; that, under the contract, it was not required to cut from any particular part of this timber, or, for that matter, that it was not even required to cut the lumber to fill the contract from their own holdings, and that no witness who did not know at least all parts of the company's 1,600 acres, and what the mill run from any part of it would have been, was qualified to testify as to the kind or quality of the lumber due to plaintiff under his contract. This contention cannot be followed; it leads too far. Sixteen hundred acres is a large tract. How much of it should a witness have known before being qualified to testify in this action? It can be readily seen that much of it might not have been available as a source from which to fill this contract. If it was all in one body, some of it might have been very distant and inaccessible. If it was not all in one body, some parcels of it might have been wholly beyond the bounds of practicable use. Some portions of the forest might have been of inferior timber which, in the exercise of good faith, the defendant could not have resorted to for the purposes of this contract. It must be recalled that defendant had but a limited time within which to cut the lumber due to plaintiff. The pressure of time might have confined defendant to the near and convenient "forties" which were examined by the witness White.

It may be contended that, if any of these conditions existed, the plaintiff should have shown them as part of his case. But this is not so, with reference to the other contention of appellants, that, under the contract, the defendant company was not even restricted in its freedom to select timber from which to supply the contract to that grown on its own land. If it was at liberty to go anywhere it saw fit for timber to saw while delivering its product to plaintiff, under its contract, then no witness would be qualified to tell what the "mill run" of that mill would have been during the time when it should have been filling plaintiff's contract. This would leave plaintiff in a condition where defendants would admit the breach of their contract and say that, because it was difficult for plaintiff to prove with exactness the amount of his admitted loss, he could recover nothing. This, of course, is not the law. In cases where substantial damage is shown, where the amount is entirely uncertain or extremely difficult of ascertainment, the sum to be awarded is a question for the jury, in the exercise of a sound discretion. The fact that the full extent of the damages must be a matter even of speculation is not ground for refusing all damages. 17 Corpus Juris, 756. "While the actual amount of damages from the breach of a contract may not be susceptible of exact proof, the law does not permit one whose act has resulted in loss to another to escape liability on this account. * * *" The law requires "only that the best evidence be adduced of which the nature of the case is capable." Kennett v. Katz Const. Co., 273 Mo. 279, 202 S. W. 558.

To the degree to which the damage in this case falls short of definiteness, it comes within the operation of this rule. It appears that the lumber which had been delivered, more than half of the amount contracted for, was of the grade claimed by the plaintiff to be due him in the undelivered portion. He contends that proof of what the "mill run" had been tended to prove what a later "mill run" would be. This claim seems reasonable. Clearly, what the "mill run" of a mill had been, while delivering over 1,500,000 feet of lumber, is some evidence of what it would be, while sawing the next 1,400,000 feet. In addition to this, the lumber piled in the yards, and which was seen by plaintiff and the witness White, was of the grade upon the basis of which plaintiff was given judgment. Logs were in the millyard which the testimony shows would give a "mill run" as high as plaintiff claimed he was entitled to. The witness White looked over "three or four forties," being from 120 to 160 acres of the defendant's standing timber. This was close to the mill, and immediately adjoining the land upon which the mill had operated while cutting the lumber already delivered. That the company had been cutting there, and that the timber seen by the witness White was adjoining it, and close to the mill, affords some evidence that that was the timber which would have been cut if the defendant had continued to cut and deliver the lumber contracted for. Particularly is this true where the company had but a limited time within which to deliver the lumber, with the probability that within that time it would not have been able, while continuing to cut and deliver the lumber, to have moved its logging operations, opened up roads, and done other things necessary to draw upon different or distant timber areas.

This same evidence disposes as well of the objection that the different grades of lumber within the "mill run" had not been shown. The evidence on this point was not strong; it fell far short of positive certainty and involved some element of presumption and estimate. But its weakness grew out of the nature of the breach in which defendants involved themselves. The thing to be determined was the quality of the "mill run" which a mill would have cut when it had, theoretically, 1,600 acres of timber to select from, or might have gone out and purchased stumpage over an indeterminate area. The manifest impossibility of doing this definitely necessitated resort to the less complete, but practically sufficient, evidence given in this case. That evidence was that the lumber already delivered had sorted into the grades and the percentages of these grades claimed by the plaintiff; that the cut lumber in the piles would run true to these percentages, and that fallen logs, ready for sawing, would do the same. This was followed by the testimony of the plaintiff that the standing timber near the mill, and adjoining the area already cut over, was of this standard. It would seem that such testimony should support the judgment.

[6] Some question arose in the case as to the market value of the lumber contracted to be delivered at the time of the breach, and as to what was the time of the breach. Upon these questions the evidence conflicts. Under such circumstances the findings of the trial court, finding support in the evidence, will not be disturbed.

[7] A further contention of appellants, urgently insisted upon, is that plaintiff had parted with all interest in the contract sued upon, in so far as it related to that portion of the "mill run" contracted for, which was of the grade of number 2 shop, or better. It is claimed that this was effected through the contract of December 2, 1919, made by plaintiff and Swayne & Hoyt. The matter has been argued upon the assumption that this contract amounted to a complete assignment of all of plaintiff's interest in the contract, with respect to all of the "upper" grades due under it. But the instrument is not of this character. While it purports to "sell and assign," to Swayne & Hoyt, all of plaintiff's rights, under the contract, in so far as the upper grades of lumber are concerned, it really amounts to no more than a resale of such lumber to these parties. The lumber, as shipped, is to be paid for by Swayne & Hoyt to plaintiff. The plaintiff is to keep the lumber covered by the contract insured. When Swayne & Hoyt wanted lumber shipped to them under this contract, they were to give shipping instructions to plaintiff, and not to defendants, and plaintiff was to forward such instructions to the defendant Eagle Lake Lumber Company. Notwithstanding defendants' knowledge of this contract, no privity was ever established between them and Swayne & Hoyt. Under these conditions, Swayne & Hoyt were not necessary parties to this action.

[8, 9] It would seem, further, that if this agreement between Swayne & Hoyt and plaintiff was an assignment, as claimed by defendants, and that thus they should have been made parties to the action, defendants waived their right to object on this ground by failing to plead this nonjoinder in their answer. Defendants insist that their general denial amounted to such a plea. But in Russ v. Tuttle, 158 Cal. 226, 110 Pac. 813, where the answer, among other defenses, contained a general denial, it was held that the issue of nonjoinder was not properly raised.

WHITE v. COVELL. (Civ. 2654; Sac. 3462.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 23, 1924.)

1. Negligence ⚷111(1)—Complaint for negligence as to infant leading horses held sufficient.

A complaint alleging negligence on the part of defendant in having plaintiff infant lead horses while sitting in automobile held to state cause of action.

2. Judgment ⚷18(2)—In testing sufficiency of complaint as basis for judgment, averments not supported by evidence should be eliminated.

In testing sufficiency of complaint as basis upon which to rest verdict and judgment, averments not supported by proof should be eliminated.

3. Negligence ⚷108(2) — Pleader need not use term "negligence."

In stating cause of action based upon negligence, general rule is that it is not necessary for pleader to use term "negligence," if conclusion of negligence can be drawn from facts stated.

4. Negligence ⚷108(2)—Complaint held to support verdict, though word "negligence" not used.

Complaint alleging that defendant had plaintiff twelve year old boy lead horses while sitting in automobile, when he knew it was dangerous for plaintiff to lead horses, and that they were likely to pull back, held sufficient to support verdict and judgment, though there was no averment that defendant was "negligent."

5. Negligence 🔑134(1) — Finding of negligence in causing boy to lead horses held not against evidence.

Finding of negligence in causing boy twelve years old to lead horses while sitting in automobile held not against the evidence.

6. Master and servant 🔑405(2)—Finding boy was not employé sustained.

In action for injuries to boy when leading horses while sitting in automobile, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that the boy was not an employé of defendant, and therefore that Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) did not apply, and court had jurisdiction of his action for personal injury.

7. Negligence 🔑138(1)—Instruction held not objectionable as not stating acts complained of were negligently done.

An instruction that, if jury believed that defendant did acts therein specified which resulted in injury to plaintiff, and if they further believed that in doing such acts he did not act with care and forethought, plaintiff was entitled to recover held not objectionable as not founded on hypothesis that acts were negligently done.

8. Master and servant 🔑332(4)—Instruction as to liability for acts of servant held proper under evidence.

In action for injuries to twelve year old boy, received when leading horses while sitting in automobile, instruction that defendant was liable for acts of his servant was proper, though plaintiff and his witnesses testified that defendant himself directed plaintiff to lead the horses from the automobile, where defendant and his witnesses testified that he did not instruct plaintiff with regard to leading horses, but that his servant did.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

9. Trial 🔑296(12)—Definition of negligence held not error or misleading in view of other instructions.

An instruction defining negligence as a failure "to act with care and forethought," held not incorrect or misleading, where other instructions were given in which negligence was accurately defined.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Henry Gordon White by his guardian ad litem, H. L. White, against George F. Covell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

Hawkins & Hawkins, and J. W. Hawkins, all of Modesto, for respondent.

YOUNG, Justice pro tem. [1] In this action instituted by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries a verdict was returned in his favor against defendant for $5,000. Judgment followed, and defendant appeals.

The first point urged by defendant for a reversal of the judgment is "that the complaint does not allege any negligence on the part of the defendant."

It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff—

"was, by reason of his tender years, susceptible to the influence of the said George F. Covell, and easily dominated by him, and was by reason of his tender years not able to comprehend the danger hereinafter specified and set out.

"That on the said 27th day of August, 1920, in the county of San Joaquin, state of California, the defendant directed said Henry Gordon White to get into an automobile and to lead six horses of defendant. That said horses of defendant had, up to that moment, been in pasture, and one of said horses was four years old and had been broken in the spring of 1920, and was wild; that another of said horses was a spirited horse, wild, and what is commonly known as a 'kicker.' That all of said horses by reason of having been out on pasture were frisky and full of spirits. That by reason of said horses being frisky and full of spirits they were likely to object to being led and were likely to pull back; and defendant knew that said horses were frisky and full of spirits, and that one of said horses was wild and commonly known to be a kicker, and that one of said horses was only four years old and had been broken in the spring of 1920, and knew that, by reason of these facts that said horses were likely to pull back and would pull back, and would object to being led, and knew it to be a fact that if said horses would pull back, if a person was leading them, the lead rope would be jerked in the hands of the person leading said horses, and would injure and harm the person leading said horses. That preparatory to leading the horses defendant caused one of said horses to be harnessed, and the other five horses to have halter chains placed in their halters, and had halter chains attached to the harness of the harnessed horse. That defendant caused a rope to be attached to the halter of the harnessed horse for the purpose of leading said harnessed horse, and on said date, defendant, well knowing said horses were likely to pull back upon being led, and well knowing that it was dangerous to lead said horses, and if they would pull back the leader of said horses would in all probability be injured, directed the said Henry Gordon White to get into said automobile and to lead said horses. That the servant of said defendant was in said automobile, and he was directed to run and operate said automobile, and said automobile was under the sole charge and control of defendant. That, when said defendant directed said Henry Gordon White to get into said automobile and lead said horses, said Henry Gordon White did get into said automobile and took hold of said lead rope attached to the halter of said harnessed horse and wrapped it around a projection of said automobile, but the defendant commanded and directed that said Henry Gordon White unwrap said rope from said projection and to lead said horses directly by said rope. That the said Henry Gordon White complied with said demand of defendant, and the servant of defendant, under the direction of defendant, started said automobile, and defendant caused said horses to follow behind said automobile. That while said horses were being so led by the said Henry Gordon White behind said automobile, and while he had the said rope in his hand as demanded and requested by the defendant aforesaid, said horses pulled back and jerked the rope by which the said Henry Gordon White was leading said harnessed horse and by reason of said jerk the rope was pulled in the hand of Henry Gordon White and his hand was pulled against the side of said automobile, and the fingers of plaintiff's left hand were cut off by said rope, and by reason thereof plaintiff's left hand has been permanently injured to his damage in the sum of $50,000.

"That at the time the said defendant directed the said Henry Gordon White to get into his said automobile the said Henry Gordon White was a minor, and was of the age of twelve years, and was by reason of his tender age unfamiliar with leading horses or the habits of said horses, and was ignorant of the fact that said horses might pull back and might jerk the rope in his hands and might injure him, and the said defendant well knew that the said Henry Gordon White was of the age of twelve years, and was inexperienced, and did not know that he was likely to be injured and hurt if said horses did pull back."

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled by the trial court. Defendant does not complain of this ruling, but his contention is that the only allegations in the complaint which state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are those in reference to the nature and character of the horses, and that those allegations are not supported by any evidence, and should therefore be eliminated from the complaint in considering its sufficiency to support the verdict and judgment, and that, if they are eliminated, the remaining allegations, if supported by the evidence, do not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that the acts of the defendant therein complained of are not charged to have been negligently done, and are not such facts as constitute negligence, unless negligently done, and therefore do not furnish sufficient complaint upon which to base the verdict and judgment.

[2] There is evidence which tends to establish the averments as to the nature and character of the horses, but there is no direct evidence showing that the plaintiff received his injuries as a result of anything that the horses did in consequence of their peculiar nature or character, and therefore, in testing the sufficiency of the complaint as a basis upon which to rest the verdict and judgment, it may be conceded that these averments should be eliminated.

[3] In stating a cause of action based upon negligence, the general rule is that it is not necessary for the pleader to use the term "negligence," if the conclusion of negligence can be drawn from the facts stated. Silveira v. Iverson, 125 Cal. 266, 57 Pac. 996; South v. County of San Benito, 40 Cal. App. 13, 180 Pac. 354.

In the case of Silveira v. Iverson it is held that—

> "In cases where the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action unless done negligently, it must be averred that they were so done, unless the facts themselves necessarily exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence."

To the same effect is the opinion of the court in South v. County of San Benito, supra.

Defendant cites these cases as authority to support his contention that the complaint here under consideration does not state a cause of action. He argues that the facts stated are not such facts as constitute a cause of action, unless done negligently, and, further, that the facts themselves, as stated, do not necessarily exclude every hypothesis other than that of negligence, and therefore the complaint is bad for the reason that the facts stated are not alleged to have been negligently done.

[4] From the facts stated in the complaint as to the age and want of experience of plaintiff in leading and handling horses, and defendant's knowledge thereof, together with the averments that plaintiff was susceptible to the influence of defendant and easily dominated by him, the law raises the duty on the part of defendant not to place plaintiff, while so under the influence and domination of defendant, in a position which he, defendant, knew to be dangerous, and which the plaintiff did not know to be dangerous. A violation of that duty is shown by the further averments in the complaint that defendant directed the plaintiff to get into the automobile and lead the horses, and that he knew that it was dangerous for plaintiff to lead the horses, and knew that the horses were likely to pull back and jerk the rope in plaintiff's hand, and knew that, if they did pull back and so jerk the rope, plaintiff was likely to be injured thereby. These averments, followed by the further allegations that plaintiff did get into the automobile to lead the horses, and that as a result thereof the plaintiff sustained injury, bring to the complaint all the elements essential to the statement of a cause of action. See 29 Cyc. 419, 569. And such facts themselves, as stated, necessarily exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence, and hence the complaint, independent of the averments as to the nature and character of the horses, states a cause of action.

[5] The second point raised by defendant is "that the verdict and judgment is against the evidence." Defendant testified that he did not direct the plaintiff to get into the automobile and lead the horses, but that it was Cowan, the brother-in-law of plaintiff, who directed him to do so. The plaintiff, Cowan, and Mrs. Cowan all testified that defendant directed the plaintiff to get into the automobile and lead the horses, six in number. They further testified that defendant placed the lead rope in plaintiff's hand and directed him to keep the coil of the rope on the running board of the car, and that he told plaintiff that he might get his feet tangled in the rope if the coil was kept in the car, and further that he remonstrated with plaintiff when plaintiff was endeavoring to fasten the rope on an iron projection on the side of the automobile, and told him that to do so might pull the top off. Indeed, the defendant himself testified that plaintiff started to tie the rope around the bow of the top, "and I told him if he done that he would pull the top off." The evidence shows that plaintiff received his injury August 27, 1920. Plaintiff's father testified that the plaintiff was born October 20, 1907, and that he had never harnessed or led any horses. Plaintiff also testified that he had never led or handled horses in any way. Defendant testified that he was 56 years old, and that he had been doing ranch work practically all of his life, and worked horses and led horses ever since he was a boy.

From the testimony of plaintiff, Cowan, and Mrs. Cowan the jury was justified in finding that defendant directed plaintiff to get into the automobile and lead the horses. From defendant's own testimony they were justified in drawing the inference that defendant knew that the horses were likely to pull back and jerk the rope in plaintiff's hand, and that, if they did so, plaintiff was likely to be injured. From the testimony of plaintiff's father as to plaintiff's age and want of experience in handling horses the jury were justified in drawing the inference that plaintiff did not know that it might be dangerous to lead the horses. They were also justified in drawing the inference from this testimony that defendant knew, or should have known, that plaintiff was young and inexperienced in handling horses. It is not disputed that plaintiff was injured in the manner alleged. It therefore appears that the evidence supports the verdict and judgment.

[6] The third point contended for by defendant is that the court had no jurisdiction of the case, for the reason that if there was any relationship between plaintiff and defendant it was that of employee and employer, and the defendant was insured with the State Compensation Insurance Fund for all damages to all employees, and that the Industrial Accident Commission of California had exclusive jurisdiction over the case, and that the superior court of the county of Stanislaus was without jurisdiction.

The evidence shows that defendant was insured as claimed by him, and that his insurance was in full force and effect at the time of plaintiff's injury. It appears from the evidence, without conflict, that Mark Cowan, plaintiff's brother-in-law, was defendant's foreman on his ranch, and that he had authority to hire laborers on the ranch, and to draw checks in payment for labor; that at the time plaintiff was injured he was visiting his sister on defendant's ranch, and had been there for a couple of days. Defendant, who resides in Modesto, came to the ranch in the afternoon of that day, and directed Cowan, his foreman, to go with him to a ranch known as the Swan Ranch, some six miles distant, to bring his ranch horses from pasture. Defendant testified that when he directed Cowan to make preparations to go for the horses that he heard Cowan call to plaintiff, but that he did not hear what was said between them. The testimony of plaintiff and Cowan was to the effect that, while preparations were being made to go for the horses, plaintiff said to Cowan when he saw a saddle brought out, "I can ride a horse better than you. I will go along and ride the horse." Cowan testified that he did not hire plaintiff to help with the horses, and did not ask him to go to help with the horses. Plaintiff testified that before going for the horses he asked his sister if she thought he would be paid for helping with the horses, and she told him he would not, and that he said he would go along anyway and ride the horse.

Plaintiff was asked by defendant's counsel if he had not told one W. J. O'Connor at defendant's house in a conversation about his injury, that before he went for the horses that he had asked his sister, Mrs. Cowan, if he would be paid for going, and that she had told him that he would be paid. Plaintiff denied that he had so stated. O'Connor was not produced to contradict him. The defendant, however, testified that he had heard the conversation, and that plaintiff had told O'Connor that he went into the house and asked his sister if he would get paid for going on this trip for the horses, and she said, "Sure."

It appears from the evidence that Mark Cowan, as defendant's foreman, prepared an application and sent it into the State Compensation Insurance Fund in an effort to recover compensation for plaintiff's injuries. Plaintiff, however, had no part in this. Cowan testified that he filled out the blank application in obedience to the order and instructions of defendant, and he further testified that defendant first made out a blank in pencil, and directed him to copy the same, which he did.

It also appears that on September 23, 1920, nearly a month after plaintiff was injured, that Mark Cowan, as defendant's foreman, drew a check in favor of plaintiff for $2, intended as payment to plaintiff for his services in helping with the horses on the afternoon that he received his injury. Cowan testified that he did this because defendant insisted on his doing so. In his own language he stated:

> "Mr. Covell kept after me until I finally made it out. I didn't want to do it at the time, but I didn't want to leave the ranch at the present time. He kept saying, 'I ought to pay the boy for the half day's work.'"

This check was mailed to plaintiff by defendant, but was not accepted by him. We think the jury was fully justified in concluding, as indicated by the verdict, that plaintiff was not in the employ of defendant at the time he was injured.

[7] In the court's instructions to the jury, instruction 4, given at the request of plaintiff, was as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant in substance told Henry Gordon White to get into the automobile in which Henry Gordon White was riding at the time of the accident, and told said Henry Gordon White to lead the horses, and that the said Henry Gordon White at the request of said defendant did get into the automobile and did lead said horses, that said Henry Gordon White at that time was twelve years old, that said defendant in telling said Henry Gordon White to get into said automobile and lead said horses did not act with care and forethought, and that the horses pulled back and resulted in injuring the left hand of Henry Gordon White, and defendant's instructions were the proximate cause of such injury, and Henry Gordon White was not at that time in the employ of defendant, and was not himself guilty of negligence directly contributing to his injuries as in these instructions more particularly explained to you, then I charge you your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff for such sum as from the evidence you find he is entitled, not to exceed the amount prayed for in the complaint for general damages, to wit, $50,000."

Defendant urges that this instruction leaves out the element of negligence, and that it was error to instruct the jury that the state of facts suggested therein entitled the plaintiff to damages for the reason that such facts and acts were not alleged to have been negligently done by defendant. We perceive this to be a proper instruction. The jury were thereby instructed that, if they believed defendant did the acts there specified which resulted in injury to plaintiff, and if they further believed that the defendant did not act with "care and forethought" in the doing of those acts, plaintiff should recover, this was tantamount to an instruction that if they believed that defendant negligently did the act specified, and that as a result the plaintiff suffered the injury complained of, that he was entitled to recover. Negligence had been defined to the jury as follows:

"Negligence, as the term is used in the law, is a recognized ground of legal liability. Every person in the conduct of his affairs is under a legal duty to act with care and forethought, and, if injury results to another from his failure so to do, he may be held accountable in an action at law."

The word "negligence," as used when stating a cause of action, is merely a term employed to express the elements of which it is composed, and, if the very elements themselves which compose negligence are employed by the pleader, instead of the term "negligence," the statement of the cause of action is not impaired thereby, for the reason that the elements themselves which furnish the very foundation of the action can have no less force and significance than the word "negligence," which is a term permissive under the law, to express the equivalent of those elements.

Defendant complains of the following instruction given at the request of plaintiff:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that Henry Gordon White was not in the employ of defendant and that defendant was negligent in the manner complained of in the complaint, and that plaintiff was injured, and the proximate cause of such injury was the negligence of the defendant specified in the complaint, and that plaintiff was not guilty of negligence directly contributing to his injuries as in these instructions more particularly explained to you, and there was paid in his behalf for which he is responsible $56.85 hospital charges, and he is indebted $50 for medical attention, then I charge you that you should find that plaintiff is entitled to recover from defendant said sums in addition to the general damages, if any, you find he is entitled to recover from defendant."

Defendant urges that this instruction was predicated upon negligence alleged in the complaint, and was misleading to the jury for the reason that there was no negligence alleged in the complaint. Since we have concluded that the facts as stated in the complaint are sufficient to charge the defendant with negligence, our observations with respect to the allegations of the complaint dispose of defendant's contention as to this instruction.

[8] Defendant also complains of the following instruction given at the request of plaintiff:

"An employer is liable for the results of the negligence of his employee, if the acts of negligence are committed by the employee while acting in the scope of his employment for his employer. And if you believe from the evidence that Henry Gordon White, at the time of the accident, was not an employee of defendant, and that he led the horses at the command and direction of Mark Cowan, and that Mark Cowan was the manager of the ranch of the defendant, and was acting at that time within the scope of his employment, and the said Henry Gordon White at that time was twelve years old, and that the said Mark Cowan, in commanding or directing the said Henry Gordon White to get into the automobile and lead said horses, did not act with care and forethought, that the horses pulled back and resulted in injuring the left hand of Henry Gordon White, and that said plaintiff was not guilty of negligence which directly contributed to his injuries as in these instructions more particularly explained to you, and Mark Cowan's instructions were the proximate cause of the injury, then I charge you that, if you find that Mark Cowan did so instruct Henry Gordon White to get into said automobile and lead said horses, and was thereby negligent, then the defendant is responsible, and the plaintiff is entitled to damages in such a sum as from the evidence you find he is entitled, not to exceed the amount prayed for in the complaint for general damages, to wit, $50,000."

Defendant does not question the correctness of this instruction in stating the law as to an employer's liability for the negligence committed by his employee in the course of his employment, but he urges that this instruction is contrary to the theory and testimony of plaintiff, inasmuch as plaintiff and his witnesses testified that it was not Cowan who directed plaintiff with respect to leading the horses. It is true that plaintiff and his witnesses did so testify, but it is also true that defendant alleged in his answer, and testified at the trial, that he did not instruct plaintiff with regard to leading the horses, but that it was Cowan who did so; therefore an issue was made by defendant's pleading and his testimony as to whether it was he or Cowan who directed the plaintiff to lead the horses. It was proper for the court to instruct the jury as to the law applicable to defendant's liability for the negligence of his employee, so that, if the jury believed the testimony of the defendant, they would be properly advised as to the law applicable to the facts, in the event that they also believed that Cowan, in giving such directions to plaintiff, was acting within the scope of his employment.

We are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [9] The application for transfer and hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. In addition to the instructions quoted in the opinion of that court, defining negligence as a failure "to act with care and forethought," other instructions were given in which negligence was accurately defined, and the degree and quantum of care required of the parties were fully and correctly described. Read in the light of these other instructions, the definition contained in the quoted instructions cannot be said to be either incorrect or misleading.

PEOPLE v. COSTA. (Cr. 1058.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1924.)

1. Homicide 🔑212—Defendant has right to show dying declarations of decedent.

Defendant has a right in a murder prosecution to show dying declarations of decedent.

2. Homicide 🔑216—Objection to question seeking to elicit an answer to serve as foundation for introduction of decedent's dying declarations held improperly sustained.

An objection to a question asked witness in a murder prosecution, seeking to elicit an answer which would serve as a foundation for introduction of decedent's dying declarations upon ground that no foundation was laid, was improperly sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Louis Costa was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

John Hyland and Byron M. Marble, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of murder. He was found guilty of manslaughter, and now appeals from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The grounds advanced for a reversal of the judgment are two: First, errors of the court in sustaining objections to questions asked on behalf of the defendant for the purpose of proving certain dying declarations of the deceased; second, errors of the court in refusing to give certain instructions offered on behalf of the defendant.

Defendant killed the deceased, Edward Farmer, on Monday evening, September 17, 1923, in the city of Los Angeles. On Saturday, immediately preceding this evening, there had been some controversy between the two, at which time the deceased said to the defendant, "I am going to get you, or you are going to get me." Whereupon, according to the testimony of the defendant, he walked away from the deceased to avoid trouble. Defendant and the deceased were both members of the order of Eagles, and it was in the Eagles' clubrooms in that city where the above-mentioned controversy took place. The defendant further testified that on the night of the homicide he attended a meeting at the clubrooms of the degree team of the order of which he was a member; that on this evening he took with him his pistol, a 25 automatic, fearing that he might have trouble with the deceased. He went to the clubrooms and remained there until a little after 10 o'clock, when he decided to go home. He walked out of the clubhouse onto Sixteenth street, being the street on which the clubhouse faced, and then went towards Georgia street, which is the next street west of the clubhouse, running at right angles with Sixteenth street. Defendant then walked west on Sixteenth street, and was attacked by deceased in the following manner:

"Well, the first thing I was startled with, why, was a blow on the back of the neck. So I turned around real quick and recognized that it was Farmer. Then I ran around an automobile that was parked on the curb, and I told him, I says, 'Now, leave me alone.' I says, 'I don't want to have any trouble with you.' I says, 'Let us settle this at the meeting next Thursday night.' And he says, 'No; you won't.' He says, 'I am going to settle it right now, you dirty bastard.' After he hit me my hat fell off. * * * I picked up my hat and he grabbed me. So I broke away from him, and just as I broke away from him he reached for his hip pocket with his right hand. As he done that I pulled my gun out of my pocket. I had it in my coat pocket. And he was on top of me, and he had his—put his right hand around my neck and with his left hand he grabbed my arm, and I kept it away, just like that, kept it away from him, between him and I. And he says to me, he says, 'Put that gun up, you son of a bitch;' and I says, 'I will, if you leave me alone.' And then I noticed his right hand shift again to his hip pocket and his left hand, he grabbed me by the throat and tried to choke me, and as he done that, why, I started to shoot. I was so excited I didn't remember how many shots I fired. After he dropped, he said, 'Well, Lou,' he said, 'you got me.' So I put my hat back on my head and walked down to the club, and I met Johnnie Bouett on the steps, and I handed him the gun and I told him to call the officers."

There was no direct contradiction of this story of the defendant. An eyewitness to the tragedy, Walter J. Higgins, on behalf of the prosecution, testified as follows:

"As I turned around I saw two men fighting in the middle of the block on the sidewalk.

"Q. On what side of the sidewalk? A. On the north side, the same side I was on.

"Q. Just a moment. Were they between you and Georgia street or between you and Figueroa? A. Between me and Georgia street, and I started up that way to catch my car at Georgia, and I seen one of these men—there was a few blows passed, and one of these men run out in the street and around a Ford coupé that was standing there and back on the sidewalk and run west on Sixteenth street towards Georgia, and this other man run after him and caught him right in front of a printing shop there, about 200 feet from the corner of Georgia, on the north side of Sixteenth street, and my car was just coming up towards Georgia then, and I went up to catch my car. I was just about a distance of 5 feet, standing there watching them fighting, and this one man had his arm around the other one's neck and they were fighting, and this other man had a gun in his right hand and he was holding it out away—holding it straight out, and so just about then the car was pretty close by there, and this man that got shot says, 'Put that gun away, you son of a bitch.' And this other fellow says, 'Turn me loose and I will.' Just about then he started shooting."

This witness further testified that after the shooting the defendant "picked up his hat, put it on his head, and put his gun in his pocket and started walking down the street"; that he, the witness, walked over to Farmer and the latter said to him:

"For Christ's sake help me out, I am bleeding to death. Christ, don't let me lay here this way."

On cross-examination, this witness testified that Farmer on this occasion said:

"For Christ's sake come over and help me out. I am shot; he got me that time. Get an ambulance; I am bleeding to death; he done a good job that time."

Another witness for the prosecution, T. L. Miller, stated that he went over to Farmer immediately after the shooting and asked him what was the trouble, and in reply Farmer said he wanted an ambulance and wanted help; that he was bleeding to death. Farmer was immediately taken to the receiving hospital, where he died about 10 o'clock the next morning.

Paul J. Braud, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified that he saw Farmer, the deceased, at the receiving hospital at the time he was shot, after which the following proceedings were had:

"Did you hear the deceased make any statement at that time there, to any one there, to show that the deceased knew he was dying?

"Mr. McCartney (deputy district attorney): Now, just a moment. I object to that as no proper foundation laid, and I know the testimony that this witness is called here to give, and I will show it to the court, and I submit that it is not material and it calls for a conclusion.

"The Court: All right, hand it up.

"Mr. McCartney: On page 21 (showing same to court)—on the ground that that statement, even if the proper foundation was laid, your honor, is an opinion and conclusion of the person giving it."

In the meantime counsel presented to the court what appears from the evidence to have been a transcript of the testimony of the witness Braud taken at the preliminary examination. The court examined this document and thereupon stated:

"Well, the testimony given here by this witness shows clearly that no sufficient foundation was laid for the testimony that was sought, and the testimony on pages 22 and 23 of a similar nature to that in line 16 on page 21 is incompetent. The objection will be sustained as far as that testimony is concerned."

Following this statement of the court a colloquy ensued between the court and counsel for the defendant, at the close of which the court made the following ruling:

"There is no proper foundation for the statement in the first instance, and in the second instance it is a mere conclusion."

No further effort was thereafter made by appellant to interrogate this witness.

Two other witnesses, nurses employed at the receiving hospital were thereafter sworn on behalf of defendant and interrogated for the purpose of showing that the deceased made a dying declaration. The proceedings of the court while these two witnesses were under examination were similar to those which we have just recited as taking place while the witness Braud was on the stand. One of these witnesses was asked by defendant's counsel whether, from the best of his recollection, the deceased made any statement. He replied to this question:

> "From the best of my recollection, I think he made a statement."

The examination then proceeded as follows:

> "Q. What was that statement?
> "Mr. McCartney: I object to that as no proper foundation laid. I'll show the court a statement here and I'll submit it as a conclusion which the witness couldn't come in and testify to it. (Showing transcript to court.)
> "The Court: Statements here made on page 31 of this transcript handed to the court, which purports to show the testimony of this witness, in which this witness purports to give a statement of what the deceased said, is clearly incompetent, and the objection to it being made here is sustained."

[1, 2] That the defendant had the right to show the dying declarations of the deceased, if any such were made by the deceased, we do not understand is questioned by the respondent; that such testimony is admissible on the part of the defendant is the established rule in this state. People v. Southern, 120 Cal. 645, 53 Pac. 214; People v. Lee, 13 Cal. App. 48, 108 Pac. 738. Wharton also lays down the rule as follows:

> "Dying declarations are admissible in favor of, as well as against, the accused, * * * and a declaration in favor of the accused must ever be taken to be more likely to be true, as it is not probable that a person should make a statement favorable to the person who has inflicted a mortal injury upon him, but rather the contrary." 1 Wharton on Criminal Evidence, p. 587.

On the same page of this volume we find the further statement that—

> "It is also said that the rules of evidence ought not to be so rigorously applied when the fact satisfactorily appears that they favor the accused as where they are urged against him."

The declarations of the deceased, if any were made by him, are not in the record, but the fact that the defendant was endeavoring to elicit this evidence would naturally lead to the inference that it was favorable to him. We are assuming therefore that, had the declarations been proven, they would have been in favor of the defendant.

Referring back to the proceedings at the trial while the witness Braud was on the stand, we think it sufficiently appears therefrom that the only objection interposed to the question asked this witness was that no foundation had been laid for the answer to such question. After the prosecuting officer had made this objection, and after he had shown to the court a document which we infer was a transcript of the testimony taken at the preliminary examination of the defendant, and which evidently contained some statement made by the witness at such examination, the prosecuting officer objected to the statement therein contained on the ground that it "is an opinion and conclusion of the person giving it." He did not, however, object on that ground to the question asked of the witness. Therefore the only objection interposed was that no proper foundation had been laid for the question. The question, as we have already seen, was.

> "Did you hear the witness make any statement at that time there, to any one there, to show that the deceased knew he was dying?"

It is clear that this was not such a question as would require the laying of any foundation before the witness could answer it. The evident purpose of asking this question was to elicit an answer which would serve as the foundation for the introduction of the dying declaration of the deceased. At this time there was before the court evidence of the statements made by Farmer, immediately after being shot, which tended to show that he realized that he was mortally wounded. A further statement from him indicating that he still held to that belief, coupled with the fact which was then in evidence that his wound was fatal and that he had died from the effects thereof a few hours thereafter, would in all probability have been a sufficient foundation upon which to base evidence of the dying declaration of the deceased. The defendant was denied the right to show this statement, if any was made, by the action of the court sustaining the objection, and in our opinion this ruling was not only erroneous, but was extremely prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

Appellant insists that it was error on the part of the court to examine the copy of the transcript of the testimony containing the testimony of the witnesses taken at the preliminary examination while it had under consideration objections to certain questions asked of these witnesses called on behalf of the appellant. What the witnesses may have testified to at the preliminary examination, or what they may have said elsewhere, prior to their taking the witness stand in the case then on trial, could have no bearing upon the merits of the objections the court was then considering. The ruling of the court upon these objections should be governed entirely by the nature of the questions asked, their relation to the facts in the case then on trial, and the form of the objection, and not upon what the witnesses may have testified to or stated on some previous occasion. Their previous testimony or statements could have no possible bearing upon the admissibility of their testimony in the case on trial, nor upon the court's ruling upon the objections before it. Such practice finds no authority in law or reason, and it is not to be commended.

We are not prepared, however, to hold that such action on the part of the trial court would in all cases amount to reversible error, or that it had such a result in the present action. As we have already stated, the legality of the ruling of the court upon an objection to a question does not depend upon the source from which the court obtains its information, but upon the nature of the question and its applicability to the facts in the case. If the ruling of the court is proper, taken in connection with these pertinent considerations, then the fact that it received information in an unauthorized manner, or even from illegal sources, would not affect the legality of its ruling. On the other hand, if the ruling of the court is contrary to law, it would be a matter of no consequence from whence the court derived its information upon which it based its ruling. We have already held that in our opinion the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant in sustaining the objection to the question propounded to the witness Braud, upon the ground that the only objection made to this question was that no foundation had been laid, when from the nature of the question it was not necessary to lay any foundation to entitle the witness to answer it. Therefore the action of the court in using the transcript of the testimony taken at the preliminary examination, whether authorized or not, becomes of no importance in so far as this appeal is concerned.

We have examined the proposed instructions on behalf of the defendant which were refused by the court, and we discover no error in the ruling of the court upon these instructions. The subjects thereof were adequately covered by other instructions given.

For the reason that, in our opinion, the court erred in sustaining the objection to the question propounded to the witness Braud, the judgment is reversed and the defendant is granted a new trial.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

JOSEPHIAN v. LION et al. (Civ. 2670.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 22, 1924.)

1. Principal and surety 🔑179—Surety may sue to compel principal to pay his obligation at maturity.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2846, surety may maintain suit in equity to compel principal to pay his obligation on its maturity.

2. Indemnity 🔑16—Exoneration doctrine applicable.

Doctrine of exoneration applies where a party, although he has not made himself liable to a creditor, has promised the debtor to pay the obligation and hold the debtor harmless.

3. Equity 🔑54—Indemnitee may by suit compel indemnitor to perform agreement.

Suit by indemnitee against indemnitor to compel latter to specifically perform his agreement is cognizable in equity, under maxim that party should be required to do that which he has promised.

4. Principal and agent 🔑23—Relation of principal and agent not changed by agent's hypothecation of her property to secure loan procured for principal.

Where defendant requested plaintiff to procure for him a loan, and plaintiff consented to do so, relation of principal and agent thereby created was not changed by fact that plaintiff became surety and, as such, hypothecated her property to secure repayment of loan.

5. Principal and surety 🔑9, 179—Plaintiff hypothecating her property to secure loan for another held surety for such other; surety entitled to exoneration.

Where plaintiff secured a loan for defendant, and executed note, and hypothecated her property as security for the repayment of the debt, plaintiff became, for defendant, a surety, as defined by Civ. Code, § 2831, and, as such, was entitled to exoneration.

6. Evidence 🔑423(8)—Apparent principal may be shown by parol to be surety.

Under Civ. Code, § 2832, except as against persons who have acted on faith of his apparent character of principal, one who appears to be principal may be shown by parol evidence to be surety.

7. Frauds, statute of 🔑44(1)—Verbal agreement of principal to repay surety not within statute.

Where defendant, at plaintiff's request, procured loan for him, and became surety for him on the obligation by executing her note and mortgage, agreement of defendant to pay the debt was not within Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1, requiring agreements not to be performed within one year to be in writing.

8. Limitation of actions 🔑56(3)—Surety's suit to compel principal to perform contract not barred.

Where plaintiff secured a loan for defendant, and executed note, and hypothecated her property as security for the repayment of the debt, neither Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, nor section 337, nor section 726 applied to bar plaintiff's right to exoneration by defendant, but such right existed as long as the mortgagee's right to sue on the note was not barred.

9. Principal and surety 🔑190(7)—Proposed written contract held admissible to show oral agreement, where defendant admitted that it correctly stated oral agreement.

In surety's suit to compel principal to perform his obligation to repay money she borrowed for him, by mortgaging her own property, evidence of proposed written agreement, setting forth that money borrowed was for principal for his use, and that he did use it and agreed to repay it, was admissible, although principal refused to sign it, as showing what oral agreement was, where principal, after reading the writing, admitted that it contained correct statement of the oral agreement.

10. Evidence ⚷423(8) — Oral testimony admissible to show real relation.

In suit by surety, under Civ. Code, § 2846, to compel principal to repay note for money borrowed by plaintiff for him, oral testimony is admissible under Civ. Code, § 2832, to show their relation in the transaction.

11. Principal and surety ⚷190(10)—Decree protecting rights of holder of debt, as to which exoneration was sought, held proper.

In surety's suit to compel principal to pay the debt, to secure which the surety had mortgaged her property, decree taking care of and safeguarding the rights of the owner and holder of the note and mortgage held proper; for the court, having all parties before it, was under the duty to protect, by its decree, all the equities of the respective parties as they were exposed by the evidence.

12. Constitutional law ⚷83(3)—Principal and surety ⚷3—Exoneration statute not unconstitutional as imprisoning for debt.

Civ. Code, § 2846, providing that a surety may compel his principal to perform the obligation, is not unconstitutional, as subjecting the principal to imprisonment for debt, in case he disobeys mandates of the decree and is cited for contempt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Rosa K. Josephian against Alex Lion and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke and M. F. McCormick, both of Fresno, for appellant.

C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff, claiming to be a surety upon a certain obligation upon which it is alleged the defendant Alex Lion is the principal, brought this suit to compel the latter to perform said obligation, the same being due. The action was brought upon the authority of section 2846 of the Civil Code, which provides: "A surety may compel his principal to perform the obligation, when due."

The obligation, to enforce the performance of which is the object of this action, arose out of a transaction culminating in the execution by the plaintiff of a certain promissory note, and, as security therefor, a mortgage on certain of her real property, situated in the city of Fresno, in favor of one Lelia A. Yocum. The latter, after the obligation had run for some time, sold and transferred the same to the defendant W. A. Conn, who as such creditor of defendant Lion, was made a party defendant.

The cause was tried by the court, without the aid of a jury, and judgment passed for the plaintiff. Thereby it was adjudged that the defendant Lion pay said note, together with accrued interest, to the defendant Conn, and that the latter "do accept such payment, and thereupon cancel said note or deliver the same up to be canceled, and release the property * * * from the lien of said mortgage in the manner required by law."

The judgment proceeds:

> "It is further adjudged that, in the event of a renewal of said note and mortgage, to prevent the collection of the indebtedness evidenced thereby from becoming barred by the statute of limitations, before its payment by the defendant Lion, or in the event of the commencement of an action to foreclose said mortgage for the same purpose, such renewal or such action shall in no way affect this judgment or its enforcement, or the right to compel the payment of the indebtedness by the defendant Lion; nor shall the right, of defendant Conn, to demand and receive such renewal or bring such action be affected hereby."

The defendant Lion appeals from said judgment.

Lion, the appellant, is the son-in-law of the plaintiff. In the month of June, 1913, being in need of the use of the sum of $2,000, and being required to borrow said sum, he asked the plaintiff for a loan of said sum. The plaintiff told appellant that she was without sufficient means with which to comply with his request, and he thereupon proposed to her that, if she would herself borrow the money, execute a note therefor, and a mortgage on several lots she owned in the city of Fresno to secure the same, he would pay the debt and "hold her harmless." The defendant Conn, an attorney at law, was then called upon by appellant and asked by the latter if he (Conn) could secure him a loan of $2,000 on lots 31 and 32, block 120, city of Fresno, belonging to the plaintiff. Conn replied that he had a client (Mrs. Yocum) who had money to loan, and, after visiting and inspecting the property, called upon Mrs. Yocum and told her that it was safe security for the sum mentioned. The loan was finally made, the plaintiff executing and delivering to Mrs. Yocum, through Conn, her promissory note for $2,000, and a mortgage on the property referred to as security for said note. The note was dated June 13, 1913, and was payable two years after date. It provided for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually.

In the month of May, 1914, appellant made application to Conn for an additional loan of $500, to be secured by a mortgage on the same property. Conn presented the matter to Mrs. Yocum, and she was agreeable to the proposition. A promissory note for said sum and a mortgage on the plaintiff's property, upon which the mortgage lien for $2,000 still subsisted, were prepared by Conn and taken to the plaintiff, who thereupon signed the note and signed and acknowledged the mortgage. This note was dated May 9, 1914, was made payable two years from date, and called for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually.

In or about the month of November, 1918, Conn called either for the payment of the notes or a renewal thereof. The appellant, on being asked by Conn to take up the notes, stated that "they" were unable then to satisfy them. Thereupon Conn asked that a new note, embracing the total indebtedness on the two notes already held by Mrs. Yocum, be executed and delivered to him for his client, together with a mortgage on the same property to secure the same. This was satisfactory to appellant, and, accordingly, a note for the sum of $3,366.65, the aggregate amount of the two notes then held by Mrs. Yocum, and as security for the payment thereof, a mortgage on the property referred to, were prepared and presented to the plaintiff, and she executed the instruments, the same being delivered to Conn for his client. This note was dated November 19, 1918, payable one year after date, and provided for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. This is the note involved in this action.

At a date subsequent to the execution of the note and the mortgage last referred to, Mrs. Yocum (who, after the above transactions, intermarried with a Mr. Willis) became insistent on the payment of the note, so Conn testified, and he (Conn) thereupon concluded to purchase the note and the security, and did so. Conn testified that the appellant told him that he (appellant) received the money obtained on the note and the mortgage; that:

> "It was borrowed for his benefit, and that he got it all and was going to pay it; that he paid the interest (any interest that had been paid was paid by him) which was a fact; * * * that Mrs. Josephian would not have to pay a cent of it; and I asked him to put that in writing, asked him if he would sign an agreement to that effect, and he expressed his willingness to do so."

This conversation occurred a few days only before the 16th day of February, 1921. On the last-mentioned day, Conn, after talking with plaintiff relative to the proposed written agreement, and presumably acting for her, prepared a writing, dated that day, to be signed by the appellant and the plaintiff, in accordance with the agreement with respect to the loan between them, as explained by the appellant to Conn. Said agreement, after reciting the fact of the execution of the note and the mortgage by the plaintiff, and that the same were so executed at the request of and for the accommodation of the appellant, and that the latter received for his own use the whole of the consideration for the said promissory note, to wit, the sum of $3,366.65. and that no part thereof was received by the plaintiff or for her account, reads:

> "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, the parties of the first part do hereby acknowledge to have received for their own use and benefit the entire proceeds of said promissory note, to wit, the sum of $3,366.65, and the parties of the first part do hereby jointly and severally agree to pay in full, upon demand of said second party or the holder of said promissory note, said promissory note, and to hold second party, her heirs, and assigns harmless therefrom."

Said writing, either on the day that it was dated or within a very few days thereafter, was submitted to the appellant. After reading the same, he objected to certain words it contained, and Conn said to him that the words referred to could be stricken from the writing without changing its legal effect, and they were, accordingly, eliminated. What particular words were expunged from the writing, the witness (Conn) did not point out. However, after the appellant had taken further time to determine whether he would sign the agreement, he refused to sign it for the reason, as given by him, that other members of the Josephian family were trying to "get the best of him," and that "he was afraid to sign anything" for fear that they would succeed. Conn stated, though, that the appellant, upon reading the proposed agreement, declared that it set forth correctly the agreement between him and the plaintiff. He further testified that the appellant paid $366.65 of the principal in February, 1922, and, as above stated, that he paid all interest which was paid on the note, with the exception of two items, to wit, the first on January 12, 1922, in the sum of $96.85, which paid the interest to November 19, 1921; the second on February 20, 1922, in the sum of $123.20, which paid the interest to May 19, 1922, said items having been paid by the plaintiff.

The fact that the money obtained on the note and the mortgage was so obtained for appellant, and at his request, and the fact that he received the money and used it for his sole purposes and benefit, were corroborated by several members of the Josephian family, including the plaintiff. The appellant offered no proof, and did not himself testify in the case.

The facts embraced in the above statement, with the exception of certain probative facts embodied therein, which are gleaned from the testimony of Conn, are set out in the second amended complaint. The appellant demurred to the complaint on the general, and on numerous special, grounds and, the demurrer having been overruled, he filed an answer denying all the allegations of said complaint. He further pleaded the statute of limitations (sec. 337, subds. 1 and

2; sec. 339, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.), and also section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides, among other things, that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter."

Conn demurred to the complaint on the general ground, the same being overruled. He thereupon filed an unverified answer, denying the averments of the complaint. As to this answer, however, the verification thereof was waived, and it was stipulated by counsel that all general denials therein "shall be considered as a specific denial of all allegations controverted."

The findings of the court follow substantially the averments of the complaint.

[1] That a surety may maintain a suit in equity to compel the principal to pay the obligation upon its maturity is not questioned by appellant, but is conceded by him, as in view of section 2846 of the Civil Code, no other position could be taken. The principle underlying said section is of equitable origin and cognizance, and proceeds upon that consideration of natural justice that a person shall perform his agreement, acting upon which "a court of equity, in the exercise of well-regulated and judicial discretion, enforces the actual accomplishment of a thing stipulated for, on the ground of what is lawfully agreed to be done ought to be done." Magee v. McManus, 70 Cal. 553, 556, 12 Pac. 451, 452.

The doctrine is stated in 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 1417 (footnote, citing California Civil Code, § 2846, and Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Cox, 318), as follows:

> "After an obligation becomes payable, the surety, before he has paid it, and whether he has been sued by the creditor or not, may maintain a suit in equity against the debtor—in the nature of a bill quia timet—to compel him to pay the debt or perform the obligation, provided the creditor can himself enforce the payment or performance, and neglects or refuses to do so. The creditor is, of course, made a codefendant."

See, also, same author, vol. 5, § 2342; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 1011.

While, as stated, the appellant in his briefs expressly concedes that the right to resort to the equitable remedy above spoken of resides in a surety, and may be exercised or invoked after the principal obligation has matured, or the debt has become due and it has not been performed or paid, it is nevertheless, contended by him that such remedy is not available to plaintiff for the reason that he did not at any time execute a note or mortgage, or other writing, or ever promise to pay the mortgagee the money obtained on the note and the mortgage, or at any time ever became "a debtor, principal or otherwise, to the mortgagee." It follows from said premise, so the appellant declares, that the plaintiff could not be a "surety for him," as alleged in the complaint.

It is further contended by the appellant that, even if the transaction is such as the complaint describes it, and that the relation of principal and surety between the appellant and the plaintiff was thereby established, still the obligation is within the statute of frauds and not enforceable, because it involved an agreement not in writing which, by its terms, was not to be performed within a year from the making thereof. It is also claimed, as the answer alleges, that any right of action which the plaintiff might have had to enforce performance of the obligation against the appellant is barred by the above indicated provisions of the statute of limitations, and also by section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The foregoing points are involved in the general contention that there is no evidence in the record which supports the findings. They were raised below by the demurrer to the complaint, and later by objections to the evidence, offered and received in support of the allegations of said pleading.

[2] This leads us to observe that, since the objections raised by the demurrer to the complaint were not waived at the trial by failure to object to the evidence offered, it is not only proper, but not out of place to notice, at this juncture, one of two alternative points made as against the plaintiff's second amended pleading. Counsel contends that the demurrer should have been sustained for either one or the other of two reasons, to wit: (1) That as to whether the note was or was not executed by the appellant, the complaint is uncertain and ambiguous; (2) that, if the allegations of the complaint are reasonably subject to the construction that the note was executed by the plaintiff, "then the complaint shows on its face that the money obtained from Mr. Yocum was applied to the use of defendant Lion," and the transaction, therefore, merely amounted to a loan made to him by the plaintiff, "and any cause of action that might have been maintained thereon has long since been barred by the statute of limitations." The proposition last suggested goes to the gist of this controversy, and is practically involved in the points first above stated, and will later be considered. The first proposition is clearly without merit. The complaint, after reciting the circumstances leading to the application to the plaintiff by the appellant for the loan of the money for which the note was given, alleges that the plaintiff, being herself without means to accommodate the appellant, at the latter's request, borrowed the money from Mrs. Yocum, executing and delivering to the latter a promissory note for the amount, and, as security for its repayment, executing and delivering to Mrs. Yocum a mortgage upon certain of her property. These facts are set out in detail and with clearness. Nowhere does the complaint allege, nor do its allegations in any wise or in any degree so imply, that the appellant signed or actually joined in the execution of any of the notes which had been executed during the pendency of the transaction. As to the mortgage, of course, the signature of the appellant thereto as one of the mortgagors would have added no legal force to the instrument—indeed, it would have been wholly without any effect, since he owned no interest of any kind or nature in the mortgaged premises, and the complaint, with equal clearness, states that the note was executed solely and alone by the plaintiff, as it does that the mortgage was so executed.

As to the transaction involved herein, the contention of the appellant may be stated in condensed form, as follows: That the doctrine of exoneration does not apply where, as here, a party, although he has not made himself liable to the creditor, has promised the debtor to pay the obligation and hold the latter harmless.

The plaintiff contends that her position in the transaction comes within the description of a contract of indemnity, as given by section 2772 of the Civil Code, as follows: "Indemnity is a contract by which one engages to save another from a legal consequence of the conduct of one of the parties, or of some other person."

[3] The authorities are to the effect that the doctrine of exoneration, in equity, applies as well to contracts of indemnity as to those of suretyship. 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) § 1417; Story's Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 1169. See, also, Reybold v. Herdman, 2 Del. Ch. 34, 41; Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 398, 10 Am. Dec. 343; West v. Chasten, 12 Fla. 315; Bishop v. Day, 13 Vt. 81, 37 Am. Dec. 582; Ardesco Oil Co. v. N. A. Mining Co., 66 Pa. 375; Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 86 Or. 474. 161 Pac. 93, 168 Pac. 929. In the cases just named there was no promise made by the indemnitor or surety directly to the creditor. Thus it would seem that whether the appellant here is technically an indemnitor or a surety is a matter of no particular consequence in the decision of this case; for, if upon other grounds the judgment is not subject to reversal, the same may be affirmed upon either theory—that is, either upon the theory that he is an indemnitor or a surety. If the former, there being no express statute law authorizing a suit by an indemnitee against an indemnitor for a decree requiring the latter to specifically perform his agreement, the suit is, nevertheless, cognizable in equity upon the general maxim practiced in equity courts that a party should be required specifically to do that which he has promised or agreed to do, if the promise or agreement in no way contravenes public policy, or is not contra bonos mores.

[4] We are of the opinion, however, that the plaintiff, in the transaction, acted in two different and distinct legal roles, to wit: (1) As the agent of the appellant in procuring the loan for him, and (2) as surety. There can be no doubt that when the appellant requested the plaintiff to procure for him a loan, and she consented to do so, the relation of principal and agent was thereby created, and existed. The fact that she became surety and, as such, hypothecated her property to secure the repayment of the loan could not have the effect of changing the character of their legal relations, in the first instance.

[5] Upon the consummation of the loan, and the agreement of the plaintiff to secure or assure the repayment thereof, then the relation between them became that of principal and surety—the appellant principal, because it was his debt and he promised to repay the same; the plaintiff surety, because she executed the note and hypothecated her property as security for the repayment of the debt, thus becoming a surety in a double sense. The relationship of the plaintiff to the appellant in the transaction comes within the description of a surety as given by section 2831 of the Civil Code, as follows:

> "A surety is one who, at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor."

[6] And here it may be suggested that, except as against persons who have acted on the faith of his apparent character of principal, one who appears to be a principal, whether by the terms of a written instrument or otherwise, may show that he is, in fact, a surety (section 2832, Civ. Code), which, of course, means that such a showing may be made by parol evidence.

The case of Kellogg v. Lopez, 145 Cal. 497, 78 Pac. 1056, is, in its facts, strikingly similar to the case at bar. There, it appears, one Lopez executed and delivered to one Anderson, as payee, his promissory note. The evidence disclosed that Anderson and Lopez and one Stackpole were stockholders of the San Mateo Coursing Association, a corporation, and made and indorsed the note for the accommodation of the association; "that this was done, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, made at one time, and as part of one transaction; that the note was then delivered to an agent of the association to be discounted for its use, and that the money was received and used by the association. Upon this state of facts," said the court, "it is clear, at least in this state, that in equity—where 'the form of the instrument may be * * * disregarded'—the parties to the note are to be regarded as mere sureties of the association, and, as such, entitled to contribution from each other." See, also, White v. Fratt, 13 Cal. 521; Magee v. McManus, supra.

In White v. Fratt the agreement was similar to the one here, and the equitable rule that a surety may seek and be granted relief through the doctrine of exoneration in cases where the circumstances reveal peculiar equitable considerations, was considered and approved, but the court declined to apply that doctrine on the ground that the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law. The agreement involved was an indemnity bond to the plaintiff, as sheriff, to hold him harmless on the sale of certain property seized under a writ of attachment. The court said that the measure of the liability of the defendants was the amount of the judgment, and that, therefore, the damages resulting to the plaintiff, by reason of the breach of the agreement, were susceptible to precise admeasurement, for which reason equity will refuse to interfere.

In the case of Magee v. McManus the agreement was much of the same nature as the one here. The relief sought was refused solely on the ground that the agreement found was not the agreement pleaded.

A distinction between the case of White v. Fratt and the present case will, upon comparison of the circumstances of the one with those of the other, be readily noted. It is manifest that in this case there are equitable features which are entirely absent from the case above named. Here the plaintiff is a mere accommodation surety. Her property is burdened with a mortgage lien to secure the repayment to the mortgagee of money borrowed for, and received by, the appellant for his sole use and benefit, and which he did so use. If she were required to rely upon her remedy at law to recover the debt from the appellant, the result to her would be the expense, inconvenience, and annoyance of a foreclosure suit, and she would, moreover, be compelled to postpone proceeding against him until a decree foreclosing the mortgage was rendered and entered. The appellant, as seen, was, by virtue of the terms of his agreement, the principal, and his promise was, not to pay the judgment, but to pay the note as being his own debt. There could hardly be conceived a case where the circumstances could the more appropriately or more strongly call for the interposition of equity than the case at bar.

There is, in this case, no such ground for the objection that was urged and sustained in the case of Magee v. McManus, there being no claim that there is a variance between the agreement found by the court and the one pleaded in the complaint.

[7] The agreement of appellant to pay the debt was not subject to the objection that it is void for the reason that it fails to measure up to the demands of section 1624 of the Civil Code. We assume that appellant's specific contention as to this point is that his agreement falls within the provisions of said section contained in subdivision 1 thereof, which provides that "an agreement that, by its terms, is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof," if not in writing, or there is no memorandum thereof signed by the party to be charged, is invalid. As seen, the evidence shows that, upon the obligation evidenced by the note, the appellant became the principal, and the plaintiff the surety. The facts, as found, correspond with the evidence, and show that the legal relation between the appellant and the plaintiff in the transaction is as just stated. The obligation, as before stated, was created by the plaintiff as the agent of and for the appellant. In other words, he authorized her to secure the money covered by the note for him and his sole use, and, acting upon that authority, she procured the money, and became the surety for him on the obligation by executing the note and hypothecating her own property to secure its payment. In equity the transaction is precisely the same as if the appellant himself had actually signed the note, and this, as before suggested, upon the principle that "what ought to be done is to be considered as done" (2d Spence's Eq. Jur. 253), or, as Story puts it, "equity looks upon that as done which ought to have been done." Therefore the plaintiff's right to compel the appellant's performance of his obligation accrued to her immediately after it became due, and was available to her so long as the note remained unpaid and subject to enforced payment by the payee in a foreclosure suit.

[8] The defense based upon the statute of limitations cannot be supported. The note executed on November 19, 1918, embracing the amounts represented by the two notes previously executed, involved a new agreement between the parties, the transaction resulting in the execution of said note and the mortgage to secure it having been carried on by and between Conn, assignee of the note, the appellant and the plaintiff. Said note, according to its terms, matured on the 18th day of November, 1919, and was subject to enforcement by the foreclosure of the mortgage at any time within four years after the date of its maturity. Neither the original nor the first amended complaint is in the record, and, therefore, it is not thus made to appear when the action was commenced. The second amended complaint upon which, with the answer, the cause was tried, was filed March 8, 1922. It does not appear, nor is it pretended, that the cause of action stated in the second amended complaint is different from that stated in the original complaint. We must, therefore, presume, in support of the judgment, that, whether the plaintiff's action comes within subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or within section 337 of said Code, it was in either case brought within the statutory time. But, upon the theory we have of this case, as it is revealed by the issues, the evidence and the findings, and as explained above, the appellant being the principal obligor on the note, and the plaintiff the surety, the latter's right to enforce performance of the obligation by the appellant will exist so long as the right to sue upon the note is not barred.

The plea that the plaintiff's action is barred by section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that she is, by this action, in effect, seeking to foreclose the mortgage. The action here is, in part, to prevent (if thus it may be done) the foreclosure of the mortgage upon her own property.

[9] The ruling, admitting in evidence the proposed written agreement between appellant and plaintiff, setting forth that the money borrowed on the note was for the appellant, for his own use and benefit, and that he did so use it and that he agreed with plaintiff to repay said money to the payee of said note, was admissible as showing what the oral argeement between appellant and plaintiff as to the transaction was, the former having admitted, after reading the writing, that it contained a correct statement of said agreement.

[10] All the oral testimony admitted at the trial, and bearing upon and explaining the agreement between appellant and plaintiff, was properly allowed under the theory of the case as made by the complaint. Section 2832, Civ. Code.

Counsel has not pointed out wherein there is a basis for his contention that the decree goes beyond the issues, the findings, and the conclusions of law. But we can see no ground for the contention. The complaint undoubtedly states a case under section 2846 of the Civil Code. As stated, the findings follow the averments of the complaint, and as between the findings and conclusions of law there is no inconsistency.

[11] The decree, it is true, does take care of and safeguard the rights of Conn, owner and holder of the note and the mortgage, and this was proper. The court had all the parties before it, including Conn, and it was its duty, sitting in chancery, to adjudicate, adjust, and protect, by its decree, all the equities of the respective parties as the same were exposed by the evidence.

[12] The claim that the appellant is, under the decree, subject to imprisonment for debt, in case he disobeys the mandates thereof, and is haled before the court on a citation for contempt, involves an argument which may or could be made in any case founded on section 2846 of the Civil Code, and it could be sustained only upon the theory that said section does not represent a valid enactment. The section, though, is perfectly valid, for it involves only a statutory recognition of one of the well-established doctrines of equity jurisprudence. The decree, by its own terms, becomes a lien on any property of appellant not exempt from execution. If he has no property to which the lien may lawfully attach, the liability fixed against him by the decree must stand undischarged until it can be legally satisfied, if at all. If he has no means with which to discharge his debt, upon a showing to that effect upon a citation for contempt, if any such proceeding were instituted against him, the court could not impose a condition by way of a penalty upon him until he satisfied the debt.

There are no other points requiring consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FARRELL et al. (Cr. 1052.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1144(13)—Duty of appellate court in passing upon sufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction stated.

In passing upon sufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction, appellate court must consider in strongest light, testimony introduced by prosecution, and disregard all evidence conflicting therewith which was offered by defendants, and affirm judgment if there is any substantial showing tending to connect accused with commission of alleged crime.

2. Larceny ⚷64(7) — Possession of stolen property with slight corroboration of other inculpatory circumstances will support conviction.

While recent unexplained possession of stolen property standing alone does not justify conviction of larceny, such possession, with slight corroboration of other inculpatory circumstances tending to show his guilt is sufficient.

3. Larceny ⚷64(1)—Considerations in determining weight to be given to recent possession of stolen property stated.

In determining weight to be given to recent possession of stolen property, jury may consider proximity of place where found to the place of the alleged grand larceny; lapse of time since property was taken; its character and nature; concealment; whether party denied or admitted possession; and demeanor and character of accused.

4. Larceny 🔑64(6)—Falsity of accused's explanation of possession of stolen property may be considered.

Falsity of explanation given by accused to account for his possession of stolen property is an incriminatory circumstance to be considered by jury in determining whether his possession justifies inference of guilt.

5. Larceny 🔑64(6)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction.

Evidence that within two and one-half hours from time of theft defendants were in possession of stolen property which they left in a garage without any explanation, and their fabrication of a story to account for their possession, while not conclusive, held legally sufficient to support conviction for larceny.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Dan Farrell and Paul Farrell were convicted of grand larceny, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Webb, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendants were convicted of the crime of grand larceny, the charge being that they feloniously took and carried away automobile tires of the aggregate value of $1,100, the property of a firm doing business in the city of Los Angeles under the name of Martin & Green. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendants a new trial.

[1] It is contended that the only evidence of guilt is the circumstance that defendants were in possession of the stolen property shortly after the theft; and since evidence of recent unexplained possession of stolen property, standing alone, is not sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty of larceny, it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. In passing upon this claim it is, of course, our duty to consider in the strongest light the testimony introduced by the prosecution, to disregard all evidence conflicting therewith which was offered by the defendants, and to affirm the judgment if there be any substantial showing which tends to connect the accused with the commission of the alleged larceny. The facts, in substance, as illustrated by such testimony, are these: Defendants are brothers. They previously had been convicted of a felony and at the time of the theft were but recently out of the state penitentiary on parol. On July 7, 1923, the tires in question, as well as certain tubes—new tires and tubes which were a part of the stock owned by Martin & Green—were stored in that firm's place of business in the city of Los Angeles. They were there as late as 9:30 o'clock of the evening of that day, at which hour Sam Green, one of the members of the copartnership, closed his firm's place of business by locking the doors and windows, and then left the premises. The articles were stolen some time during the night. At about midnight, or within two and a half hours after Sam Green had closed the store, the two defendants, in an automobile which one of them was driving and which was laden with 33 of the stolen tires and about 50 of the stolen tubes, drove into the Hill View Garage in the city of Los Angeles. It is claimed by appellants, though the point does not seem to be urged with any great degree of confidence, that the evidence is insufficient to establish the identity of the tires and tubes which defendants brought to the Hill View Garage with those which admittedly were stolen from Martin & Green's place of business during the night in question. Without specifically reciting the evidence which bears upon this phase of the case, let it suffice to say that we are satisfied from a reading of the record that the jury was warranted in its conclusion that the tires and tubes which defendants brought to the Hill View Garage were a part of those which had been stolen from Martin & Green.

When defendants drove into the Hill View Garage the only person whom they found there was a night watchman. Defendants unloaded the tires and tubes on the floor of the garage and with the aid of the watchman put them away in a closet where such merchandise was customarily stored by the proprietors of that establishment. At the same time defendants made out a list of the tires and tubes, and thereupon took their departure. Neither defendant had any interest in the Hill View Garage. Nor did either of them vouchsafe any information to the night watchman as to why they had brought a load of new tires and tubes to that particular place at that hour of the night. Indeed, the night watchman testified that defendants had no conversation with him whatever. About noon of July 9th defendants returned to the Hill View Garage and made an offer to sell the tires and tubes to one of the proprietors. The latter replied that he did not want to buy the articles and ordered their immediate removal. In compliance with this demand defendants loaded the tires and tubes into their automobile and carried them to a gasoline station in the city of Los Angeles conducted by a man of the name of Damerel. The articles were taken by defendants from the Hill View Garage in three separate loads. Upon arriving at Damerel's gasoline station with the first load one of the accused, in the presence of his brother, asked Damerel, who previously had bought tires of defendants, if he wanted to purchase some more tires, telling him that the tires which he could buy were in a garage. Upon being told by Damerel that he did not wish to buy any more tires, the defendant who was carrying on the conversation with Damerel asked the latter if the tires could be left at his gasoline station until defendants could deliver two of them to their mother, when they would call again and take away the remaining tires and tubes. On the evening of July 12th, at about 9:30 o'clock, the defendant Paul Farrell drove to Damerel's gasoline station in an automobile and was then taken into custody by the officers who were waiting to make the arrest. Part of the tires were found by the officers at the gasoline station, part in Damerel's home, and two of them were found later on the wheels of an automobile standing on the premises occupied by defendants' mother. The defendant Dan Farrell was arrested between 2 and 3 o'clock on the morning of July 13th, as he was unlocking the door to his room. Neither defendant offered any explanation prior to the trial to account for his possession of the stolen property. Dan Farrell, upon being asked by the arresting officers if he wished to tell them his story of the tires, hung his head for a long time and then said: "Well, I can't say anything that would do me any good, and anything that I would say would be used against me."

Both defendants testified at the trial as witnesses in their own behalf. They disclaimed all knowledge that the property had been stolen, stoutly maintaining that they had received it innocently from Damerel. They testified, in substance, that at about 8 o'clock on July 7th or 8th they drove to Damerel's gasoline station; that the latter asked them to carry some tires to the Hill View Garage; that in compliance with this request they loaded the tires and tubes into their automobile, drove to the Hill View Garage and left them there with the night watchman, after making a list of the articles; that two or three days later, at Damerel's request, they brought the tires and tubes back to the latter's gasoline station; and that the defendant Dan Farrell purchased from Damerel, for $50, the two tires which later were found at the home of defendants' mother. Defendants who, as we have stated, made an offer to one of the proprietors of the Hill View Garage to sell him the tires, admitted while on the witness stand that Damerel had not requested either of them to sell the property. The jury evidently believed Damerel's version of the facts, and thus stamped as false and fabricated the story told by defendants to account for their possession of the stolen articles.

[2-4] We think it clear that the evidence abundantly supports the verdict of the jury. While it is the law that evidence of recent unexplained possession of stolen property, standing alone, is not sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty of larceny, it equally is the law that if a person be found in possession of such property, "slight corroborative evidence of other inculpatory circumstances tending to show his guilt will support a conviction." People v. Cataline, 54 Cal. App. 36, 200 Pac. 1060. In determining the weight to be given to the recent possession of stolen property the jury may consider the "proximity of the place where found to the place of the alleged grand larceny; the lapse of time since the property was taken; the character and nature of the property taken; whether the property was concealed; whether the party denied or admitted the possession; and the demeanor and character of the accused." People v. Farrington, 140 Cal. 659. The falsity of the explanation given by an accused to account for his possession of the property is an incriminatory circumstance to be taken into account by the jury in determining whether his possession justifies the inference of guilt. In People v. Cataline, supra, the court says:

> "The recent possession * * * of the stolen car, together with his false denials and his conduct at and about the time of his apprehension, are sufficient to sustain the verdict of conviction."

See, also, People v. Luchetti, 119 Cal. 501, 51 Pac. 707; People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232; People v. Miller, 45 Cal. App. 494, 188 Pac. 52; People v. Howard, 58 Cal. App. 344, 208 Pac. 1022. In People v. Lang, supra, it is said:

> "The authorities hold that where goods have been feloniously taken by means of a burglary, and they are immediately or soon thereafter found in the possession of a person who gives a false account, or refuses to give any account, of the manner in which he came into the possession, proof of such possession and guilty conduct is presumptive evidence not only that he stole the goods, but that he made use of the means by which access to them was obtained."

[5] The evidence discloses incriminatory circumstances of a most damaging character to corroborate the circumstance that defendants had in their possession the recently stolen property. At midnight, within 2½ hours from the time when it was possible for the theft to be committed, defendants drove into a garage with the stolen tires and tubes. Such property—33 new tires of different makes and 50 tubes—is not of a character which customarily is hauled about at midnight for any innocent purpose and left in a garage without giving to the person in charge any explanation of why such property happened to be brought to such a place at such an hour. But perhaps the most damaging circumstance of all is the fabricated story put forth by appellants while on the witness stand to account for their possession of these tubes and tires. These and other circumstances to which we might allude did space permit fully warrant the conclusion that the evidence, though circumstantial and not conclusive, is legally sufficient to support the verdict.

Appellants have presented two or three other points, but they are so utterly lacking in merit that we do not deem them worthy of any special notice or consideration. A careful examination of the entire record convinces us that there is no error justifying a judgment of reversal.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

COATS & WILLIAMSON, Inc., v. MORAN & CO. et al. (Civ. 4652.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 30, 1924.)

1. Principal and agent 🔑123(7)—Evidence held not to authorize sale of hay by parties in possession.

Letter written persons in possession of land asking them to haul and protect certain hay thereon, and letter stating selling price of the hay, in response to inquiry, held not to show a transfer of possession, accompanied by power of disposition, within Civ. Code, § 1142, relative to purchases in good faith from parties in possession.

2. Sales 🔑234(3)—When buyer of hay from party in possession protected.

Before Civ. Code, § 1142, providing when buyer from party in possession acquires title, is available to buyer of hay, he must establish transfer of possession by owner, accompanied by power to dispose of it and purchase in good faith in ordinary course of business.

3. Contracts 🔑20—Even where time is not of essence, acceptance must be within reasonable time.

Even where time is not of the essence, acceptance of an offer must be within reasonable time, under Civ. Code, § 1587, subd. 2.

4. Sales 🔑22(5)—Wait of two weeks before accepting offer to sell hay held too long.

Where hay market was fluctuating, a wait of two weeks before acceptance of offer to sell hay held too long.

5. Sales 🔑244(3)—Alleged purchase of hay from parties in possession held not in good faith.

Evidence held to support finding that purchase of hay from parties in possession by one from whom defendants claimed title was not made in good faith, within Civ. Code, § 1142.

6. Trover and conversion 🔑25—One transporting property liable for conversion.

Where one transporting hay by barge for a person who had no title knew of plaintiff's claim to the hay before he moved it, he was jointly liable for conversion.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1151(2)—Error in amount of judgment held curable by modification.

In action for conversion, where there was no finding that action was prosecuted with reasonable diligence, as required by Civ. Code, § 3336, judgment for highest market value between conversion and judgment was unauthorized, though defendant did not plead want of diligence; but, where court also found market value at conversion, error in judgment was curable by reduction to market value at time of conversion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Coats & Williamson, Inc., against Moran & Co. and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified and, as modified, affirmed.

W. F. Williamson, of San Francisco (A. S. Hutchinson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant Moran & Co.

Hankins & Hankins, and Olin F. Nuckolls, all of San Francisco, for appellant Erickson.

Lucius L. Solomons and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is a joint appeal by the defendants from a judgment rendered against them in the sum of $2,769.50 and costs for the alleged conversion of 95½ tons of hay. During the month of October, 1919, the hay in question was stored in a barn on an island near Vallejo, of which C. R. Windeler and S. Benson at that time had control. On November 8, 1919, Windeler & Benson made a purported sale of said hay to Goss & Son. On November 13, 1919, Goss & Son sold the hay to the defendant Moran & Co. Within a few days thereafter Moran & Co. shipped the hay on a barge under the control of defendant Erickson from said island to its warehouse located in South San Francisco,

The appellants claim a valid sale of said hay to Goss & Son under the provisions of section 1142 of the Civil Code, upon the ground that Windeler & Benson, at the time of said purported sale, were in possession of said hay under authority to sell the same granted by plaintiff through its representative Lucius L. Solomons, and that Goss & Son, relying upon the authority thus granted, purchased said hay from Windeler & Benson in good faith and in the ordinary course of business.

[1] The trial court found that Windeler & Benson were not authorized to sell said hay; that they retained possession thereof merely as caretakers; that Goss & Son did not purchase said hay upon the faith of any authorization from plaintiff to Windeler & Benson to sell the same, and they had knowledge that said hay was the property of plaintiff, and that they did not purchase the same from Windeler & Benson in good faith or in the ordinary course of business. Appellants attack these findings upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. We find no merit in the contention.

It appears from the evidence that in October, 1919, Windeler & Benson took possession of an island near Vallejo known as island No. 2, under a contract of purchase for the purpose of farming the same. The hay in question was grown on said island during the year 1919 by former tenants under a crop lease, and said hay constituted the one-fourth share belonging to plaintiff. Owing to certain financial difficulties in which said former tenants became involved, the entire crop of hay could not be sold as a whole, as had been the usual custom, and consequently the one-fourth share belonging to plaintiff was left in the field. The condition of the weather at that time had been threatening, and for that reason Lucius L. Solomons, who had been acting as the attorney for plaintiff, wrote Windeler & Benson on October 13, 1919, as follows:

> "[You] are hereby authorized to furnish the necessary labor to haul and protect the hay belonging to the undersigned at island No. 2, the same to be placed on the levee or elsewhere awaiting sale or shipment according to their discretion and at our expense."

The hay was accordingly hauled to and stored in the barn on said island by Windeler & Benson. They also had a quantity of hay stored therein belonging to themselves. About that time Solomons planned a trip East, and in contemplation of his absence requested a hay broker named Eaton to dispose of plaintiff's hay at the highest market price. Before his departure, however, Solomons received a letter from Windeler, dated October 22, 1919, as follows:

> "If Mr. Williamson's hay is for sale, would you please let me know his price as soon as possible."

In a reply letter dated October 24, 1919, Solomons stated:

> "That the price of Mr. Williamson's hay is $13.50 per ton delivered at the barn on island No. 2, where your men have recently hauled it, I believe."

Solomons departed for the East on October 29, 1919, and did not return until the end of the following month. During his absence, to wit, on November 8, 1919, Benson, unknown to Windeler, made a purported sale of said hay to Goss & Son. Two days later, on November 10, 1919, Windeler wrote to Solomons stating:

> "We will take that hay of Williamson's at $13.50 per ton. We will pay for it as soon as we get the weight of it."

The Windeler letter of November 10, 1919, was shown to Eaton by Solomons' stenographer, and Eaton thereupon, in Solomons' absence dictated and mailed a reply in Solomons' name, in which it was stated:

> "Since I heard nothing from you in reply to my letter the hay has been sold some two weeks or more."

As a matter of fact, said hay had not been sold, but, as Eaton explained while testifying, the statement in said letter related to a transaction in which he and another hay broker had inspected the hay and indicated they would buy it. This circumstance, however, is immaterial.

It is principally upon the authority of the Solomons letters, dated October 13, 1919, and October 24, 1919, respectively, and the fact that Windeler & Benson had possession of the hay, that appellants base their claim of a valid sale to Goss & Son under the provisions of section 1142 of the Civil Code.

[2] Before the provisions of said Code section are available to appellants, however, it is apparent that two propositions must be established by the evidence: First, a transfer of the possession of said hay by plaintiff to Windeler & Benson, accompanied by the power to dispose of the same, and, secondly, a purchase by Goss & Son in good faith and in the ordinary course of business. The evidence, we think, fails to prove either proposition.

[3] From the testimony given by Solomons it is quite clear that Solomons' only purpose in requesting Windeler & Benson to "haul and protect said hay" was to save it from the elements, and it is evident from the face of his letter of October 24, 1919, that said letter was not intended as an authorization to dispose of said hay, but, as Solomons testified, was written merely as a reply to an inquiry made by Windeler as to the price of said hay. Even if said letter be construed as a grant of authority to sell said hay to others at the price stated therein, there was no valid sale made thereunder, for the reason that the offer of the hay at that price was not accepted within a reasonable time. Subdivision 2, § 1587, Civ. Code.

> "In mercantile contracts such as contracts for the manufacture or sale of goods and the like, it is generally held that the parties have intended that the time is the essence of the contract. 13 Corpus Juris, 688, and cases cited." Jensen v. Goss, 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 Pac. 225.

And even in cases where time is not the essence of the contract, acceptance must be made within a reasonable time, and the question of "what is a reasonable time must be determined from all of the circumstances of the individual case. 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1129, 1130, 1132, 1133." Martyn v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 21 Cal. App. 589, 132 Pac. 602.

[4] Appellants concede that the hay market at that particular time was on the rise, Windeler & Benson waited over two weeks before making reply. Their acceptance therefore came too late.

Appellants make no claim that Windeler & Benson were ever the owners of said hay. Their whole case rests upon the theory that they were vested only with a selling power as defined by section 1142 of the Civil Code. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the question of whether or not Windeler & Benson actually became the owners of said hay.

[5] Upon the second proposition we think that the trial court was fully justified in finding that the purchase by Goss & Son was not made in good faith. The evidence shows that Windeler & Benson were desirous of having the hay disposed of so that they could use the barn for other purposes. The purported sale of November 8, 1919, to Goss & Son was consummated through a representative named Lewis. He was first told that the hay was for sale by Windeler while visiting at the home of Lewis in Concord. Later Lewis inspected the hay at the barn on the island. At that time Windeler told him that he "had no authority to sell Mr. Williamson's hay," and he gave Lewis the address of Solomons and made the request that he communicate with him. Benson on this same occasion requested Windeler to write to Solomons about the sale of the hay. This request resulted in Windeler's letter of October 22, 1919. Lewis again visited the island some time during the first week in November. At that time he was shown Solomons' letter dated October 24, 1919, in which it was stated that the price of the hay was $13.50 a ton. Windeler had demanded $15 per ton, but explained that the extra amount covered the charges for hauling and storing the hay. Lewis went away without purchasing the hay, for the reason that Goss had limited him to a buying price of $13.50 per ton. After communicating with Goss the latter instructed him to buy the hay if it was good stock hay.

A few days later, on November 8, 1919, in Pacheco, in the absence of Windeler, Lewis purchased from Benson the entire lot of hay in the barn, consisting of 1,400 bales, 900 of which belonged to plaintiff. The sale was evidenced by a written bill of sale signed by Benson, in which Windeler & Benson were named as vendors and Goss & Son as vendees. Upon Benson's return to the island two days thereafter he informed Windeler of the sale and requested him to write to Solomons and say, "We would take the hay at that price." Windeler accordingly wrote the letter of November 10th above quoted.

While Lewis was carrying on his dealings with Windeler & Benson, Goss opened negotiations with Eaton. He first phoned Eaton to inquire the price of said hay, and upon being told that the price was $20 per ton declined to take it. A few days later he again phoned Eaton and said, "Now let's get down to business. What will you take for that Coats & Williamson hay up there on island No. 2?" to which Eaton again replied that the price was $20 a ton. After some discussion Goss ended the conversation by saying that he did not want the hay "at that money." Following that conversation Eaton, together with another hay broker, inspected the hay on the island with a view of buying it themselves. Upon his return to San Francisco, Goss again phoned Eaton to inquire the price of the hay and Eaton told him then that the price was $25 per ton. The following conversation then took place between them:

> "He [Goss] said, 'What are you holding that hay at?' I said, '$25.' He says, 'Well, I don't want to pay for it; that is out of reason.' And he said, 'I will tell you what I want to know for. Through a mistake our man has loaded 600 bales of that hay on the barge, and it is on the road to San Francisco,' or 'ready to leave for San Francisco.' And he says, 'I offered $15 for it the other day; I will give $17.50 for it now.' I told him, 'No; that I wouldn't take it;' and I told him, 'Without he was ready to give the price, he could put the hay back in the warehouse.' He said, 'Well, I will put it back, but I won't put it in the warehouse.' I said, 'You will get in serious trouble if you don't put it where you found it. You got that hay in the warehouse, and I want it put back in the warehouse where you got it.' He said, 'All right,' he would notify Captain Peterson to put it back in the warehouse."

Immediately following that conversation Eaton phoned to the defendant Erickson to ascertain if he had yet moved the hay, and the following conversation, according to Eaton, took place between them:

> "I [Eaton] called up Captain Erickson, and asked him if he had removed that hay, and he said, 'There is 600 bales of it on the barge.' 'Well,' I said, 'Mr. Goss tells me that he has ordered it to be put back.' 'Well,' he says, 'Mr. Goss may have told you that, but he has just told me—I got word from him a few minutes ago, that he sent an extra man up there to hurry up and load the balance of that hay and get it down to San Francisco.'"

The testimony given by Eaton concerning these phone conversations was not denied, and in our opinion fully support the conclusions of the trial court upon the question of the good faith of the purchase by Goss & Son from Windeler & Benson.

Appellants also contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court to the effect that, while Solomons represented himself to be the agent of the plaintiff in reference to the selling of the hay, he did not have the authority to sell the same, and that plaintiff was not bound by his acts in that respect. We believe that the evidence supports the finding, but inasmuch as Solomons did not transfer said hay to Windeler & Benson with the power of selling the same, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question of the real or ostensible authority of Solomons.

[6] Appellants also claim that the evidence is insufficient to charge the defendant Erickson with liability. It is evident, we think, from the testimony given by Eaton concerning the conversation over the phone with Erickson, which occurred prior to the time that any hay was removed from said island, that sufficient notice was given Erickson of the adverse claim of title to said hay by plaintiff, and coupled with the fact that Erickson thereafter removed said hay from the island and transported it to the warehouse of Moran & Co. was sufficient to charge him with joint liability for the conversion of the hay.

[7] The last contention of appellants to be considered is the one wherein it is claimed that the findings are insufficient as a matter of law to support the judgment. This contention is based upon the ground that there is no finding, either express or implied, to the effect that "the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence." Section 3336, Civil Code.

The complaint alleged, and the court found, that the conversion was committed on November 19, 1919. The action was commenced on December 23, 1919, but was not tried until the 4th and 11th days of October, 1920, and the findings were not signed until February 19, 1922. Judgment was entered on February 14, 1922. Plaintiff in the complaint elected "to claim the highest value of said property from the time of said conversion to the date of the judgment in the action," and in this respect alleged that the highest market value between the date of the conversion and the date of the filing of the complaint was $2,500. The court made two separate findings on the issue of the market value of said hay. It found, first, that the market value thereof on the date of the conversion was $1,757, and it found, secondly, that the highest market value between the date of the conversion and the date of the judgment was $2,769.50, or $29 per ton. Judgment was given for the latter amount.

We are of the opinion that in order to support the judgment for the greater amount it was essential that there be a finding to the effect that the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. Section 3336, Civil Code. In the case of Niles v. Edwards, 90 Cal. 10, 27 Pac. 159, 296, it was said:

> "We could, perhaps, say, as matter of law, that the action was commenced in time to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the rule allowing the highest market value, but a whole year having elapsed between the commencement of the action and the trial, it cannot be concluded as matter of law that it was prosecuted with due diligence. It may have been or it may not have been so prosecuted, and without an express finding in his favor on this point, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment based on the highest market value."

Respondents endeavor to escape the effect of the ruling stated in that case by advancing the claim that the defendants by their answers tendered no issue on that point, and that consequently no finding was necessary. There are two answers to respondent's theory: First, in the very nature of things it would be quite impossible for a defendant in any case to plead such fact in advance, for the reason that the lack of diligence on plaintiff's part may not then have occurred; and, secondly, where a judgment is obtained for a greator amount than is called for by the ordinary measure of damages, the record must affirmatively show sufficient proof and findings to justify the allowance of such greater amount. We are satisfied, however, that the error may be cured by a modification of the judgment (Brown v. Caldwell, 13 Cal. App. 29, 108 Pac. 874), and that it will not be necessary to reverse the judgment as was done in the case of Niles v. Edwards, supra, for the following reasons: In the latter case there was but one finding upon the issue of value—the highest market value between the date of the conversion and the date of the judgment. It was held that the absence of a finding as to the use of reasonable diligence prevented the application of the measure of damages for the greater amount. Consequently the record was left barren, with no finding whatever on the issue of value, and without which no judgment could be rendered. A retrial was therefore necessary to determine, first, whether diligence had been used, and, if so, then to again give judgment for the greater amount, but, if found that reasonable diligence had not been used, then to determine the market value of the property at the time of conversion, so that judgment might be given for the lesser amount.

In the instant case the decision, as above stated, contains two findings on the issue of value. Like the case of Niles v. Edwards, supra, the absence of a finding as to the use of reasonable diligence has eliminated the measure of damages for the greater amount, but, unlike that case, there still remains the finding of reasonable market value of the property on the date of the conversion. Consequently there is a complete set of findings to support a judgment for the lesser amount which respondent in its brief has intimated it is willing to accept. Appellants could not possibly expect to be benefited by a retrial. It could result only in possible advantage to the respondent, for the reason that the only issue to be tried would be the question of the use of reasonable diligence in the prosecution of the action. If the court found that such diligence had been exercised, it would again apply the measure of damages for the greater amount. If it found that such diligence had not been used, it would then apply the measure of damages for the lesser amount, which, as before stated, respondent has intimated it is now willing to accept.

It is therefore ordered that the trial court enter a judgment on the findings in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,030.30, that being the market value of said property as found by the court on the date of the conversion, with the added interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the conversion to the date of the entry of said judgment, and that the entry of such judgment be made nunc pro tunc as of the date of the original judgment, the 14th day of February, 1922, and as thus modified the judgment will stand affirmed. It is further ordered that appellants recover costs of this appeal.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; ST. SURE, J.

DUFFIELD et al. v. PAYNE et al.

(Civ. 2655.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 28, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1924.)

1. Carriers 🔑316(1) — No presumption of negligence from proof of injury or death.

No presumption of negligence arises from mere proof of injury or death of a person while a passenger.

2. Carriers 🔑320(25) — Whether brakeman was negligent in opening vestibule and trapdoors while passenger was on platform held for jury.

In action for death of passenger sustained when brakeman opened vestibule and trapdoors and left them unguarded while passenger was on platform ready to alight, negligence of brakeman held question for jury.

3. Carriers 🔑347(9)—Contributory negligence of passenger killed when brakeman opened vestibule and trapdoors held for jury

In action for death of passenger sustained when brakeman opened vestibule and trapdoors and left them unguarded while passenger was on platform ready to alight, the contributory negligence of passenger held for jury.

4. Negligence 🔑138(2) — Trial 🔑260(3) — Refusal of instruction as to burden of proof held not error.

In action for death, refusal of instruction to find for defendant, if in a state of reasonable uncertainty as to whether plaintiffs were entitled to recover, held not error, in view of its tendency to mislead jury into belief that plaintiffs were required to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt, and its shifting of burden as to contributory negligence, and in view of other instructions as to burden of proof.

5. Death 🔑99(4)—$10,000 for death of 74 year old husband held not excessive.

$10,000 verdict given wife and children for death of 74 year old husband and father, who was in perfect health and was doing his own work on his farm and was supporting his family at the time of his death, held not excessive under Code Civ. Proc. § 377.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Duffield and others against John Barton Payne, as Agent appointed pursuant to Transportation Act 1920, § 206 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10071¼ee), as successor to Walter H. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for appellants.

Arthur C. Huston and Arthur C. Huston, Jr., both of Woodland, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiffs, the surviving wife and children of Jesse D. Duffield, deceased, were given judgment for damages in the sum of $10,000 for the death of the latter, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants in the operation of a railroad train upon which he was a passenger. The defendants have appealed.

Appellants contend that they are entitled to a reversal of the judgment on the following grounds: (1) That the evidence does not show negligence on the part of defendants; (2) that it shows contributory negligence on the part of deceased; (3) that the court erred in refusing certain proposed instructions; (4) that the verdict is excessive.

The evidence shows that Harrington and Coyle are flag stations at which there are no buildings or lights, the latter being a mile north of the former. Deceased was a passenger on the north-bound train from Sacramento to Coyle. He had purchased a ticket to Harrington only, as tickets were not being sold to Coyle. He requested the conductor to let him off at Coyle instead of Harrington, and the latter agreed to do so; there being no other passenger for either place. The accident occurred shortly after 9 o'clock at night. It was dark at that time. The weather was clear. The train passed Harrington at a speed of 35 miles an hour. Immediately thereafter the brakeman signaled the engineer to stop at Coyle and then walked from the rear to the center of the smoker, in which deceased was riding, and announced that the next station was Coyle. He then went to the rear platform. Duffield followed and stood in the door, with one foot probably on the platform. While standing there he said "something about being home soon," and the brakeman replied, "Yes." No other conversation was had between them. In the vestibule, at the side of the car door, was a guard rail which stood in a perpendicular position when the vestibule door was closed and was lowered to a horizontal position when it was opened. When so lowered the guard rail served to hold the vestibule door open and as a hand rail for passengers boarding or alighting from the car. On reaching the platform the brakeman opened the vestibule and trapdoors and lowered the guard rail to the horizontal position. While the guard rail was being let down, "Duffield had his hand on it." He did not remove his hand, but "let it slide right down." When last seen prior to the accident, he had hold of this guard rail. What occurred thereafter can best be told in the language of the brakeman, who testified:

> "I turned around and stepped across to the vestibule (of the next car to the rear), about six feet, and picked up my lantern, and as I turned around and stepped back, I just saw a glimpse of an object disappearing out the doorway, and I pulled the signal for the engineer to stop, and when we did, we picked up Mr. Duffield where he was lying there by the track."

The train was brought to a stop in about ten car lengths. The signal given was not an emergency signal, but a stop signal. When the signal to stop at Coyle was given, the engineer shut off steam, allowing the train to drift, and then "made a light application of the air, five or six pounds, to take up the slack in the brakes and gradually reduced the speed" to about 25 miles an hour within a quarter of a mile. It was constantly decreasing from that time on. At the time the second signal was given the train was within about 100 rods of Coyle. The track was in good condition. There was no "jar or jerk" of the train at any time. The vestibules of both cars were lighted. The light was shining on the steps, but it was not strong enough for the brakeman to recognize the object which he saw disappearing through the door.

The conductor who had charge of the train testified as follows:

> "There is no laid down rule in regard to opening the trapdoors. Q. Well, what instructions if any did the brakeman have? A. To open the door as conveniently to the station as they can. Q. Well, what about guarding them? A. Guarding them as much as they can. Q. And is it a question of guarding them as much as they can, or guarding the trapdoor while open? A. Well, it is as much as you can."

The brakeman testified:

> "Q. What duties were you given in connection with the operation of this train? A. Protecting the train and announcing stations. * * * Q. What was your duty in regard to opening and closing these trapdoors and the vestibule of the car? A. Approaching a station, to open it. Q. And close them when? A. After leaving the station. Q. And what, if any, were your duties with reference to guarding these trapdoors while open? A. Well, when it was possible to stay there and look after them. Q. And did you receive instructions with reference to these trapdoors under any rule? A. No, sir. Q. And who gave you your instructions? A. There were no instructions given us. * * * Q. Well, then, how did you learn that it was your duty to guard these doors in the manner in which you have described? A. Well, it was a matter of 'safety first.' Q. * * * In calling your station and giving the signal after you left Harrington, was that the usual way of stopping the train for Coyle? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. And no greater distance between the time of giving that signal that night than any other night? A. Just the same."

The deceased was 74 years of age at the time of his death. "He was in perfect health, * * * perfectly active; did more work than most of the young men are doing nowadays." He had full use of all his faculties. His eyesight was very good. He was not weakened from age in the way of handling himself and walked vigorously. He had been accustomed to alight from the train at Coyle and had alighted there several times at night.

[1] No presumption of negligence arises from mere proof of injury or death of a person while a passenger. Rystinki v. Central California T. Co., 175 Cal. 336, 344, 165 Pac. 952; Steele v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 379, 143 Pac. 718.

In the absence of a rule or custom to keep vestibule doors closed or guarded while trains are in motion, it has generally been held that mere proof of an open and unguarded vestibule door during the time a train is slowing down for the purpose of stopping at a station is not sufficient to establish negligence on the part of a carrier or to constitute an invitation to passengers to alight while the train is in motion. In Baltimore & O. S. R. Co. v. Mullen, 217 Ill. 203, 75 N. E. 474, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115, it is said:

> "If there had been nothing more than the calling of the name of the station, or the fastening back of the vestibule doors, it could not be said that the appellee was invited by any employee of the company to alight."

It was held, however, that when these facts were considered in connection with other circumstances shown by the evidence, the question of the company's negligence was for the jury. In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Brown, 73 Kan. 233, 84 Pac. 1026, it is said:

> "It is necessary to the efficient and orderly conduct of the business of carrying passengers in vestibuled railway coaches, and necessary for the convenience and accommodation of the passengers, that the vestibules be opened before the stopping of trains at stations; and, as the practice does not expose the passengers to any considerable danger, the opening of a vestibule at any time after the usual call for a station is not, under ordinary circumstances, and was not in this case, per se negligence."

In Gayle's Adm'r v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 163 Ky. 459, 173 S. W. 1113, the court said:

> "The announcement of the station and the opening of the doors did not constitute an invitation to alight until after the train stopped."

The case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Dallas, 150 Ky. 442, 150 S. W. 536, is to the same effect.

In Elger v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 226 Mass. 84, 115 N. E. 242, in affirming a judgment for defendant, it is said:

> "On the facts disclosed the opening of the door and the announcement of the name of the next stop plainly did not" constitute an invitation to the plaintiff "to alight from a moving car."

To the same effect is the case of Hooker v. Blair, 189 Mich. 278, 155 N. W. 364.

In Pagnini v. North Jersey St. Ry. Co., 69 N. J. Law, 60, 54 Atl. 218, it was held that the mere opening of the gate before the car comes to a stop "will not raise a presumption of actionable negligence."

In Mearns v. Central R. Co., 163 N. Y. 108, 57 N. E. 292, the facts were similar to those in the instant case, except that there was no evidence relative to any rule or custom to guard the vestibule doors when they were open while the train was moving. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of defendant. The judgment was affirmed on appeal. Had the verdict and judgment in this case been in favor of defendants, an affirmance would be necessary, because the finding of a court or jury, based upon evidence from which opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn, is conclusive on appeal.

In Blue Grass Traction Co. v. Skillman, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 480, 102 S. W. 809, in which a judgment against the company was affirmed, the proof showed other circumstances indicating negligence in addition to proof of calling the station and then opening the door while the car was in motion. It was held that such proof was sufficient to show that the conductor knew of the passenger's danger, "or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known it;" and negligently failed to warn her of the danger.

The decisions are to the effect that where, to the knowledge of a passenger, it is a rule of a common carrier, or a custom of those in charge of its trains, to keep the vestibules closed or guarded at all times while the trains are in motion, an open and unguarded vestibule is in the nature of an invitation to such passenger to alight, if he have occasion to do so, and an assurance that he may alight with safety; the passenger, of course, being held to the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, notwithstanding the open vestibules. The doctrine is analogous to that applying to open gates at railroad crossings.

> "The defendant was not bound to have the car vestibuled; but, having done so, it could not by acts and words lead its passengers to believe that the doors of the vestibule would be kept closed between stations, and then negligently leave them open, without incurring liability to passengers injured thereby." Crandall v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., 96 Minn. 434, 105 N. W. 185, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 645, 113 Am. St. Rep. 653; Rivers v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 80 N. J. Law, 217, 76 Atl. 455; Id., 83 N. J. Law, 513, 83 Atl. 883.
> "It was the custom, of which plaintiff was aware, for the motorman not to open the doors to permit passengers to alight until the car had come to a full stop. * * * Plaintiff had a right to rely upon the custom shown in evidence." Tillery v. Harvey (Mo. App.) 214 S. W. 246.

This case is cited in Kirby v. United Rys. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 242 S. W. 79, where it is said:

> "It has been held that the opening of a vestibule door after a car had slowed down for a stop, but while moving very slowly, and before it had come to a full stop, was an implied invitation to alight, where, on account of darkness and other conditions, a passenger was misled thereby."

In Ferrell v. Washington Water Power Co., 83 Wash. 319, 145 Pac. 442, in reversing a judgment of nonsuit, it is said:

> "Assuming that it is a matter of common knowledge of a passenger that the gates of a pay-as-you-enter car are closed while it is in motion, we think it would be going too far to hold that the opening of the door was not an invitation to appellant to pass out of the car, or at least to step down into the vestibule."

The conductor testified that the brakemen were instructed to guard the trapdoors when open "as much as they can." The brakeman testified that it was his duty "when it was possible to stay there and look after them." The evidence shows that Duffield had frequently traveled on defendants' trains. It is a fair inference that he was familiar with the custom, or practice, of guarding the vestibule doors when open. The train was to stop in the dark at a mere siding where there were no buildings or lights from the observance of which a passenger could perceive that the train was moving. Only one passenger was to alight. There was but one door to open and guard. No duty of the brakeman called him elsewhere. Under such circumstances, to guard the door as much as he could, or as much as was possible, would be to guard it during all the time it was open. On that occasion the brakeman clearly did not follow instructions. The engineer had shut off steam and the train was smoothly drifting towards the siding, the movement thereof probably being imperceptible to Duffield. The brakeman knew, according to his own testimony, when the train passed Harrington, and the natural inference is that Duffield did not; there being no buildings or lights there, and it being a matter of common knowledge that passengers usually rely upon the announcement of their stations by the brakemen. His judgment was not so accurate as that of the experienced brakeman as to the length of time required for the slowing train to reach Coyle after the station was announced. While the light in the vestibule was sufficient to enable one to see the steps, a fair inference is that it was not strong enough to make the adjacent ground visible, because it was too dim for the brakeman to distinguish the object which he saw disappear out the door. The two men did not have equal knowledge of the situation. The brakeman was bound to the exercise of the highest degree of care and foresight for the safety of the passenger. The latter was bound only to the exercise of ordinary care. When the brakeman, knowing that Duffield was standing with his hand on the guard rail, ready to go down the steps to alight, opened the vestibule doors and then turned and walked back to the vestibule of the next car, it was most natural for Duffield, if he believed that the train had stopped, to interpret the acts of the brakeman as an invitation to alight.

[2, 3] It cannot be said as a matter of law that the acts and omissions of the brakeman, under the foregoing circumstances, do not warrant the inference that he was negligent or that the conduct of Duffield was free from negligence.

> "When it can be affirmed that all reasonable men would agree as to the quality of an act in respect of its being either negligent or prudent, the court may give effect to such consensus of opinion, and direct a verdict in accordance therewith. The direction is given, not because it is the judge's opinion alone, but because the judge is able to say that it is also the opinion that all reasonable men would entertain of the question. If there is doubt as to whether all reasonable men would draw the same conclusion from the evidence, then the question must be submitted to the twelve reasonable men appointed by the Constitution to determine disputed or doubtful questions of fact." Bronson v. Oakes, 22 C. C. A. 520, 76 Fed. 734.

The jury may have concluded, and reasonably so, that when the brakeman turned to pick up his lantern, after opening the doors, he should have anticipated that Duffield might be misled into the belief that the train had stopped and that he should have warned Duffield not to attempt to alight.

> "The carrier owes to the passenger the duty of protection during transportation. * * * This duty of care involves warning of danger so far as such warning may enable the passenger to protect himself against an injury which might be anticipated in the exercise of a high degree of care and foresight, and the carrier will be liable for an injury which might have been avoided if due warning had been given. * * * There is no duty, however, to warn a passenger of his danger where the conditions which constitute the danger are as observable by him and apparently as obvious to him as to the employees of the carrier." 10 C. J. 910.

The conditions which constituted the danger to which Duffield was exposed were not "as observable by him and apparently as obvious to him as to the employees." The plaintiffs were under the necessity of relying entirely upon the testimony of the trainmen, defendants in the action, to prove negligence, a fact which was probably given due consideration by the jury in weighing the evidence.

[4] It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give two instructions proposed by defendants. All the propositions contained therein had been repeatedly stated in instructions given, except the following:

> "If, after considering all the evidence before you, your minds are still in a state of reasonable uncertainty as to whether plaintiffs are entitled to recover, your verdict must be for the defendant."

The requested instruction is a copy of one approved in Green v. Birmingham Ry., Light & Power Co., 187 Ala. 508, 65 South. 781. Whether or not the instruction is a correct statement of law, it would tend to mislead the jury into the belief that plaintiffs were required to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt. If correct as applied to the question whether a plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, it does not follow that it would be correct as applied to conflicting evidence, where a prima facie case has been made. People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 653, 154 Pac. 468. The defendants herein alleged that Duffield was guilty of contributory negligence. If the jurors found that the defendants were negligent, but their minds were "in a state of reasonable uncertainty" as to whether Duffield also was negligent, then the instruction would have required them to reverse the rule as to burden of proof of contributory negligence and return a verdict for defendants, notwithstanding the latter's negligence. In any event, the jury was fully instructed as to the proof necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to a verdict. Among others, the following instructions were given at the request of defendants:

> "A recovery of damages against the defendant in this case can only be had when after a careful consideration of all evidence before you, plaintiffs have satisfied you by a preponderance of such evidence that the death of the deceased was the result of the negligence of the defendant. * * * The burden of such proof is upon plaintiffs, and must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, otherwise your verdict must be for defendants."

[5] The deceased was of the age of 74 years and 2 months at the time of his death. The expectancy of life of a man of that age is nearly 7 years. Mr. Duffield was in perfect health, vigorous and active. "Never had a real sick spell" in 46 years. "Did more work than most of the young men are doing." From the condition of his health at the time of his death, the jury may have believed that Duffield's expectancy of life was more than 7 years. He and his wife were living on a 40-acre farm, of which 6 acres were in four year old almond trees. He was raising 20 to 25 head of cattle and a few hogs. He did his own work and supported his family. His wife, one of the plaintiffs, who had lived with him as such for 46 years, was of the age of 66 years at the time of his death. There was no direct proof, in terms of money, of the annual earnings of deceased or of the amount expended by him in support of his family. In estimating the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiffs, the jury had the right to include the value of the society, comfort, and protection of deceased of which they were deprived. In actions of this character "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." Code Civ. Proc. § 377. While the amount of the judgment is large, it cannot be said that the damages awarded are so excessive as to warrant a reduction thereof on appeal or a reversal of the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

HEANEY v. MADDEN et al. (Civ. 4822.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 5, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1924.)

Municipal corporations ⚷706(8) — Instructions held not objectionable as denying recovery, if passenger was struck in safety zone.

Instructions that alighting street car passenger was negligent if he walked into defendant's automobile, and that chauffeur has right to assume pedestrian using street will exercise ordinary care, and will see that which is plainly to be seen, held not objectionable as denying recovery, if passenger was struck in six-foot safety zone prescribed by ordinance.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Louise Heaney, administratrix of the estate of John F. Heaney, deceased, against Joseph Madden and D. D. Gibbons, copartners, doing business under the name of Madden & Gibbons, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. W. Molkenbuhr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for the death of her husband alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of an automobile while operated by one of the servants of the defendants. The jury brought in a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

On the 17th day of August, 1921, John F. Heaney, the deceased, alighted from the rear end of a Valencia street car near the southerly line of Eighteenth street in San Francisco. While passing from the street car to the sidewalk, a collision occurred between him and an automobile being operated by the servant of the defendants. On the trial of the case it was the theory of the plaintiff that the defendants' automobile was not operated with due care, and, secondly, that it was being operated within six feet from the lowest step of the street car on the right-hand side thereof. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defendants that their automobile was being operated in a careful manner, at a low speed, and in a zone outside of the six-foot space above mentioned. When the plaintiff opened her case, her attorney made an opening statement delineating her theory. When the defendants opened their case, their attorney made an opening statement delineating their theory. Each party thereafter introduced evidence, and after the arguments of counsel the court instructed the jury.

At this point it is proper to state that the evidence offered by the plaintiff consisted of an attempt to prove that the decedent was struck by defendants' automobile while the decedent was yet within the six-foot zone above mentioned. On the other hand, the evidence offered by the defendants consisted of evidence to the effect that the automobile of the defendants did not at any time approach inside of the six-foot zone, but, according to the testimony of some of the witnesses, it was eight feet away from the side of the street car.

In giving its instructions the trial court read to the jury sections 2 and 18 of ordinance 1857 (N. S.). Those two sections are respectively as follows:

"Sec. 2. Every person riding, driving, propelling or in charge of any vehicle upon any of the streets, shall ride, drive or propel such vehicle upon such streets in a careful manner and with due regard to the safety and convenience of pedestrians and other vehicles upon such streets."

---

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"Sec. 18. Every person riding, driving, propelling or in charge of any vehicle upon any street, shall keep such vehicle at least six feet on the right-hand side from the running board or lowest step of any street car, which is stopping for the purpose of taking or discharging passengers, and if by reason of the presence of vehicles at the place where such car is stopping, or by reason of the narrowness of the street, or for any other reason, it is not possible to preserve such distance of six feet from the running board or lowest step as herein prescribed, then such person shall stop such vehicle until such car shall have taken on, or discharged its passengers and again started."

It also gave a formal charge and certain instructions requested by the plaintiff and certain instructions requested by the defendants. The instructions are very full and complete, and cover 15 pages of the transcript. The appellant claims that two of the instructions so given at the request of the defendants resulted in prejudicial error. One of those instructions was worded as follows:

> "If you believe the deceased alighted from the street car and without looking for approaching vehicles walked into the automobile in question, then you are instructed that he was guilty of contributory negligence and plaintiff cannot recover."

The appellant's objection to that instruction is this: The appellant claims the instruction was received by the jury as though it were worded as follows:

> "If you believe the deceased alighted from the street car, and while within six feet of the lowest step, without looking for approaching vehicles walked into the automobile in question, then you are instructed that he was guilty of contributory negligence and plaintiff cannot recover."

The other instruction complained of was as follows:

> "I instruct you that the chauffeur who is operating an automobile along a public street at a reasonable and moderate rate of speed, and with due care, has a right to assume that pedestrians using said street will exercise ordinary care in doing so, and will see that which is plainly to be seen."

The appellant's objection to the second instruction is that the jury received the instruction as though it were worded as follows:

> "I instruct you that the chauffeur who is operating an automobile along a public street at a reasonable and moderate rate of speed, and with due care, has a right to assume that pedestrians using that portion of the street within six feet of the lowest step of the car and other portions of said street will exercise ordinary care in doing so, and will see that which is plainly to be seen."

We think it is not necessary to go further than to state that the interpolations indicated do violence to the language used by the trial court, and that nothing is present in the record which justifies a construction of the language of the trial court as including such interpolations. The point is entirely without merit.

SCHMID v. SCHMID. (Civ. 4739.)

Divorce ⚷127(4)—Corroborative testimony of desertion held insufficient.

Corroborative evidence of desertion of husband by wife held insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Effie M. Schmid against Otto O. Schmid, in which defendant filed cross-complaint. From judgment denying relief to either, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for a divorce on the grounds of willful neglect and extreme cruelty. Defendant filed a cross-complaint on the ground of desertion. The court found that defendant was not guilty of neglect or cruelty and that plaintiff was not guilty of desertion. It then denied a divorce to each party. Defendant appeals from that portion of the judgment denying him a divorce on his cross-complaint. The action was commenced on January 23, 1923. The cross-complaint was filed on March 7, 1923, and the alleged desertion occurred on March 5, 1922. The facts of the case so far as material are that the plaintiff and defendant were married in 1905 and have three children, a boy aged 15, a girl aged 8, and a girl aged 6. The defendant has had no trade but has worked at odd jobs, earning usually less than $100 a month, from which he has endeavored to support his wife and children and pay for a small home which he and his wife were purchasing on the installment plan. His earning capacity was insufficient to support the family, and on that account the wife left his home in Napa and went to Santa Rosa, taking the two girls with her. There she obtained employment through which she was able to supplement the earnings of her husband for the support of the family. She testified that the defendant had continually nagged her regarding her expenditures in and about the home, and that when she left the home it was with the definite intention of separating from her husband because of his inability to support the family.

The appellant insists that upon this state of fact the trial court should have found that the separation on the part of the wife was with the intent to desert her husband. The respondent has not appeared upon this appeal, and we are left to the appellant's brief alone for a presentation of the issues involved. It would serve little purpose to give consideration to the cases therein cited on the general question of what constitutes desertion, inasmuch as we are satisfied that the judgment must be affirmed because the corroborating evidence of the alleged desertion on the part of the wife is wholly insufficient for that purpose. Outside of the admissions of the wife herself, the only evidence offered to corroborate the husband's testimony of his wife's desertion is that of a neighbor, who testified merely that Mrs. Schmid had gone away from her home about a year ago, and that Mr. Schmid continued living there after she had gone. The evidence is without conflict that the wife left her home with the consent of her husband for the purpose of making a visit with relatives in Santa Rosa. It is then contended on the part of the husband that she thereafter formed the intention of deserting him, and, of course, this was a matter concerning which the neighbor was unable to testify. The case is similar to Sweet v. Sweet (Cal. App) 222 Pac. 634. As the cases on the subject are fully discussed therein, it is unnecessary to make further comment here.

Judgment affirmed.

RICHMOND WHARF & DOCK CO. v. BLAKE BROS. CO. (Civ. 4650.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 16, 1924.)

1. Pleading 🔑36(2)—Plaintiff's claim held to admit that fixtures sued for became part of realty.

Claim of plaintiff, in action for conversion of fixtures as personalty, that they became property of plaintiff's assignors, as lessors, because not removed from premises during term of lease, is admission that they became part of realty.

2. Eminent domain 🔑243(3)—Defendant, answering in condemnation proceedings wherein fixtures were not separately valued, cannot sue for conversion and use thereof by condemnor.

Defendant, appearing and answering in condemnation proceedings, wherein fixtures on land were not separately valued, cannot sue for conversion and use of the fixtures, after final judgment of condemnation, on condemnor's refusal to deliver them on demand, as such action would be equivalent to collateral attack on judgment, in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 1908.

3. Eminent domain 🔑200—Burden on condemnee to show value of property.

In condemnation suit, burden is on defendant to show value of property.

4. Eminent domain 🔑205—Agreement that condemnee might remove and retain fixtures held not shown.

That court, in condemnation proceedings, did not separately value fixtures on land, because not requested to do so, shows no agreement between condemnor and condemnee that fixtures might be removed.

5. Eminent domain 🔑243(3)—Condemnee, failing to have fixtures separately valued, waives right to recover therefor.

Condemnee, failing to have fixtures sepaately valued in condemnation proceedings, waives right thereto.

6. Trover and conversion 🔑16—Plaintiff's title held not to support recovery.

Nonsuit, in action against condemnor for conversion and use of conveyor on land condemned, held not error as to part of conveyor on land not included in condemnation suit, in absence of evidence that plaintiff ever had title to or possession of such land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by the Richmond Wharf & Dock Company against the Blake Bros. Company. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, for appellant.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland, for respondent.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal taken by the plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit entered in favor of the defendant, and the appeal is before us upon a bill of exceptions. The material facts are as follows: The action is brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the value of certain alleged personal property claimed to have been converted by the defendant to its own use, and also for compensation for the use of said property by the defendant. The personal property claimed to have been converted by the defendant is a certain conveyor described in the complaint as—

> "that certain personal property commonly known and described as a conveyor, together with all belts, rollers, pulleys, appliances and personal property of every kind and description used in connection with said conveyor, which said conveyor and property then and there during all of said times herein mentioned was situated upon that certain wharf and approach to said wharf hereinafter described, and which conveyor at all times herein mentioned ran from the outer end of said wharf across the said wharf and across the approach to said wharf to the upland adjacent to the land end of the approach to said wharf. The said wharf and approach to said wharf above referred to during all the times herein named was situated upon tide lot No. 16, section 16, Tp. 1 N., R. 5 W., M. D. B. & M., which said tide lot is situate in the county of Contra Costa, state of California."

It is alleged that on August 3, 1906, one A. S. McDonald made a contract with Anson S. Blake, in which contract McDonald granted to Blake the possession of certain land for five years next ensuing, upon consideration that Blake fill the same within said five years, the land being submerged land and lying in the bay of San Francisco next to the shores of the city of Richmond, and also granted in the same contract to the San Pablo Quarry Company, a corporation, and of which Blake was president and practically the sole owner, the right to construct a wharf over said land. Blake was to have a one-half interest in the land if he filled it. The San Pablo Quarry Company constructed a wharf during the latter part of 1906 and the early part of 1907, over the demised land and beyond out to deep water, and installed a quarry and rock-crushing plant on the upland belonging to itself at the land end of the wharf, and constructed and installed from the quarry and the rock-crushing plant so situated on the upland, over the said wharf out to its outer end a belt conveyor, for the purpose of conveying from the rock-crushing plant to lighters, barges, and vessels lying at the outer edge of the wharf, the crushed product of said quarry. It was also provided in said contract that the San Pablo Quarry Company might sublet the wharf with the consent of all parties to the contract; but, in the event of said subletting, one-half of the rent was to be paid to McDonald, the owner of the land. The San Pablo Quarry Company, after constructing the wharf and opening the quarry and constructing the rock-crushing plant and the said conveyor, did sublet in November, 1908, all of said properties to the San Francisco Quarries Company, becoming bound thereby to pay McDonald one-half of the rentals. Blake did not comply with his contract and did not fill the land. These matters are referred to and set forth in the cases of Richmond Wharf & Dock Company v. Blake, 181 Cal. 454, 185 Pac. 184, and Richmond Wharf & Dock Company v. Blake et al., 39 Cal. App. 5, 185 Pac. 186.

The plaintiff, appellant herein, claims that in these cases it was held that the San Pablo Quarry Company was the tenant of McDonald during the five years from August 3, 1906, to August 2, 1911, and that upon the expiration of said contract the said San Pablo Quarry Company and its subtenant, San Francisco Quarries Company, were unlawfully holding over. The said actions last above referred to were brought to recover for the use and occupation of the wharf for the period beginning with the expiration of said contract, to wit: August 2, 1911, and ending with the condemnation of the wharf by the Castro Point Railway & Terminal Company on July 23, 1913, hereinafter more particularly referred to.

On or about the 23d day of July, 1913, the Castro Point Railway & Terminal Company, a corporation, obtained in the superior court of the county of Contra Costa a judgment of condemnation of a portion of the land included within the contract between McDonald and Blake above referred to, and under which contract, as before stated, the San Pablo Quarry Company built and was in possession of the wharf in question and upon which is situated the conveyor in question, and the said judgment of condemnation included that portion of said land upon which stood a portion of the wharf containing a portion of the conveyor, lying between the lands of the San Pablo Quarry Company and the outer land of McDonald. After the entry of the final judgment of condemnation on August 19, 1913, and the acquisition of the right of possession of the property condemned, the railroad corporation made no alteration in the use of said property. Up to the present time the said wharf, land, quarry, conveyor, and equipment are being operated in the same manner as they were on August 3, 1911, the date of the expiration of said contract.

The San Pablo Quarry Company, by its subtenant, San Francisco Quarries Company, continued in the possession of the premises and conveyor in question until about April, 1914, at which time the San Pablo Quarry Company sold and transferred to the Blake Bros. Company, a corporation, the defendant in the instant case, the said quarry and rock-crushing plant and everything connected therewith, and since that time the defendant corporation possessed and operated all of said property, including said conveyor.

Plaintiff in the present case offered in evidence and there was received an assignment from McDonald and others claiming or possibly having some interests or rights in said property which said assignment purported to transfer the title of said conveyor, including all moneys due for its use before the commencement of the present action. The defendant corporation, Blake Bros. Company, and the San Pablo Quarry Company and the San Francisco Quarries Company, after the entry of the condemnation judgment aforesaid, continued to use the property in question. Plaintiff, appellant herein, made demand upon defendant, the San Pablo Quarry

Company, and the San Francisco Quarries Company, for the delivery of the possession of the property in question, which demand was made on or about the 21st day of August, 1916, which demand was refused, and the defendant continued to use the property and was in possession thereof at the commencement of this action.

The foregoing is a detailed statement of the facts of the case, and although the statement is somewhat long and the facts of the case involved and difficult to keep clearly in mind, it is necessary to state them.

The plaintiff, appellant herein, alleges that the reasonable market value of the conveyor and its equipment at the time the demand was made for its possession was the sum of $7,000, but the proof of its value was the sum of $4,000. In a second cause of action in the same complaint the plaintiff alleges that the reasonable market value of the use made by the defendant of the conveyor and equipment from November 1, 1913, to August 21, 1916, was the sum of $200 per month, but the proof was the sum of $15 per month.

The plaintiff contends that the conveyor which is the subject-matter of the suit was a trade fixture placed upon the premises leased by the tenant during the lease, and that, since the tenant did not remove the trade fixture at the termination of the lease, the title thereto passed to the landlord. Appellant contends that the cases of Richmond Wharf & Dock Company v. Blake et al., 181 Cal. 454, 185 Pac. 184, and 39 Cal. App. 5, 185 Pac. 186, supra, hold that the San Pablo Quarry Company was a tenant of A. S. McDonald and his successors in interest from the construction of the wharf referred to in 1906 to August 2, 1911, on which date the lease expired, and that the San Pablo Quarry Company thereafter held over through its subtenant, the San Francisco Quarries Company; that, as the lessee did not during the pendency of the lease remove the trade fixtures, the title to said trade fixtures passed to the assignors of plaintiff, appellant herein, on the 3d day of August, 1911. Earle v. Kelly, 21 Cal. App. 480, 132 Pac. 262.

The attorney for plaintiff, appellant herein, stated at the beginning of the trial of the case:

> "Our claim is going to be that this conveyor while it was constructed by Mr. Blake, or his corporation, under a lease from us, that when the lease expired he did not remove it from the land and hence became our conveyor."

Let us concede for the purposes of this decision that this is true and has been established by competent evidence; that is, let us assume that the property in question, to wit, the conveyor and equipment, passed to the assignors of plaintiff, appellant herein, by reason of the fact that the said fixtures were not removed during the term of the lease and thereby became the property of the landlord.

The record shows, however, that in 1912 Castro Point Railway & Terminal Company began an action in condemnation in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Contra Costa, to condemn a portion of the land upon which a greater portion of the fixtures in question were erected and on the 19th day of August, 1913, a final order of condemnation was entered. This case was appealed to the Supreme Court (33 Cal. App. 418, 165 Pac. 544), the remittitur having been handed down on April 16, 1917.

The plaintiff, appellant herein, argues that until the 19th day of August, 1913, the date of the entry of the final judgment in condemnation, above referred to, and until the said condemnation judgment became final by the handing down of the remittitur on April 16, 1917, that the title to these trade fixtures was in plaintiff's assignors and plaintiff, and the possession was and continued to be in the San Pablo Quarry Company and its subtenant, the San Francisco Quarries Company.

The plaintiff, appellant herein, made proof that on April 1, 1914, it made demand for the possession of the trade fixtures in question, the trade fixtures at that time being in the possession of defendant, and the defendant having refused to give possession to plaintiff (in whom it is alleged the title then vested) and claims that such action amounted to a conversion of the property in question and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to damages for the conversion of the property and for the use thereof.

[1] The claim of the plaintiff, appellant herein, that the fixtures in question became the property of the plaintiff's assignors and plaintiff, for the reason that the said fixtures were not removed from the leased premises during the term of the lease, is, in legal effect, an admission that this property became a part of the realty. Nevertheless, the plaintiff, appellant herein, in the court below, prays for damages for the conversion of these fixtures upon the theory that such fixtures are personal property.

[2] The court below, taking the position that the action could not be maintained upon this theory upon the evidence introduced, the plaintiff then introduced in evidence all the proceedings in the condemnation suit above referred to, and in its closing brief the appellant makes this statement:

> "In the case before the court, the sole question is whether or not in a condemnation action the condemnor and condemnee can verbally agree; that fixtures upon the land are not to be included in the condemnation action."

This is not an accurate statement of the sole question involved. The real question for decision, according to the record before us, may be stated thus: A final judgment of condemnation of land having been entered, upon which there are fixtures and in which condemnation proceedings the court fixed the value of the land without separately valuing the fixtures, and a party defendant in such a condemnation action appeared and answered, can such party defendant in a future action maintain an action for the conversion of such fixtures and the use thereof, where the condemnor refused to deliver the fixtures upon demand? We are satisfied that such an action cannot be maintained; it would be equivalent to a collateral attack upon a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and upon fundamental principles is not permissible. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908; 20 C. J. p. 1182; Harrelson v. Oro Grande, etc., 23 Cal. App. 479, 138 Pac. 932.

In the case of Castro Point Railway & Terminal Company v. Anglo Pacific Development Company et al., it must not be forgotten that the Richmond Wharf & Dock Company, the plaintiff in the instant case, appeared as a party defendant and filed a supplemental answer, and in said answer set up that the land sought to be condemned was of the reasonable value of $150,000, and that the damages which will accrue by reason of its severance from the portion sought to be condemned would amount to the sum of $50,000. At that trial the Richmond Wharf & Dock Company, appellant herein, was represented by counsel, and no effort was made by it to have the fixtures in question separately valued.

In the instant case the plaintiff put in evidence the transcript on appeal in the case of the Castro Point Railway & Terminal Company v. Anglo Pacific Development Company et al.; no point was made in that case or on appeal that the court did not separately value the fixtures or improvements. See Castro Point Railway & Terminal Co. v. Anglo Pacific Development Co., 33 Cal. App. 418, 165 Pac. 544.

[3] It is well settled that in an action of condemnation the burden is upon the defendant, the condemnee, to show the value of the property condemned. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 357, note 10, and cases cited; Kerr's Cyc. Code Civ. Proc. 1920, § 1248, note 20, and cases cited; Harrelson v. Oro Grande Lime, etc., Co., 23 Cal. App. 479, 138 Pac. 932.

[4] Conceding that in a condemnation proceeding the condemnor and the condemnee may agree or stipulate that improvements or fixtures situated upon the land sought to be condemned need not be included in the condemnation judgment, and that the condemnee may remove and retain such fixtures and improvements, yet the evidence introduced, or offered, failed to show any such agreement. At most, the evidence offered by the appellant, taken in its broadest sense, even if it had been admitted, would have amounted to no more than a showing that the court did not separately value such fixtures, evidently because it was not requested to do so. Such evidence, if received and admitted in the court below, giving to counsel for appellant the most liberal construction in his favor that the language of counsel in his offer of proof is capable, amounts to no more than a showing that in the condemnation proceeding the record is silent upon the question of valuation of the fixtures in question.

[5] We have seen, as hereinbefore stated, that the burden is upon the condemnee to show the value of all the interests in the land condemned, and it follows that, if the condemnee fails to have the fixtures separately valued in the condemnation proceedings, the question is held to have been waived. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 376; German Savings & Loan Society v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 127, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18.

The true rule, we think, is well stated in Lewis on Eminent Domain, vol. 2, § 831, as follows:

> "If the commissioners or jury make a mistake in the assessment of damages, by omitting an item of damages which ought to have been allowed, by proceeding upon erroneous principles, or otherwise, the remedy must be sought in the proceedings themselves. Such mistake cannot be made the basis of an independent suit." (Italics ours.)

[6] There is one other point to be considered, and that is that the proof shows that a part of the conveyor is situated upon land not included in the condemnation suit and that as to such part of the conveyor so situated it was error to grant the nonsuit.

The appellant alleges that the conveyor is situated upon a wharf located upon tide land lot No. 16. The evidence shows that appellant acquired said lot No. 16 through sundry mesne conveyances, and there is no evidence that appellant at any time was the owner of the land outside and beyond said tide land lot No. 16, upon which the said portion of said conveyor is situated. The evidence fails to show that appellant at any time had title to or possession of that part or portion of the conveyor outside and beyond said tide land lot No. 16.

It follows for the reasons given that the court did not err in granting a nonsuit, and therefore it is ordered that the judgment be and the same is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRAHLE. (Cr. 1030.)

1. Receiving stolen goods 🔑7(6)—Failure to prove corporate existence of injured party in prosecution for receiving stolen goods held immaterial.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, failure to prove corporate existence of company from whom property was taken was immaterial, where it was not a factor in description either of property stolen or in persons by whom it was stolen.

2. Receiving stolen goods 🔑7(6)—Designation of thieves by fictitious names in prosecution for receiving stolen goods, when evidence showed real names, held not a fatal variance.

That an information in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods designated the thieves by fictitious names, when evidence showed their real names, was not a fatal variance between allegations and proof.

3. Receiving stolen goods 🔑7(3)—Information designating thieves by fictitious names held sufficient.

An information in prosecution for receiving stolen goods which designated thieves by fictitious names was sufficient, under Pen. Code, § 950.

4. Indictment and information 🔑176—Whether larceny committed on particular day held immaterial, if falling within statute of limitations.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods in which the date of larceny was alleged to have been on or about a certain day, whether it was committed on a particular day was immaterial, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 955, 956, if such date fell within the statute of limitations for the prosecution of offense and stolen property was shown to have been within possession of injured party at time larceny occurred.

5. Receiving stolen goods 🔑8(3)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, evidence held to warrant a conclusion that defendant received the property with guilty knowledge that it had been stolen, and that his subsequent acts showed that he intended to prevent owner from again possessing his property.

6. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of evidence of defendant's participation in sale of other property in prosecution for receiving stolen goods held not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, admission of evidence, for purpose of corroborating a witness who had testified regarding defendant's participation in the transaction, of a sale of other property made by defendant some time later which was not shown to be illegitimate, while immaterial, did not constitute prejudicial error.

7. Criminal law 🔑696(3)—That evidence conflicted with other evidence held no ground for striking out.

Court did not err in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods in refusing to strike out evidence introduced by prosecution for purpose of tracing stolen property, merely because it conflicted with other evidence.

8. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of defendant's instruction, substantially covered by given instructions, held not erroneous.

Refusal of defendant's instructions, which were substantially covered by court's given instructions, did not constitute error.

9. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Refusal of defendant's instruction on reasonable doubt held not reversible error.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, refusal of defendant's instruction on reasonable doubt, while proper to be given, did not constitute reversible error.

10. Criminal law 🔑1172(6)—Instruction that person presumed to intend natural and probable consequences of his own acts, while possibly inapplicable, held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, giving of an instruction that a person is presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own acts, while possibly inapplicable, was not prejudicial.

11. Criminal law 🔑823(4)—Instruction that it was immaterial when offense was committed if within statute of limitations held not misleading, in view of other instruction.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, an instruction that it was immaterial on what day or night offense was committed, if within three years prior to filing of information, was not misleading, in view of other instruction that if jury found that property had been stolen it was immaterial by whom theft was committed.

12. Criminal law 🔑1172(6)—Instruction on buyer's duty in purchasing goods at reduced rates, while inapplicable, held not reversible error.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, an instruction on buyer's duty in purchasing goods at reduced rates, while inapplicable under the evidence, did not constitute reversible error.

H. J. Grahle was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Halverson & Price, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of receiving stolen property and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The information under which defendant was prosecuted charged:

"That one John Doe and one Richard Roe, on or about the 13th day of November, 1922, * * * did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take, and carry away ten cartons of cigarettes of the value of $600, * * * and of the personal property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, a corporation; that thereafter, to wit, on or about the 14th day of November, 1922, * * * the said H. J. Grahle did willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously * * * buy and receive from the said John Doe and Richard Roe the aforesaid ten cartons of cigarettes, * * * he, the said H. J. Grahle, then and there well knowing the same to have been stolen, as aforesaid."

The evidence showed that certain persons named Bird, Monahan, and Ketchum, who were switchmen working for the Pacific Electric Railway Company, broke into a box car at about midnight on the night of the 12th or the morning of the 13th of November, 1922, and stole the cigarettes therefrom, which they placed in an empty box car and later removed to Bird's home, in the town of Watts, on the early morning of November 13, 1922. It also appears that on the night following some of the cigarettes were taken to the home occupied by defendant and one of the said switchmen, and thereafter defendant materially assisted in attempting to conceal the identifying marks on the packages containing the cigarettes, and later made the necessary arrangements for their sale.

[1] It is first contended that because of the allegation that the cigarettes were the property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, a corporation, it became necessary to prove that that organization was a corporation, which it is asserted the prosecution failed to do. The corporate existence of the Pacific Electric Railway Company was not a factor in the description either of the property alleged to have been stolen or in the persons by whom it was stolen. Defendant could not have been misled by such allegation, nor injured by reason of the failure of the prosecution to prove whether or not the Pacific Electric Railway Company was a corporation. That particular fact was wholly immaterial, and could neither aid nor hinder either the prosecution or the defense in any way. In such circumstances the failure to prove its status was of no consequence, and prejudicial error cannot be thereon predicated. People v. Goggins, 80 Cal. 229, 22 Pac. 206.

[2] Appellant next complains that because it is alleged in the information that one John Doe and one Richard Roe stole the cigarettes, and that the evidence showed that the offense was committed by persons named Bird, Monahan, and Ketchum, there is a fatal variance between the allegation and the proof. The gist of the offense of receiving stolen property is the receipt thereof by defendant with guilty knowledge of the fact, coupled with the intent of depriving the owner thereof of its possession. It is a general rule, supported by many authorities, that the information need not set forth either the name of the person from whom the goods were received by the defendant or the name of the person who committed the original theft. There are, however, some authorities which hold, in effect, that where the principal felon is named in the information or the indictment, and the evidence shows that the crime was committed by some other person, the variance is fatal. United States v. De Bare, 6 Biss. 358, Fed. Cas. No. 14,935; Huggins v. People, 135 Ill. 243, 25 N. E. 1002, 25 Am. St. Rep. 357; Commonwealth v. King, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 284.

[3] All that is required of an information regarding the matter to which attention is directed is that it contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Pen. Code, § 950. The names John Doe and Richard Roe are so commonly, if not universally, used in English-speaking countries for the purpose of designating fictitious or unknown persons that any person of "common understanding" knows what is intended when such names are used in an indictment or in an information without any explanation regarding same. As applied to defendant, personally, there is nothing in the evidence which would indicate that he was not a person of at least "common understanding"; on the contrary, judging from the testimony given by him and the experience which he had had in his various occupations, including that of a policeman in the city of Los Angeles, it would be only fair to accord him a rating of intelligence and understanding rather above that possessed by the average person, and he must be presumed to have understood from the language of the information that certain persons whose names were unknown to the district attorney were by him alleged to have committed the larceny of the cigarettes, and that it was from such unknown persons that defendant received them. The purpose of the rule requiring that the allegation correspond with the proof regarding the name of the thief is that the defendant may be protected as against a subsequent prosecution for the same offense; but where, as here, the transaction of which complaint is made is clearly identified, the rights of a defendant may be as thoroughly and as completely protected as though the correct name of the thief had been accurately set forth in the information. In the instant case the evidence on the part of defendant, as well as that on the part of the prosecution, leaves no room for doubt regarding the subject-matter and the various parties connected therewith. It is manifest that a subsequent prosecution against this defendant could not be successfully predicated upon the facts of the case. There can be not the slightest danger to defendant, either immediate or remote, from such a source; and there exists basis for the application of the rule that when the reason for the rule ceases so does the rule itself cease.

[4] There seems to have been some confusion in the evidence regarding the precise date upon which the cigarettes were stolen, from which fact defendant seeks to take advantage of an opportunity to argue that if the cigarettes were stolen on a given date they could not have been the property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company. The evidence tends to show that the cigarettes were being shipped on a railway car of the Southern Pacific Railway Company and that it was necessary that they be transferred from the possession of the Southern Pacific Railway Company to that of the Pacific Electric Railway Company. If the testimony of some of the witnesses is to be given full credence, at the time the cigarettes are alleged to have been stolen from the Pacific Electric Railway Company the cigarettes had not been delivered to that company. On the other hand, one witness for the prosecution testified that he and two other men stole the cigarettes from a car belonging to and being operated by the Pacific Electric Railway Company, and identified the cigarettes as being those which defendant was charged with feloniously receiving. The date of the larceny having been alleged as having occurred on or about a certain day, the question of whether the larceny was committed on a particular day is immaterial, so long as the date falls within the statute of limitations for the prosecution of the offense and the cigarettes are shown to have been within the possession of the Pacific Electric Railway Company at the time the larceny occurred. Pen. Code, § 955. As to the latter point, section 956 of the Penal Code provides:

> "When an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material."

There are many cases in this state bearing upon the effect of the foregoing statute, a number of which, together with several from other jurisdictions, are considered in the case of People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 105, 75 Pac. 676. The conclusion there reached is that, where the act charged is otherwise identified, an erroneous allegation of ownership or possession of the subject-matter of the larceny is immaterial; from all of which it follows that appellant's contention in this regard cannot be sustained.

[5] Counsel for appellant also complains that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The testimony of one of the men who participated in the larceny was, in substance, that soon after the cigarettes had been stolen they were taken to the house where defendant lived; that defendant was present when witness attempted to obliterate from the cover of the cartons the name of the consignee of the goods, and that defendant wrote the name of "Turner" on each of the cartons which contained the cigarettes; that defendant arranged for the sale of part of the cigarettes and directed the witness to where he could get a transfer man to deliver them to the prospective purchaser; that defendant assisted in loading the cigarettes into the truck on which they were to be transported, and, after the cigarettes were delivered to the purchaser thereof and payment received therefor (which was slightly less than the market value), defendant received a part of the purchase price. From a consideration of such evidence the jury was warranted in reaching the conclusion that defendant received the property with guilty knowledge that it had been stolen, and that his subsequent acts showed that he intended to prevent the owner from again possessing his property.

[6] The evidence shows that the transaction regarding the sale of the cigarettes was carried on under the name of "Turner," which was the name which had been written by defendant on the cover of the cartons. For the avowed purpose of corroborating a witness who had testified regarding defendant's participation in the transaction, and particularly as to the use by defendant of the name "Turner," evidence was introduced to the effect that three or four weeks after the sale of the cigarettes was made in the first transaction defendant made a subsequent sale of other "cigarettes and tobacco" apparently for a man named Turner, and for which merchandise defendant was paid the sum of $560 by means of a check, and which check was filed as an exhibit in the case. It was not an attempt to show the commission by defendant of a similar offense; neither was any claim made, nor was any evidence offered which tended to show, that the sale was not legitimate in all respects. Conceding that the evidence of this subsequent transaction was immaterial and should have been rejected, we are unable to perceive any prejudicial error in its admission.

[7] No error was committed by the judge of the trial court in refusing to strike out certain evidence introduced by the prosecution for the purpose of tracing the movements of the cigarettes and the car in which they were being transported. The assumption by defendant that such testimony was in conflict with other evidence is no good reason why it should be taken from the consideration of the jury.

Defendant's request that the court peremptorily instruct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty was properly refused. The evidence as heretofore outlined was sufficient in weight and character to warrant the court in submitting it to the jury for the purpose of having it determine the guilt or the innocence of the accused.

[8, 9] Defendant urges that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury, at defendant's request, certain other instructions. The first of these, to the effect that the jury could find defendant guilty only of the particular offense of which he was charged, was fully and fairly covered by another instruction which was given to the jury. Certain other instructions which related to the presumption of defendant's innocence, to the necessity of proving his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, to the unlawfulness of convicting defendant on mere suspicion or speculation, or because the evidence preponderated in favor of his guilt, all of which were offered by defendant and by the court refused, were likewise substantially covered by the court in other instructions given to the jury. One of defendant's refused instructions was:

> "That if, after consideration of the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the duty of such juror so entertaining such doubt not to vote for a verdict of guilty, nor to be influenced in so voting, for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of guilty."

In the cases of People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 76 Pac. 1116, and People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 Pac. 829, it is held that such an instruction is proper and should be given. However, the refusal to give such an instruction does not constitute such error as will for that reason alone justify the reversal of the case. People v. Singh, 20 Cal. App. 146, 128 Pac. 420; People v. Fisher, 16 Cal. App. 276, 116 Pac. 688; People v. Loomer, 13 Cal. App. 654, 110 Pac. 466; People v. Svendsen, 25 Cal. App. 1, 142 Pac. 861; People v. Walton, 53 Cal. App. 35, 199 Pac. 824; People v. McNabb (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 1031.

[10] Appellant challenges the giving by the court to the jury of several different instructions. The first of these is:

> "A person must be presumed to intend to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own acts."

That the giving of such an instruction is not error is held in the case of People v. Webster, 13 Cal. App. 348, 109 Pac. 637. That was a murder case, and the instruction was clearly applicable. In the instant case there might be some question regarding the applicability of the instruction to the evidence. But, in any event, we are unable to discover any prejudicial effect, however slight, which resulted to defendant from the giving of the instruction.

[11] The next instruction of which complaint is made by appellant is to the effect that it was immaterial on what day or what night the offense charged in the information was committed, provided that it was committed within three years prior to the filing of the information. It is admitted by appellant that the instruction correctly stated the law, but it is objected that it was misleading and confusing to the jury, in that the jury was elsewhere instructed that if it found that the cigarettes had been stolen it was immaterial by whom such theft was committed. The question of the sufficiency of the allegation concerning the names of the persons who committed the theft has already received attention herein. As heretofore set forth, there is authority for holding that, where the information in a case of this character contains a specific allegation that the goods were stolen by a certain designated person, any material departure in the proof as to the name of that person will constitute such a variance as to entitle the defendant to an acquittal. But in view of the fact that defendant here was, in effect, advised by the information that the theft of the cigarettes was committed by unknown persons, the instruction was unobjectionable. Nor are we able to discover how the giving of the instruction as to the immateriality of the time when the offense was committed could have misled or confused the jury in any manner.

[12] Another criticized instruction given by the court to the jury contained the statement that—

> "He [defendant] is required to use the circumspection usual with persons taking goods by private purchase, and this is eminently the case with dealers buying at greatly depreciated rates."

Standing by itself, that part of the instruction which has been quoted bore no relation to the evidence in the case. It was not claimed that defendant personally purchased the cigarettes in the sense that he ever bought them from the persons who stole them. Defendant's connection with the transaction consisted in receiving the stolen property after the larceny had been committed and in assisting in the sale of the stolen property to another person. Besides, it was not shown that the cigarettes were sold at such a reduction from their market value as would justify the intimation that they had been sold "at greatly depreciated rates." While it would appear that the language of the instruction to which reference has been made was unwarranted from the facts in the case, the error was not of that grave importance which would justify this court in ordering a reversal by reason thereof. It would seem extremely unlikely that the particular matter to which attention has been directed could greatly or at all have influenced the jury in the way of finding a verdict of guilty, or that without such instruction a verdict of acquittal would have been rendered.

After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, this court is of the opinion that the errors to which appellant has directed attention have not resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

DEVLIN (MAGUIRE et al. Substituted) v. POWELL et al. (Civ. 2728.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1924. Rehearing Denied June 6, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1924.)

1. Adverse possession 🔑117—General verdict held not affected by special verdict as to adverse possession.

   Where jury, in answer to question whether plaintiffs acquired title by adverse possession, stated, "No; the description in the Hooker deed covers the entire tract in dispute," question of title by adverse possession was not eliminated from case, and answer did not affect general verdict for plaintiff.

2. Deeds 🔑100—Referring to natural objects construed as of date of execution.

   A deed referring to natural objects must be interpreted, and intention arrived at according to circumstances and conditions existing upon date of execution, unless there is something in instrument manifesting a contrary intent.

3. Deeds 🔑100—Rule as to construction of ambiguous deeds.

   Where description in deed is in any wise ambiguous, courts will resort not only to character and condition of subject-matter to ascertain intention of parties, but will interpret deed in light of surrounding circumstances.

4. Boundaries 🔑3(3)—Courses, distances, lines, and angles give way to natural objects.

   One cardinal rule of construction is that, where natural objects or monuments are referred to, courses, distances, lines, and angles must give way if there is any conflict or ambiguity, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2077.

5. Boundaries 🔑3(3)—Bank of stream prevails over courses and distances.

   Where boundary is designated to be bank of river or stream, and courses and distances are also given, latter yield to actual line of stream.

6. Adverse possession 🔑100(1)—Party entering in good faith under color of title deemed to have possession of whole tract within boundaries of deed.

   Under Code Civ. Proc. § 322, where a party enters in good faith upon tract of land under color of title, under deed purporting to convey tract with specific boundaries, no person being in adverse possession at time, and takes and holds actual possession of part, claiming title and possession of whole tract, he is deemed to have possession of whole tract within boundaries of deed.

7. Adverse possession 🔑114(2)—Evidence held sufficient to show possession up to line claimed.

   Evidence held sufficient to show adverse possession up to boundary claimed, under Code Civ. Proc. § 323.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Wm. H. Devlin, executor of the last will and testament of John Mackey, deceased, Mary J. Maguire and another, substituted plaintiffs, against Robert Powell and others. From an adverse judgment, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McLaughlin, C. P. McLaughlin, and Charles B. Harris, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

Martin I. Welsh, Wm. Rigby, and Robert H. Schwab, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiffs had judgment in an action to recover 28.153 acres of land in the county of Sacramento, state of California. From this judgment the defendant Powell appeals.

The complaint in this action describes certain land situated in the county of Sacramento, and claimed to belong to the plaintiffs, as follows, to wit:

"Beginning at a point where the northerly boundary line of the city of Sacramento, in said county and state, is intersected by the center line of Twenty-Fifth street of said city, if extended northerly, and running thence north 18° 57′ east a distance of 1,410 feet, more or less, to the south bank of the American river as the same now exists, running thence along the said south bank of said river north 50° 56′ west 462.528 feet, thence north 62° 32′ west 190.872 feet; thence north 52° 43′ west 173.25 feet, more or less, to a point on the south bank of said American river as the same now exists where said south bank is intersected by the center line of Twenty-Third street in said city if extended northerly to said south bank of said river; thence in a southerly direction along the said extension of the center line of Twenty-Third street to the north boundary line of said city of Sacramento, thence easterly along the said north boundary line to the point of beginning."

The foregoing premises are claimed by the plaintiffs by adverse possession founded upon color of title under a deed dated April 23, 1894, executed by Elizabeth H. Hooker, James H. Hooker, and Amy May Hooker, and delivered to John Mackey (predecessor in interest of the plaintiffs), describing certain lands as follows:

"All that real property situated in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, bounded and described as follows:

Blocks bounded by A and B and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets, A and B and Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth streets, C and D and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets, C and D and Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth streets, D and E and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets, D and E and Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth streets. Also block 1 bounded by A street and the American river and Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth streets, block 2 bounded by A street and American street and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets, block 29 bounded by American street and American river and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets."

The cause was tried before a jury, and a general and special verdicts returned. The general verdict reads as follows:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find a verdict for the plaintiff for the recovery of the possession of the premises described in the complaint, and for the sum of no dollars damages for the withholding thereof by said defendants from the said plaintiff."

As to the special verdicts, we need give attention only to question No. 4 and the answer of the jury thereto. The question propounded to the jury and known as No. 4 reads:

> "Did the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest acquire title by adverse possession to any land not described in the deeds from Elizabeth Hooker and others to John Mackey, introduced in evidence as Plaintiff's Exhibit 1? If so, describe the land so acquired."

The jury answered as follows:

> "No; the description in the Hooker deed covers the entire tract in dispute."

[1] Basing his argument upon the answer of the jury to the special interrogatory No. 4, it is urgently insisted by the appellant that title by adverse possession is entirely eliminated from this case. We do not so read the verdict of the jury. It is apparent that the jury by its general verdict intended to find that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover all the lands described in the complaint, and that the Hooker deed, though differing in the words used describing the lands conveyed, was in truth and in fact an instrument covering the same tract of land described by different language in the complaint. In other words, if all the elements necessary to constitute adverse possession, under color of title or otherwise, appear from the testimony sufficient to give title to the premises described in the plaintiffs' complaint, then the general verdict is not affected by the answer of the jury to the special interrogatory No. 4, unless the Hooker deed by force of its terms limits or circumscribes the conveyance to a lesser tract of land. Thus, if the Hooker deed and the description set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint refer to the same tract of land, the finding of the jury cannot be held adverse to any claims made by the plaintiffs or to any title upon which they base their claims by reason of the fact that the jury by its general verdict found the plaintiffs entitled to recover the entire tract mentioned in their complaint.

The jury, by its general verdict, has found that the Hookers intended to convey, and that the plaintiffs took possession of, became the owners of, and are the owners of the entire tract of land for the recovery of which this action was prosecuted.

[2] The Hooker deed was executed and delivered on the 23d day of April, A. D. 1894, speaks as of that date, refers to natural objects as of that date, and the interpretation to be given thereto and the intent and meaning of the conveyance must be based upon the circumstances and conditions as they existed upon that date, unless there is something in the instrument manifesting a contrary intent.

The controversy as to what the Hooker deed means or as to what is conveyed thereby arises from the fact that some time between the years 1862 and 1868 the American river channel was shifted slightly by natural means, but principally by artificial agencies, a little distance north of where it existed about the year 1850. From 1868 at least down to the time of the execution of the deed relied upon by the plaintiffs as giving color of title the American river flowed in the channel identical with the channel as it existed on April 23, 1894. The appellant claims title originating in a Spanish grant and culminating in a United States patent for some 44,000 acres of land known as the Rancho Del Paso. The boundaries of this grant carried the southerly line thereof to the channel occupied by the American river in 1850. Thus, while the complaint in this action describes a tract of land including something over 28 acres, the controversy in fact relates only to 7.05 acres lying between the site of the old channel of the American river as it existed at the time of the grant, and its present location, as definitely fixed in 1868.

For some 26 years prior to the execution of the Hooker deed, the American river to all intents and purposes in its present location constituted a natural object as fully and completely as though its course had been entirely created by its own action and not partially by artificial means. The conditions of the entire tract described in the plaintiffs' complaint, including the course of the river, were, at the time of the trial, the same as they had existed for some 50 years; hence, the testimony as to the course of the river and its changed location depended upon the testimony of the witnesses who were very young at that period of time, and necessarily had but a hazy recollection of the occurrences taking place between 1862 and 1868.

[3] It is a rule of construction that, where the description in the deed is in any wise ambiguous, courts will resort not only to the character and condition of the subject-matter to ascertain the intention of the parties, but will interpret the deed in the light of the surrounding circumstances.

> "The court will place itself, as nearly as possible, in the position of the parties, and ascertain their intent in the same manner as in the case of any contract. And in this connection all the facts and circumstances by which the parties and the subject-matter were surrounded are relevant and pertinent." 4 Cal. Jur. 374.

The Hooker deed was executed and delivered in 1894; hence the condition of the premises in controversy, all the circumstances, including natural boundaries, if any, referred to in the instrument, will be taken into consideration in determining the extent of the premises included within the calls of the deed being interpreted.

[4, 5] It is one of the cardinal rules of construction that, where natural objects or monuments are referred to, courses, distances, lines, and angles must give way, if there is any conflict or ambiguity, and the natural objects or monuments will prevail. Section 2077, Code Civ. Proc.; Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 322, 165 Pac. 935; 9 C. J. 314; 4 Id. 401.

> "Where the boundary is designated to be the bank of a river or stream, and courses and distances are also given, the courses and distances yield to the actual line of the stream; for a boundary will be determined by reference to a natural monument, if that can be found." 4 Cal. Jur. 402.

It is also a rule of construction that, unless there is something in the instrument to the contrary, a deed of conveyance referring to natural objects and boundaries speaks as of the date of its execution. As applied to this case, the instrument being considered speaks as of April, 1894. There is no reference in the instrument as to the American river channel as it existed or as it is claimed to have existed in 1850. The reference to the American river is as of the date set forth in the deed and of no other time. As between grantor and grantee, the terms of the deed call for the American river as the northern boundary of the tract conveyed as it existed when the deed was executed, unless the instrument by its terms limits the northern boundary to a less distant line. The calls in the deed as to the northern boundary read:

> "Also block 1 bounded by A street and the American river and Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth streets. * * * Block 29 bounded by American street and American river and Twenty-Third and Twenty-Fourth streets."

That the deed contains words of limitation and withdraws the northern boundary from the banks of the American river as the same existed in 1894 is the contention of appellants, and to support such contention the case of Oldham v. Ramsner, 149 Cal. 540, 87 Pac. 18, is relied upon. That case, however, rests upon the tax title executed by the tax collector of the city of Stockton. The land in controversy was described as lying within the city of Stockton, to wit, lots 9 and 10, block C, McCloud addition. There were no such lots. There was a McCloud addition outside of the city, and it is claimed that the description should be interpreted to mean "without" instead of "within." It was held that no such interpretation could be given. Being a tax title, it could not be corrected or interpreted to read to include land other than that expressly described, and upon which the tax had been levied. It was not a question between grantor and grantee as to what was intended to be conveyed and what lands were really intended to be included by the description given, but rested upon the technical accuracy of the proceedings leading up to the sale of the property for delinquent taxes and the deed executed in pursuance thereof. The opinion in that case further states what would have been considered if the circumstances were as they are here, that is, the intention of the parties and the lands and premises which the grantor purposed to convey and the grantee to purchase.

[6] This leads us to the real point in issue in the instant case—possession under color of title. In the first place:

> "Section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure deals with the constructive adverse possession of land where the possession is taken under color of title. The general rule under this section, as declared by the cases, is that, where a party enters in good faith upon a tract of land with color of title, under a deed purporting to convey the tract with specific boundaries, no person being in the adverse possession at the time, and he takes and holds actual possession of a part, bona fide, claiming title and possession of the whole tract described in the deed, he is deemed to have possession of the whole tract within the boundaries of the deed." 1 Cal. Jur. 580.

As to what constitutes adverse possession by any person claiming a title founded upon an instrument in writing, section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies the following requirements as being sufficient:

> "1. Where it has been usually cultivated or improved;
> "2. Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure;
> "3. Where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing timber for the purposes of husbandry, or for pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant;
> "4. Where a known farm or single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared, or not inclosed according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated."

[7] There is sufficient testimony in the transcript to sustain a verdict, if believed by the jury, of the taking of possession in good faith by the plaintiffs and their grantors of the entire tract of land described in the complaint and included within the terms of the conveyance, if that conveyance be held to extend the northern boundary to the American river as it existed at the time of the execution of the deed. It appears from the testimony that the plaintiffs and their grantor established a home upon the premises, cultivated the same, used it for pasturage, cut wood along that portion immediately adjoining the banks of the river and made use of the same as a supply for fuel, used such portion for pasturage, and generally did all those things which are usual in ordinary course of husbandry to be done and performed and which would be done and performed in the ordinary course of husbandry by any one claiming and owning the entire tract. It also appears from the transcript, notwithstanding appellant's contention to the contrary, that taxes were paid by the plaintiffs and their grantors for the requisite period of time, that the described property assessed ran to the American river, and that these taxes were paid to the county of Sacramento, state of California, for the requisite period of time. The point is made by appellant that certain of the taxes were allowed to become delinquent, but it appears from the transcript that these taxes were subsequently paid, and that redemption was had of the property while the plaintiffs and their grantors were in the undisputed possession, and therefore the rights of the plaintiffs in this particular are the same as though the taxes had not been allowed to go delinquent. In the case of Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 104 Pac. 983, the court says:

> "Where a tax on the land adversely possessed is allowed to become delinquent and a sale has taken place, and, so far as appears, a redemption has been made thereof in good faith by the adverse possessor or his successor in interest while in undisturbed possession, such redemption operates as a payment of the tax, within the terms of the statute requiring the adverse possessor to pay the taxes upon the property claimed."

As we read the general and special verdicts in this case, in the light of what has been said, we find no conflict whatever. We think the jury intended to find and did find that the plaintiffs had been in adverse possession of the entire tract described in plaintiffs' complaint; that possession was taken of the entire tract described in plaintiffs' complaint and by virtue of the terms of the Hooker deed; and, that the plaintiffs for the requisite period of time claimed under color of title and exercised dominion over and maintained and held by adverse possession of all the premises set forth in the complaint. The language of special interrogatory No. 4, to say the least, is not very happily chosen, and if the jury entertained the views on the subject of adverse possession which we have shown the testimony might support, and also that the plaintiffs and their grantors took possession of the entire tract in controversy under the Hooker deed, no other answer than that returned could very well have been made. To conclude the whole matter, we think the testimony is sufficient to support the general verdict of the jury that the plaintiffs had acquired title to the entire premises described in the complaint, and that the judgment should be affirmed irrespective of special interrogatory No. 4 and the answer thereto, whether the same be considered or laid aside as meaningless.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

CAMPBELL v. HANFORD et al. (Civ. 4601.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 7, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client 🔑166(4)—Finding that clients severed relationship by employing another attorney held supported by evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to support implied finding, in action for value of legal services, that defendants severed relationship of attorney and client between them and plaintiff's assignors by filing complaint in suit by another attorney, so that assignors were not guilty of breach of such relationship in assigning claim and directing action thereon without notice or demand for payment.

2. Attorney and client 🔑166(3) — Judgment for value of legal services rendered held sustained by evidence.

In action for value of legal services rendered by plaintiff's assignors, evidence of relationship of attorneys and client between assignors and one defendant held sufficient to sustain judgment against latter.

3. Appeal and error 🔑994(2) — Full weight given testimony in support of judgment, though contradicted.

In view of jury's implied finding in judgment against defendant denying relationship of attorney and client between him and plaintiff's assignors in suit for value of legal services, assignor's testimony as to such relationship must be given full weight, though contradicted by defendants.

4. Corporations 🔑451—Not bound to pay for services rendered in absence of contract, ratification, or estoppel.

Corporation is not bound to pay for services of benefit to it, in absence of contract, ratification, or estoppel.

5. Corporations 🔑407(2)—President and vice president not authorized to contract for legal services on behalf of corporation.

Neither president nor vice president of corporation, by virtue of such office alone has authority to contract for legal services on its behalf.

6. Principal and agent 🔑22(1)—Agent's authority cannot be established by his own declarations.

Authority of agent cannot be established by his own declarations, under Civ. Code, § 2319, subd. 2.

7. Corporations 🔑398(3)—Corporation liable for legal services rendered under contract by officers owning practically all capital stock.

Corporation practically all of whose capital stock was owned by president and vice president held liable for legal services rendered under contract made in its behalf by president and ratified by vice president, though without observance of formal requisites prescribed by charter or by-laws.

8. Appeal and error 🔑197(4)—Variance between pleading and proof in action for value of legal services held not available.

That action was on balance of account for services rendered, while proof showed no account, payments made, or balance due, held not available on appeal, in absence of objection to variance when pleading might have been amended to conform to proof, or prejudice to defendants, in view of judgment according with proof, if not technically with pleadings.

9. Appeal and error 🔑197(4)—Objection to evidence of value of lawyer's retainer held not available.

Defendants making no objection to plaintiff's hypothetical question as to value of legal services sued for, on ground that bill of particulars did not include claim for retaining fee, held precluded from urging such objection to evidence of value of retainer on appeal, as question might have been corrected or plaintiff ordered to furnish further account under Code Civ. Proc. § 454.

10. Attorney and client 🔑141—$25,000 for legal services rendered held not excessive.

Judgment for $25,000 for legal services rendered held not excessive, in view of expert testimony as to value thereof, and testimony of members of firm as to constant work of seven attorneys and their clerical assistants for over month and a half on defendants' business.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by G. W. Campbell against R. G. Hanford and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Samuel M. Shortridge, of San Francisco (A. H. Ricketts, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment for $25,000 against them in an action brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of the law firm of Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, to recover from the defendants the reasonable value of legal services alleged to have been rendered by said firm to the defendants at their request.

According to the testimony which appears in the record in support of the verdict, the defendant Hanford called at the office of the law firm of Metson, Drew & Mackenzie in San Francisco, and stated to Mr. Metson that he was representing himself and each and all of the defendants, all of whom were interested, in a greater or less degree, in the legal problems and entanglements upon which he sought advice and legal action. The amount of property involved in the various transactions from which relief was sought was something over twelve millions of dollars, and it became necessary for the law firm to examine and study a great number of documents which had resulted in the situation then existing.

Mr. Metson testified that, after Mr. Hanford had explained, in outline, the difficulties in which the affairs of the defendants were involved, Mr. Metson told him that the situation required an immense amount of work, and naturally there would have to be a large fee paid. Mr. Hanford said they were able, aside from their securities and interest in the United Properties Company, to pay handsomely, and that they could secure a reasonable fee. Mr. Metson then told him that his firm would accept the employment. This conversation continued for several hours. Mr. Hanford telephoned from the law office to the defendant Tevis as to what was being done, and later sent over certain papers concerning the transactions to be investigated by Mr. Metson. Mr. Metson testified, in part, as follows:

> "Well, it became apparent at the first interview, and I told Mr. Hanford that an examination of these papers would become necessary. From time to time I advised Mr. Hanford with reference to the situation. These papers were furnished by Mr. Hanford and were studied. And in an examination of the Public Utilities Act, for the purpose of blocking before the Railway Commission * * * we proceeded to check up on the facts so far as the documents would check them, and in every way checked up on what Mr. Hanford's facts were. * * * Then we were to advise him accordingly. He wanted action, and he wanted to be in a position to be prepared, so that if he could not get the option, or the interests which he represented could not get the option, or that Rollins and Halsay had the inside facts, and was about to get the option, then we would be prepared to jump in there and prevent it, if possible. So that meant the studying of all of these propositions and the laying out of a line of action. We were to sue on behalf of their interest, if necessary. Finally, after examinations, it became apparent to us that it was a big battle. We added to our organization and we farmed out work in the office, some looking up one problem of law and some looking up another problem of law; and we concluded that Mr. Hanford was wrong in his opinion that he could bring suit against Smith, and we so told him; that, by reason of the various contracts that had been signed by Hanford and Tevis, and their interests, a great many legal questions could come in, and which would have to be overcome on behalf of the Hanford and Tevis people. There was the question of the ratification in so far as the many signatures were concerned, following a long lapse of time, and laches in objecting and forcing Smith when he was in default originally; they had allowed it to drift along. And the various signatures made it manifest that we should pick out somebody who had not signed any contract, and who had not, at least to any material extent, cut out his legal rights. We suggested that to him, and he brought a list of the stockholders, and we talked over the stockholders' list to find out who we might know, and who might possibly be a client of ours, or who we might be able to influence. Finally we picked out Cartwright, he having been in the origin of the transaction, and he having done the least to cut away the foundation of his rights; and he was connected as a party to be the plaintiff in the litigation that we anticipated. * * * That was the foundation, and we prepared the Cartwright notice, and worked out and prepared the Cartwright complaint. We worked constantly for weeks with the proposition with our entire force and organization."

Mr. Metson testified further that numerous legal questions became involved as the examination of the documents proceeded, and that he had advised Mr. Hanford and Mr. Tevis as well upon all these matters; that all the members of the law firm gave practically their entire time to the matters involved for many weeks; that there were three other lawyers associated with the firm at that time, and a fourth was added to the organization to cope with the volume of work, and the entire force including clerks and stenographers, worked upon the business of the defendant; that Mr. Metson gave his entire time for 45 or 50 days, including most of the Sundays and evenings during that space of time; that during that period other business was given out to outside lawyers because it could not be handled in the office of Metson, Drew & Mackenize. A lengthy stockholders' complaint was prepared in the so-called Cartwright suit, after the preliminary steps had been taken and this complaint was submitted to Mr. Hanford. About this time Mr. Hanford wrote a letter to Mr. Mackenzie, which was introduced as an important element in the defense to the action, in which he assumed that all the work which had been done theretofore by the law firm had been done without expectation of compensation and he stated that, if the attorneys were willing to make their arrangements contingent upon securing a large loan in the east for the defendant Union Land Company, he was ready "to tie up to-day"; otherwise, he hoped that, if the negotiations came to nothing, he would be pardoned for having taken up so much of the time of the members of the law firm. The members of the firm testified that they did not understand this communication; that they considered it a self-serving declaration, and an attempt to get out of an obligation; and Mr. Mackenzie accordingly called up Hanford, and asked him if the letter was to be construed as severing their relations of attorney and client, or if his firm was to continue to represent the defendants. Thereupon Hanford stated that the letter was not so intended; that the attorneys were to continue in their employment, and he would see them about the Cartwright suit in a few days. The attorneys continued doing the work contemplated, until, without further notice to them, a complaint substantially similar to the one they had prepared in the so-called Cartwright suit was filed by another attorney. No explanation was made to them by any of the defendants, and they, thereupon, considered that the relationship of attorney and client had been severed by the defendants, and assigned their claim for services to the plaintiff, who began this action.

The testimony of Mr. Metson above set forth was substantially corroborated by Messrs. Drew and Meckenzie of the same firm. The reasonable value of the services rendered was established by expert testimony.

The appellants contend that the action of the law firm in assigning their claim for services and directing that an action be brought thereon, without notice or demand for payment of the same, was a breach of the relationship of attorney and client; that there is no substantial evidence to sustain the judgment against the defendants Tevis, Hanford Investment Company, and Union Land Company; that the action is brought upon a balance of account, and the evidence does not show any balance of account due; that error was committed in allowing the expert witnesses to answer certain hypothetical questions regarding the value of the services rendered, because such questions included as an element a retaining fee, and the bill of particulars submitted to defendants contained no such item; that the verdict and judgment are grossly excessive.

[1] It is perhaps true that, when the law firm construed the filing of the complaint in the Cartwright suit by another attorney as a breach of faith upon the part of their clients, severing the relationship of attorney and client between themselves and the clients, and immediately brought suit for the value of their services, they took the chance of being mistaken in their judgment. It is conceivable that the clients might have shown that they had been guilty of no breach of the relationship, and that the attorneys were the first to cause the breach. The present record does not, however, present such a case. The law firm came to the conclusion that its former clients had severed the relationship of attorney and client; they acted accordingly, and there is sufficient in the record to base an implied finding of the jury to that effect. Mr. Cartwright, in whose name the action was to be brought, testified:

> "Why, subsequent to the preparation and signing of the Metson, Drew & Mackenzie complaint, which as I understand, was not entered or was not filed, it was determined to bring suit through Randolph Whiting, and Mr. Hanford or Tevis and Mr. Albert Hanford and Mr. Tevis and myself spoke on that subject, and Mr. Tevis, I think it was, requested me to see Mr. Whiting to verify the complaint."

While Mr. Cartwright says he thinks it was Mr. Tevis who requested him to verify the complaint at the office of Mr. Whiting, nevertheless the testimony above quoted makes it clear that the defendant Hanford was also a party to the discussion and to the determination to make a change in attorneys. Furthermore, as we shall discuss hereinafter, the record is such as to warrant the implied finding of the jury that Tevis also bore the relationship of client to the law firm. We think, therefore, that the first point urged by the appellants is without merit.

[2, 3] As to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a judgment against the defendant Tevis, we think the contention of the appellant is also without merit. That judgment rests upon the testimony of Mr. Metson, who stated that Mr. Tevis had talked with him frequently over the telephone in regard to the legal matters involved; that he had talked to Mr. Hanford over the telephone in Mr. Metson's presence regarding the same matters; that Mr. Tevis had frequently gotten advice from Mr. Metson in regard to the legal questions involved, and had stated that he was glad that Mr. Metson's firm had been employed "by them for their interest." It is true, the defendants contradicted these statements; but that merely raised a conflict in the evidence, and, in view of the implied finding of the jury in its judgment against Tevis, we must give full weight to Mr. Metson's statements appearing in the record.

[4-6] It is urged by the corporate appellants that the judgment against them is erroneous because it must rest either upon the testimony of the attorneys that the services rendered were of a nature to be beneficial to the corporations, or upon the admissions in the record that Hanford and Tevis were president and vice president of these corporations, or upon the testimony of Mr. Metson representing himself as having authority to act for the defendant corporation. We concede to said appellants that it is not the law that a corporation is bound to pay for services which may prove of benefit to it in the absence of a contract to pay for the same or the existence of the elements of ratification or estoppel. It is also settled that neither the president nor vice president of a corporation, by virtue of such office alone, has authority to contract for services such as those involved here on behalf of the corporation. Pacific Bank v. Stone, 121 Cal. 202, 206, 53 Pac. 634. And it is equally well settled that the authority of an agent cannot be established by his own declarations as to his agency. Civ. Code, § 2319, subd. 2; Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 520, 59 Pac. 937; Peterson v. Stockton, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 244, 66 Pac. 304; Smith v. Liverpool, etc., Co., 107 Cal. 432, 437, 40 Pac. 540; Pease v. Fink, 3 Cal. App. 371, 379, 85 Pac. 657.

[7] However, there is another legal doctrine which we find applicable to the record before us, and which justifies the judgment against the corporate defendants. It is admitted in the record that the defendants Tevis and Hanford owned all of the stock of the R. G. Hanford Company. It is also admitted that this company held 19,997 shares of the capital stock of the defendant Hanford Investment Company out of a total of 20,000 shares. The remaining three shares were owned by Albert Hanford and the defendants R. G. Hanford and William S. Tevis. It will be seen, then, that there was but one share of stock of this company which was not owned by the defendants Hanford and Tevis. As to the defendant Union Land Company, the 1,000,000 shares of the capital stock of that company were owned as follows: Albert Hanford, 10 shares; B. M. Aiken, 10 shares; C. E. Gilman, 10 shares; R. G. Hanford, 499,985 shares; and William S. Tevis, 499,985 shares. This being the admitted situation, we think the doctrine of the case of Commercial Surety Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 Pac. 964, is applicable. It was said in that case:

> "The evidence shows—indeed, it is admitted—that, at the time the transaction constituting the basis of this litigation took place, Skow and Morris were, practically, the defendant—that is, the corporation itself. They owned all the stock but one single share, which, as is often so with so-called 'close corporations,' was put in the name of Attorney Walthall undoubtedly for the sole working purposes of the corporation. * * * As a matter of fact, and to all practical intents and purposes, Skow and Morris were partners in the business of the defendant, although in legal contemplation they were, under the name of the defendant, a corporation. * * * The question may be asked: May a corporation, whose capital stock is entirely owned, practically, by two persons, one of whom, being in the active management of the business of such corporation has made an agreement for the benefit of the corporation, and the other of whom has virtually indorsed or by conduct ratified it, refuse performance of its obligations under the agreement? Having received the benefits, or some of them, of an agreement obviously made for it and for its benefit (and ostensibly by it), with the consent and concurrence of the owners of substantially all its capital stock, will a corporation be permitted to dodge or escape liability for obligations arising upon such agreement by the plea that the contract was made without observance of the formal requisites or prerequisites prescribed by its charter or by-laws with respect to the making of contracts? The answer to these questions may be found in the principles of equity and justice applicable to such a case as we have here. Indeed, it would be deemed a hard rule or one of more than mere unsubstantial technical texture if the courts could not consistently break through it, and so hold that a corporation is bound by a contract made under such circumstances as characterized the making of the contract in the present case."

The cases of Sargent v. Palace Café Co., 175 Cal. 737, 167 Pac. 146, Clement v. Duncan, 39 Cal. App. Dec. 13, and Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 Pac. 673, also take notice of the foregoing rule of law.

[8] Appellants contend that the action was technically an action on a "balance of account" for servies rendered; that the proof did not show any account; that there had been no payments made and no balance due. This objection, we think, is of no avail upon appeal under our system of leading. No objection to the variance between the pleading and proof was made at a time when the pleading might have been amended to conform to the proof, and no prejudice has resulted to the defendants by a judgment which accords with the proof, if not technically with the pleadings. Plaintiff was given the relief to which the evidence indicated he was entitled, and the trial court had power to permit an amendment to the pleadings to conform to the proof had the matter been called to its attention in time.

[9] The last objection is that no evidence should have been received to establish the value of the legal services rendered which included as an element of that value a retaining fee. Appellants admit that since the decision in the case of Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. 698, it is settled law in this state that evidence as to the value of a retainer is admissible without any special allegation regarding the same, but they contend that, when a bill of particulars, furnished at the request of the defendant, does not include such an item, evidence of its value may not be received at the trial. That situation was presented in the instant case, and the case of Knight v. Russ, supra, is relied upon to establish the appellants' contention. That case does not pass upon the question raised by the appellants here, and it is unnecessary for us to pass upon that question in the instant case because it was not raised in the trial court by a proper objection to the evidence of which complaint is made. The hypothetical question of which complaint is made covers twenty pages in the record. The defendants objected thereto upon numerous grounds, the objections and arguments thereon covering several pages more. As objections were urged upon various grounds, the attorney for the plaintiff stated that he would correct his facts embodied in the hypothetical question if the objections indicated that anything stated therein had not been shown by the evidence. Despite the multitude of objections which able counsel found to urge against the question, no objection was made upon the ground that the bill of particulars did not include a retaining fee. We think, therefore, appellants are precluded from urging that objection upon appeal. Had that specific objection been urged at the proper time, the hypothetical question might have been corrected, or the trial court might have ordered the plaintiff to furnish to the defendants a further account under the power given by section 454 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[10] In view of the expert testimony appearing in the record as to the value of the services rendered, and the testimony of the members of the law firm that seven attorneys and their clerical assistants devoted over a month and a half to constant work upon the business of defendants, we are not prepared to say that the judgment is excessive.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

67 Cal. App. 70

PETERSEN v. CIVIL SERVICE BOARD OF CITY OF OAKLAND et al. (Civ. 4811.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 30, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑189(2)—Civil service board could not impose "fine" upon policeman without declaration he was guilty of breach of duty.

Civil service board of city of Oakland could not impose a fine upon a policeman in proceedings for his removal under City Charter, §§ 81, 82, without declaration in language, at least sufficiently clear to fairly indicate its conclusion, that such officer was guilty of some breach of duty for which he could be subjected to punishment; word "fine" as used in charter signifying a pecuniary punishment for an offense committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fine.]

2. Trial 🔑404(2)—Recitals in judgment held not to constitute findings.

Recital in judgment of trial court reviewing action of civil service board of a city that the board intended, when making deduction on reinstatement of policeman, to fine him, held not finding which may not be reviewed, but only legal construction given by trial court to decision of board.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑185(13)—Every intendment not given in favor of decision of civil service board of city.

Every intendment need not be taken in favor of decision of civil service board of a city removing a policeman, because such doctrine has no application to jurisdictional essentials of an inferior tribunal and jurisdiction must affirmatively appear, and it cannot be presumed that, where such board fined a police officer in proceedings for his removal, such fine was based on finding that he was guilty of an offense.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑185(13)—Burden of establishing jurisdiction of civil service board rested upon it on certiorari to review decision fining policeman.

In certiorari by policeman to review part of decision of civil service board imposing a fine after reinstating him, burden of establishing jurisdiction to impose fine rested upon respondents, and not policeman, and it was necessary to bring up record to show jurisdiction.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑185(13)—Court on certiorari limited to question whether inferior tribunal exceeded jurisdiction.

In certiorari to review decision of civil service board of a city removing a policeman, court cannot enter a judgment affirming decision as far as it reinstates policeman and annul it relative to deprivation of salary, power of court on certiorari being limited to question of whether board exceeded jurisdiction or legally pursued its authority, and no affirmative action may be directed.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑186(4) — Civil service board held without power to withhold salary of reinstated policeman because he accepted other employment on suspension.

On reinstatement of policeman, part of decision of civil service board withholding a portion of salary for time he was employed by others during period of suspension was null and void; determination as to whether he was entitled to double salary being a question of law to be presented to and decided by court in any action instituted by policeman to recover salary for full period of suspension.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Petition by Walter J. Petersen for certiorari to review decision of Civil Service Board of the City of Oakland and others, attempting to remove petitioner from Police Department. From judgment dismissing writ, petitioner appeals. Reversed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Cedric W. Petersen, of Oakland, and Charles W. Fisher, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is an appeal by the petitioner, Walter J. Petersen, from a judgment dismissing a writ of certiorari theretofore issued at his request, for the purpose of having reviewed the decision of the civil service board of the city of Oakland concerning the attempted removal by the commission of that city of said Petersen from the office of captain of inspectors of the Oakland police department.

From the record it appears that on September 11, 1920, the commissioner of public health and safety of said city, acting under the authority of section 81 of the charter of said city, made an order removing Petersen from office, assigning as reasons therefor 21 separate grounds of alleged misconduct, incompetency, failure to perform the duties of said office, and failure to observe the rules of the department. Thereupon Petersen appealed from said order to the civil service board, whose duty it was, under section 82 of said charter, to "fully hear and determine the matter." Much delay preceded and attended the trial of said Petersen, and after the matter was ordered submitted for decision more delay followed, due to the sickness and subsequent resignation of one of the then members of said board, and the retirement of another. After two new members had been appointed, the matter was ordered resubmitted for decision, and on June 2, 1922, said new board gave its decision in writing, containing the following conclusions:

"Resolved:

"1. That the evidence is not sufficient to warrant the discharge or removal of said Walter J. Petersen from the office of captain of inspectors of the police department of the city of Oakland upon all or any of the particular grounds set forth in said order of discharge; and

"2. That, from the foregoing findings of fact, the civil service board determines that the discharge and removal from office of said Walter J. Petersen by said commissioner was unwarranted and that he should be immediately reinstated in his former position of captain of inspectors, upon the condition hereinafter stated; and

"3. That, now therefore, it is hereby decided, determined, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the civil service board that said Walter J. Petersen be reinstated immediately in his former position of captain of inspectors; and

"4. That he receive from the city of Oakland the salary attached to said position, from the 11th day of September, 1920, to the date upon which he accepted employment with the Waterfront Employers' Union, in the city of San Francisco, and that from and after said date he shall receive no compensation from the said city of Oakland."

Petersen then applied for and was granted by the superior court a writ of certiorari by which he sought to have reviewed and annulled that part of said decision of said civil service board whereby it ordered that he be deprived of a portion of the salary of said office, which accrued during his wrongful suspension. After a hearing upon the merits, said writ was by the trial court dismissed, and Petersen has appealed from the judgment of dismissal entered therein.

Appellant makes three main contentions on this appeal: First, it is claimed that if the order of said board depriving appellant of part of the accrued salary of said office be considered as the imposition of a fine, that there was a want of jurisdiction to impose the same for the reason that said board did not at any time find appellant guilty of any offense for which a fine might, under the charter provisions, be imposed; secondly, that the decision of said board, wherein it declared that the evidence presented was insufficient to warrant a removal of appellant from said office, "upon all or any of the particulars set forth in said order of discharge" and his removal and discharge "was unwarranted, and that he should be immediately reinstated," was in effect a verdict of acquittal upon all of the charges upon which he was tried, and that consequently the condition of reinstatement imposed by said board, namely, a loss of salary, cannot be construed in the nature of a fine, but that it was in fact an arbitrary act on the part of said board, based upon the belief of its members that appellant should not receive a salary from the city during that period of his suspension that he accepted remunerative employment from other sources; thirdly, that if that part of the decision of said board be declared void for want of jurisdiction, it should be ordered annulled and the remainder of said decision, wherein appellant is ordered reinstated, should be affirmed.

[1] Irrespective of whatever may have been the intention of said board, we believe the first contention made by appellant must be sustained for the reason that it is our opinion that under the charter provisions of said city it is essential to the jurisdiction of said civil service board before it becomes vested with power to impose a fine upon a person holding a classified civil service position that it declare in language at least sufficiently clear to fairly indicate its conclusion in that respect that such officer has been guilty of some breach of duty for which he may, under the charter provisions, be subjected to punishment. Assuming therefore, but not deciding, that the order for loss of salary was intended as the imposition of a fine, we hold that there was a want of jurisdiction on the part of said board to impose the same for the reason that it made no finding, either affirmatively or inferentially, that Petersen had committed any offense for which he might be legally fined. The provisions of sections 81 and 82 of said charter from which said board derives its power to suspend, fine, or remove a classified civil service officer, are in effect a limitation upon the power of said board and beyond which its authority may not extend. Cook v. Civil Service Commission, 160 Cal. 598, 117 Pac. 662; Lindblom v. Doherty, 102 Ill. App. 14. Section 81 provides that—

> "All persons holding positions in the classified civil service shall be subject to suspension, fine and also to removal from office or employment by the commissioner * * * for misconduct, incompetency or failure to perform their duties under or observe the rules and regulations of the department or office. * * *"

Section 82 provides that—

> "Any person suspended, fined or discharged may * * * appeal therefrom to the civil service board, which shall fully hear and determine the matter. * * *"

It will be observed that there is nothing contained in said section 82 which grants unto said civil service board any greater power than is given to the commissioner. Both are limited in the matter of the imposition of fines to the causes stated in said sections. It would necessarily follow, therefore, we think, that unless there be some finding of misconduct, incompetency, or failure to perform official duty, no fine may be imposed. Such rule doubtless prevails in cases of removal from office, and the charter provisions here make no distinction between cases of removal from office and those where a fine shall be imposed. In discussing cases of removal McQuillin on Municipal Corporations (volume 2, p. 1248, § 568), states the rule as follows:

> "There should be a finding of guilty or not guilty on charges. Ordinarily a sentence of dismissal will be illegal without a finding of guilty. But the judgment dismissing the officer need not be in the precise accuracy of a record in a criminal case. The record of the proceedings of removal should show affirmatively: (1) That charges sufficient in law were preferred; (2) that due notice was given; (3) that a trial was had where the officer was permitted to be heard, and (4) that a judgment or order for cause was rendered."

Furthermore, the word "fine" as used in said charter provision must be interpreted according to its ordinary meaning, which signifies a pecuniary punishment for an offense committed. Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 589; 25 Corpus Juris, 1148; Southern Express Co. v. Commonwealth, 92 Va. 59, 22 S. E. 809, 41 L. R. A. 436; State v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 64 Neb. 679, 90 N. W. 877; State v. Belle, 92 Iowa, 258, 60 N. W. 525. Turning then to the record, we find nothing to show in the remotest degree that Petersen has been guilty or found guilty of any misconduct, incompetency, or other breach of duty. In fact, there is no intimation by said board anywhere that his private or official conduct had been unsatisfactory or even subject to censure; nor is any reason given by the decision of said board, or elsewhere, why said board imposed as a condition precedent to reinstatement that Petersen be deprived of a portion of the salary of the office from which he was suspended. It should be remembered that appellant is making no attack upon the jurisdiction of said board to hear and determine this matter, nor upon its power to revise the punishment ordered by the commissioner. Neither does he question the right of said board to impose a fine upon him for any act of wrongdoing covered by the charter provisions, even though it may have further found that the commission of such act would not justify his removal from office. It is the foundation of the judgment of said board that he assails, claiming that if the loss of salary be considered a fine he has been punished without having been found guilty of any offense. We think it manifest that it was just as essential to the complete jurisdiction of said board that appellant be found guilty of some violation of duty before he can be punished as it was to give him notice of the trial before he could be legally tried.

Respondents have cited us to the case of Hackett v. Morse, 45 Cal. App. 788, 188 Pac. 308, upon which they rely to a large extent. That case arose under the same charter provisions involved here. A fireman holding a position in the classified civil service of the city of Oakland was ordered discharged by the commissioner for insubordination. Upon appeal to the civil service board it was found that plaintiff was not guilty of insubordination that would warrant his discharge from his position, and that such penalty would be unjust, and it was ordered that he be retained in his said position, and that he report for duty and resume his work in said position upon August 1, 1918. The board further stated in its decision:

> "That it is the opinion of the board that for making any objection to being transferred to Engine Company No. 6 that said Thomas Hackett should not be entitled to or receive any compensation from the city from June 3, 1918, to August 1, 1918."

The decision of said board was sustained by the trial court. The commissioner appealed and made the contention that the authority of said civil service board was limited to an inquiry as to whether or not said employee was guilty of the offense charged, and in the event it was found that he was guilty, that then said board had no power to change the punishment inflicted by the commissioner. It was held, on appeal, that the authority to "fully hear and determine the matter" as granted said board by the charter provisions, carried with it the power to revise the punishment in accordance with its findings.

The conclusions we have reached in the instant case do not conflict at all with the rule stated in Hackett v. Morse, supra. The plain distinction between the two cases is that in that case, although the board found that the employee was not guilty of such an offense as would warrant his removal, it did in fact find him guilty of some offense, namely, insubordination, before it attempted to penalize him. There there was no finding whatever of any breach of duty, but the board nevertheless penalized the employee by ordering a loss of salary.

It was the contention of respondents before the trial court, as here, that since said board had acquired jurisdiction to hear the matter of said appeal, and had the power in the exercise of its jurisdiction to deprive the petitioner of his salary during a specified period of time, in the nature of a penalty (Hackett v. Morse, 45 Cal. App. 788, 188 Pac. 308), and in fact did deprive him of all salary during a specified time, that every intendment must be taken that said board in so doing intended to and did thereby impose a penalty, and that therefore the decision of said board must be sustained. The trial court apparently adopted the views of respondents for the reason that while no findings of fact were made, the judgment of the court contains the following recitals, to wit:

> "It further appears from an examination of said return of said respondents that said respondents, in said judgment, did intend to and did punish said petitioner by loss of salary and compensation for the period specified in said order, because of his guilt and misconduct in matters, as found by them.
> "It further appears from said return that said respondents had authority to impose said fine, and that there was evidence before them sufficient to authorize them to impose such fine."

[2, 3] Respondents now make the further point that those recitals in the judgment constitute findings upon the question of the intent and that therefore this court is concluded by such finding on this appeal. In this respect, however, it may be stated that the record shows that the judgment of the trial court was not based upon any evidence adduced at the trial other than the written return made by respondents to the writ of review, and said return admittedly contains no part of the evidence received or actual proceedings had before said board at the trial of appellant, nor does it show that any findings were ever made by said board other than those above quoted. It is therefore obvious that those recitals in the judgment, to the effect that said board intended to punish petitioner by a loss of salary "because of his guilt and misconduct, in the matters, as found by them," and "that there was evidence before them sufficient to authorize them to impose such fine," amount to no more than the legal construction given by the trial court to the terms of the decision of said board, aided by such intendments in its favor as it was believed said decision was entitled to, and the same did not constitute findings upon questions of fact, such as would bind this court on appeal. Furthermore, we cannot agree with respondents' contention that every intendment must be taken in favor of the decision of said board, for the reason that such doctrine has no application to the jurisdictional essentials of an inferior tribunal. Jurisdiction in such case must affirmatively appear. It cannot be presumed. While it is true as a general proposition, as respondents contend, that where jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal is shown to have attached, its subsequent proceedings are presumed to be regular (15 Rul. Case Law, § 360; Featherston v. Small, 77 Ind. 143; 1 Black on Judgments, § 287), and that if the decision of such tribunal is regular on the face of the record it will be supported by every presumption that follows a judgment of a court of record (Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Devlin, 188 Cal. 33, 203 Pac. 1058), nevertheless, in cases of a subordinate tribunal created by statute, such as a civil service commission, it is fundamental that jurisdiction must affirmatively appear on the face of the proceedings; no presumptions will be indulged in from it, as in case of a court of general jurisdiction (McQuillin on Mun. Corp., vol. 2, § 566, and cases cited; Lindblom v. Doherty, 102 Ill. App. 14). From what has been stated we are convinced that the decision of said board may not be upheld by the aid of legal presumptions or the doctrine of intendments.

[4] Respondents make the further point that the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed because there was no adequate or complete transcript of the proceedings held before the civil service board placed before the reviewing court. We find no merit in this point. The only useful purpose that could have been served by furnishing such transcript would be to establish the jurisdiction of said board in the matter of said penalty, that is, to show by the record of said board that it had in fact found appellant guilty of some offense for which he might legally be fined. The burden of establishing jurisdiction, however, rested upon the respondents and not upon appellant. As already pointed out, the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal is not to be presumed, and the expression used in the opinion in Hackett v. Morse, supra, that "the presumption that public officials will do their duty applies to a civil service board," is not available to respondents in this respect, for the reason that its use in that case did not pertain to the question of jurisdiction, but was used as an answer to the contention of appellant "that the civil service board may at some time abuse its power and render unjust decisions."

[5] The order for loss of salary being void, the next question arising is the effect of its invalidity upon the entire decision of the said board. Appellant urges:

> "That the judgment of the lower court be reversed and that it be directed to enter a judgment affirming the decision of the civil service board relative to the reinstatement of the appellant to the office of captain of inspectors but annulling it relative to the deprivation of the salary," etc.

We cannot agree with this contention. The power of the court upon certiorari is limited to the question of whether the inferior tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction or has legally pursued its authority, and where its authority has not been legally pursued the writ should be limited to annulment of its proceedings and should not direct any affirmative action. Section 1074, Code Civ. Proc.; Green v. Rogers, 18 Cal. App. 572, 123 Pac. 974. It cannot modify the record of the judgment or decision of such inferior tribunal (Will v. Sinkwitz, 39 Cal. 570), for the simple reason that a writ of review cannot be used as a writ of error (Central Pac. R. Co. v. Placer Co., 46 Cal. 670; Buckley v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 120, 31 Pac. 8; Bergevin v. Wood, 11 Cal. App. 643, 105 Pac. 935), nor as a writ of mandamus (Townsend v. Copeland, 56 Cal. 612).

[6] At least three possible courses of action were open to said board in the disposal of the Petersen charges. It could have found him guilty and a penalty of suspension, removal, or a fine imposed. It could have found him not guilty and reinstated him with no conditions, or it could have reinstated him with a loss of salary for the commission of some specified violation of duty shown by the evidence (Hackett v. Morse, supra), or it could have found that evidence was insufficient to justify removal but order his conditional reinstatement with loss of salary for the commission of some specified act of breach of duty. It did find that the evidence was insufficient to warrant removal and ordered his reinstatement with the right to the accrued salary during suspension up to the date he accepted outside employment. That part of the board's decision was entirely within the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction and has therefore become final and conclusive and is not open to review or reconsideration. The only matter left open then to a complete disposal of the case was the matter of the accrued salary from the date on which Petersen accepted outside employment to the date of his reinstatement. For some reason not apparent from the record nor disclosed by the decision itself, that part of the salary was withheld. It is our interpretation of the law, as already stated, that no portion of said accrued salary may be withheld except in the nature of the imposition of a fine, after a finding that some breach of duty has been committed for which a fine may be imposed. That was not done. The order withholding a portion of said salary is therefore void. But the question of whether said board, by its said order, intended, and in fact attempted, to impose a fine, or whether its order in that respect was made for arbitrary reasons not justified by the charter, we have not considered or passed upon. It may be, as appellant contends, that said order was made under the belief that Petersen should not be allowed to collect two salaries covering the same period of time, if so, its order is wholly void for the reason that the determination of that question is one of law to be presented to and decided by the courts in any action instituted by Petersen to recover the salary for the full period of his suspension, or it may be, as respondents claim, that said order was intended in the nature of a fine, for the commission of some act of wrongdoing, on Petersen's part, of which said board omitted to find him guilty. If so it was an attempt on the part of said board to exercise its lawful jurisdiction, but it was done in an illegal manner. If a directed judgment be now ordered, in the form requested by appellant, it would be in effect a predetermination by this court of the question above stated in appellant's favor.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; ST. SURE, J.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. The petition for transfer to and hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. The statement is made in the opinion of that court that a certain portion of the decision of the civil service board "was entirely within the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction and has therefore become final and conclusive and is not open to review or reconsideration." We interpret this statement as applying only to the situation presented by the record then before the court for review, and as not intended to foreclose the parties from bringing a more complete record before the court for review upon a retrial of the case.

DAVIE v. BOARD OF REGENTS, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, et al.

(Civ. 4536.)

1. Colleges and universities 🔑10—Complaint for malpractice held to establish that university in operation of infirmary did not conduct private and proprietary enterprise.

Complaint in malpractice case against Board of Regents of University of California held to establish fact that defendant, in operation of infirmary, did not conduct a private and proprietary enterprise, but that infirmary was department conducted as educational and public activity.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑724—Liable for torts in private capacity.

A municipal corporation has a double character, and, when acting in private capacity, its liabilities arising out of either contracts or torts are same as those of natural persons or private corporations.

3. Colleges and universities 🔑5—Maintenance of infirmary by university a governmental function.

Maintenance of an infirmary by state university as an educational activity is a governmental function, and it is not liable for tortious acts of employees, though fees are charged.

4. Colleges and universities 🔑5—State university had power to maintain infirmary.

State university had power to establish and maintain an infirmary, in view of Const. art. 9, § 9, and Pol. Code, § 1618a (St. 1919, p. 128).

5. Appeal and error 🔑854(3)—Order sustaining demurrer sustained if complaint insufficient upon any ground properly specified.

If complaint is insufficient upon any ground properly specified in demurrer, order sustaining demurrer must be sustained though lower court may have deemed it sufficient in that respect and may in its order have declared it defective only in some particular in which reviewing court holds it good.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1178(8)—Judgment on demurrer not reversed merely in order to allow amendment where plaintiff elected to stand upon complaint.

Where plaintiff elected to stand upon his complaint, judgment against him on demurrer will not be reversed merely in order to allow an amendment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Jos. S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Stanley Davie against the Board of Regents, University of California, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McGee, Sapiro & Thomson, of Oakland, for appellant.

J. M. Mannon, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted in consequence of the negligence of a physician in charge of an infirmary maintained by defendant at the University of California at Berkeley. A demurrer, both general and special, was interposed to the complaint primarily upon the ground that it shows defendant to be a state agency in charge of a governmental function, and that the infirmary being maintained in connection with and as a part of that educational institution, defendant is not liable for the alleged torts of its agents in the operation thereof. The demurrer was sustained, and upon plaintiff's failure to amend judgment was entered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that prior to and after the 3d day of April, 1920, plaintiff was a duly enrolled and attending student in one of the courses at the University of California; that it is one of the rules and regulations of the university that before a person can become a regularly enrolled student he must pay an infirmary fee of $3, and thereafter semiannually, which fee the plaintiff paid, and had thereby become entitled to consultation and medical and hospital care at the infirmary thus operated by defendant corporation. There is no charge, so it is alleged, beyond the infirmary fee for ordinary hospital and medical services; but if a surgical operation or special nurse is required the cost thereof must be borne by the patient. The complaint, proceeding, recites that defendant corporation collected the infirmary fee above referred to from several thousands of students each year and held the same as its own funds, and that the students of said university, including plaintiff, did not acquire any interest in the money so paid by them, and that defendant thereby realized a large profit in the administration of the infirmary conducted by it through the collection and retention of such fees required to be paid by all the students. Then follow allegations to the effect that the infirmary is wholly maintained and supported by the fees and charges paid by those entitled to receive treatment, and is so conducted and maintained by defendant separate and apart from its duties as the governing body of the University of California. Further recitals are to the effect that defendant for an adequate and valuable consideration, in addition to the infirmary fee mentioned, undertook and agreed to perform an operation upon the plaintiff for the removal of his tonsils, and undertook and agreed to render all necessary medical and surgical treatment incident thereto. It is charged that in the course of said operation defendant used negligent, careless, and improper methods and treatment, resulting ultimately in a dislocation of the jawbone and a fracture of the left side of the posterior arch of the atlas vertebræ of plaintiff's neck, which injuries, it is claimed, are permanent. Damages in the sum of $151,433.35 are prayed for.

The main contention of appellant and the one chiefly relied upon for a reversal is that the complaint shows that defendant has undertaken to do something separate and apart from any educational function, and in consequence thereof has become liable for the alleged tortious act. In support thereof it is argued that the defendant corporation, the Regents of the University of California, has a dual character—governmental and also proprietary and private—and when acting in the latter capacity its liabilities arising out of either contract or tort are the same as those of natural persons or private corporations, and he invokes the application in his favor of the rule established by the decisions of this state, that a municipal corporation is liable for torts of its agents committed in the performance of activities or functions purely private and proprietary in their nature.

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the pleading shows on its face that the infirmary is maintained as a part of the University of California, operated only in connection with the educational functions thereof, and this being so, it is not liable for the torts of its agents committed in connection therewith. It further contends as a matter of law that the distinction in actions of this character between governmental and proprietary functions is limited in its application to municipal corporations, and does not extend to state agencies, such as counties, school districts, road districts and the Regents of the University of California, and that this distinction between torts committed in the course of the exercise of public and governmental functions on the one hand, and of private and proprietary activities on the other, has never been applied to any but municipal corporations; for which reason it claims that the rule invoked has no application to the instant case.

[1] We will proceed to a consideration and discussion of the first contention, namely, whether the allegations of the complaint establish the fact that defendant, in the operation of the infirmary, conducts a private and proprietary enterprise, or whether it shows that the infirmary was in reality a department of the university conducted by respondent as an educational, and therefore public, activity.

In support of his position appellant claims that it is apparent from the various organic and legislative acts that the Legislature had in contemplation two separate kinds of property which the Board of Regents were entitled to manage and control: First, that which belonged to the state outright and which the regents could not alienate; second, that class of property which the board acquired by gift for investment and reinvestment, and which is separate and distinct from the properties donated by the state for the general purpose of its creation; that as to this class the board acquired such property for business purposes; that it operates the same for such purposes separate and apart from any educational function and derives revenue and profits therefrom, and therefore should, like an individual, become liable to third persons for its torts—partaking in this respect of the dual character of muncipal corporations considered from the point of view of their twofold activities.

[2] That a municipal corporation has a double character and, when acting in a private capacity, its liabilities arising out of either contract or tort are the same as those of natural persons or private corporations, has long since been definitely settled and established. In treating of this subject, Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, lays down the rule that a municipal corporation possesses a double character —the one governmental, legislative or public, the other in a sense proprietary or private— and says that the distinction between these is sometimes, indeed very often, difficult to trace. In its governmental or public character the corporation is made by the state one of its instruments or the local depositary of certain limited and prescribed political powers, to be exercised for the public good. But in its proprietary or private character the theory is that the powers are supposed not to be conferred primarily or chiefly from considerations connected with the government of the state at large, but rather for the private advantage of the compact community which is incorporated as a distinct legal personality or corporate individual; and as to such powers and to property acquired thereunder and contracts made with reference thereto, the corporation is to be regarded as private in character. Dillon on Mun. Cor. (5th Ed.) § 109.

This doctrine has received general recognition in this state. Accordingly, it has been held that a municipal corporation when acting in a private or proprietary capacity is liable for its tort. Chafor v. Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 163 Pac. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106.

The question, however, as to whether or not the maintenance of a hospital by a municipality is a governmental function is with us one of first impression. Cases dealing with the liability of municipal corporations growing out of the operation and maintenance of different activities, however, are numerous; and they are illuminating as they discuss and determine the difference between governmental and proprietary functions.

In Sherbourne v. Yuba County, 21 Cal. 113, 81 Am. Dec. 151, it was sought to hold a county liable to one who while an inmate of a hospital suffered injuries from unskillful treatment. It was there held that a quasi corporation such as a county is not liable for acts of officers or employees which it appoints in the exercise of a portion of the sovereign power of the state by the requirement of a public law, simply for the public benefit and from which the county as a corporation derives no benefit. This case, however, was decided upon the ground that defendant county exercised exclusively governmental functions.

In Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847, the defendant city was operating an electric light plant for the purpose of lighting the city and furnishing electric light to its inhabitants for domestic use. This activity was held not to be a governmental function.

In Chafor v. Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 163 Pac. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106, the question was again presented and discussed. There plaintiff's intestate was killed by the collapse of a platform in an auditorium erected and maintained by the city. The maintenance of the auditorium was by virtue of a permissive statute which contemplated that the hall should be let for profit. It was not devoted to any educational or governmental purpose. Its operation was therefore held to be a private and proprietary activity. In the opinion it is stated that a municipality is protected from liability only while exercising the delegated functions of sovereignty, which consist of those pertaining to the making and enforcing of police regulations, to prevent crime, to preserve the public health, to prevent fires, the caring for the poor, and the education of the young. County of Alameda v. Chambers, 35 Cal. App. 537, 170 Pac. 650.

In Kellar v. Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 605, 178 Pac. 505, the complaint demurred to alleged that the municipality maintained a summer camp outside of its corporate limits under authorization of certain provisions of its charter for the purpose of giving the children of the city a vacation, at certain prescribed charges to be paid by them to the city. The demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the city was, in the operation of this activity, engaged purely in the exercise of its governmental function pertaining to the health of the children of the city, and was therefore not liable for injuries suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the negligence of its servants in caring for such plaintiff after he had been accidentally injured while an inmate of such camp. It is there further held that the activities involved were referable to the duty of maintaining the public health, and had nothing of the nature of an ordinary business enterprise.

Direct authority, however, upon the precise question is not wanting in other states. Many cases may be found in the various jurisdictions upon the subject, where it is generally held that in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary a hospital created and existing for purely governmental purposes and under the control of the municipality or state is not liable for injuries to a patient caused by the negligence or misconduct of its employees, although a statute, as here, may declare it to be a corporation which may sue and be sued. The maintenance of such hospitals is held to be for the public welfare and the advancement of public health, and in the operation thereof municipalities or the state exercise governmental or political functions. 30 Cyc. 465. Thus, in Browder v. City of Henderson, 182 Ky. 771, 207 S. W. 479, it is said that the power or even the duty on the part of a municipal corporation to make provision for the public health and for the care of the sick appertains to it in its governmental or public capacity, and that no element of safety is more important than those pertaining to public health; and accordingly it is there held that where a city establishes a hospital it is not responsible to persons injured by reason of the misconduct of its agents or employees. See, also, 19 Ruling Case Law, 1122; 7 Cal. Jur. 518; Tollefson Adm'x v. City of Ottawa, 228 Ill. 134, 81 N. E. 823, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 990; Summers v. Board of Commissioners, 103 Ind. 262, 2 N. E. 725, 53 Am. Rep. 512; Zummo v. Kansas City, 285 Mo. 222, 225 S. W. 934.

[3] We do not deem an extensive review of the authorities from the other states essential, and it would answer no useful purpose. Suffice it to say that they generally hold that the maintenance of a hospital by a municipality is a governmental function, and that in the conduct thereof the municipality is not liable for the tortious acts of its employees.

Reading the complaint in the present action from its four corners, it conclusively appears therefrom that the infirmary in question is conducted by the defendant corporation for the exclusive use of the students, and that it is so conducted by it for the sole purpose of safeguarding and protecting the health of the student body. This being so, it is in no sense an organization for profit, and the imposition of the small fee does not convert this governmental function into a proprietary one. Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416; Kellar v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 605, 178 Pac. 505; Manning v. City of Pasadena, 58 Cal. App. 672, 209 Pac. 253. Nor does the further recital that the respondent conducts it separate and apart from its duties as a governing body have this effect, for this is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and it is negatived by the other allegations of the complaint.

This being so, the promotion and welfare of the students in this respect must be held to be the exercise of a duty involving governmental functions in the highest degree.

The reason for the rule that the policy of the law denies liability of a state or municipality for negligence of its servants and physicians is that such an activity being a governmental agency, to permit such liability would result in enormous public burdens. Jenkins v. Charleston Gen. Hospital, 90 W. Va. 230, 110 S. E. 560, 22 A. L. R. 323.

[4] That respondent had the power to establish and maintain the infirmary there can be no question. The Constitution provides:

> The "corporation shall also have all the powers necessary or convenient for the effective administration of its trust." Const. art. 9, § 9.

That the maintenance of the health of the students is an educational activity is indicated not only by the cases cited but also by section 1618a of the Political Code (St. 1919, p. 128), which provides that school trustees and county boards of education may provide for proper health supervision in the public schools.

Our attention is called to the cases of Bloom v. City and County of San Francisco, 64 Cal. 503, 3 Pac. 129, and Lundy v. Delmas, 104 Cal. 655, 38 Pac. 445, 26 L. R. A. 651, as holding contrary to the views herein expressed. The Bloom Case has to do with the maintenance of a nuisance. It therefore presents an exception to the general rule. Where a municipality maintains a nuisance it is liable in damages, and cannot escape such liability on the ground that it is exercising a governmental function. Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 127 Pac. 50. Lundy v. Delmas merely holds that the Regents of the University are not individually liable for the negligence of the corporation in failing to properly maintain a telegraph line belonging to it. It does not hold the corporation to be liable for the torts of its agents.

Other cases cited deal with the personal liability of agents, and when exceeding their powers. A discussion of these cases is unnecessary, for even conceding that certain language used therein must be construed as supporting appellant's contention, we could not follow them in view of the generally accepted doctrine.

The conclusion we have reached renders unnecessary a discussion of the further question presented by respondent, namely, that defendant is a state agency, and therefore immune from liability irrespective of any distinction between the twofold activities of muncipalities.

As above recited, the demurrer interposed was both general and special. The minute order of the trial court was "that the demurrer of the defendant the Regents of the University of California be sustained." Defendant by special demurrer pointed out, among other things, that the complaint was ambiguous and unintelligible for the reason that it failed to state in what manner the infirmary was conducted separate and apart by defendant from its duties as governor of the University of California.

It is manifest, and indeed it is not otherwise contended, that the gravamen of plaintiff's action is that defendant in the operation of the infirmary was conducting a private enterprise. It is here claimed by appellant that any defect in his pleading in this particular cannot here be availed of, for the reason that the action of the trial court was bottomed upon the general demurrer only, for which reason we are restricted in a review of the decision to consideration of the propriety of the action of the trial court in sustaining the general demurrer to the complaint.

[5, 6] We do not so understand the law. In reviewing an order sustaining a demurrer the appellate court is not so limited in its action. If the complaint is insufficient upon any ground properly specified in the demurrer the order must be sustained, though the lower court may have deemed it sufficient in that respect and may in its order have declared it defective only in some particular in which we hold it to be good. Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 456, 98 Pac. 21; Sechrist v. Rialto Irrigation District, 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261. In other words, this court is free to consider each ground of respondent's demurrer to the complaint; and if the demurrer was well taken on any ground the judgment below must be affirmed. If we are correct in our conclusion that the allegations of the complaint show that the infirmary was conducted by respondent as part of the activities of the educational institution, an amendment would avail plaintiff nothing. However this may be, uncertainties in this particular were pointed out to plaintiff under the demurrer; he elected to stand upon his complaint for obvious reasons. Having done so, the judgment on demurrer will not be reversed merely in order to allow an amendment. 2 Cal. Jur. 995; 4 Corpus Juris, 1195.

In conclusion it may be said that it is indeed unfortunate that plaintiff should suffer through the negligence or misconduct of the physician intrusted with the care of administering the affairs of the infirmary, and the condition of plaintiff brought about through the alleged malpractice of such physician (assuming the allegations to be true) is a great hardship upon plaintiff; but it is one which cannot be remedied by giving him damages at the expense of the institution in question. Whatever our personal inclination might be, we are bound to take the law as we find it. For such damages a claimant is left to his remedy against those through whose fault he was injured. Maia's Adm'r v. Eastern State Hospital, 97 Va. 507, 34 S. E. 617, 47 L. R. A. 577.

For the reasons given we are of the opinion that the demurrer of respondent corporation to the amended complaint was properly sustained, and the judgment rendered thereon should be and it is hereby affirmed.

DAVIE v. REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 4624.)

1. Colleges and universities 🔑7—Negligent surgeon in university infirmary liable though university immune.

Immunity of state university from liability for negligence of its servants and agents in its infirmary does not extend to and cover negligent surgeon acting as its agent.

2. States 🔑112—Servants of government liable for negligence.

Where negligent wrongs are done to individuals by those who are servants of government, those injured are not remediless, as servants may be sued same as other persons for torts which they have committed, though government is immune.

Complaint for malpractice against surgeon in infirmary of state university held not demurrable as unintelligible or uncertain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Stanley Davie against the Regents of the University of California and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

McGee & Corgiat, J. H. Sapiro, and McGee, Sapiro & Thomson, all of Oakland (Wm. F. Cleary, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

David C. Dutton, of Oakland, and Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (Errol C. Gilkey, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent Legge.

J. M. Mannon, Jr., of San Francisco, for other respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appellant instituted an action for damages against the Regents of the University of California, a corporation, and Robert T. Legge, as codefendants, for injuries claimed to have resulted from the negligence of a physician in charge of an infirmary maintained by respondent's codefendant at the University of California in Berkeley. Demurrers were interposed to an amended complaint by defendants separately. They were both sustained with leave to amend. Plaintiff declined to further amend, whereupon separate judgments were entered in favor of both defendants. Separate appeals were thereupon taken. The appeal from the judgment in favor of defendant corporation the Regents of the University of California (Civil No. 4536) 227 Pac. 243, was this day decided. It was there held in substance that the complaint shows that the Regents of the University of California, defendant corporation, operates and maintains the infirmary in question solely as a governmental function, for which reason it is immune from suit on account of the alleged negligence.

[1, 2] In support of the judgment in favor of respondent Legge it is claimed that as no cause of action was stated against his codefendant the Regents of the University of California, by reason of the fact that such corporation was a state agency exercising governmental functions, no cause of action is stated against him as the servant and agent of the corporation for acts done while he was acting within the course of his employment; it being urged that of necessity the immunity of the principal must extend and cover the agent.

There is no merit in this contention. The immunity does not extend to agents. Browder v. City of Hendersen, 182 Ky. 772, 207 S. W. 479.

The principle which protects the regents is inapplicable to him. Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 127 Pac. 50, 30 Am. St. Rep. 402; Maia v. Eastern Hospital, 97 Va. 507, 515, 34 S. E. 617, 47 L. R. A. 577. Where wrongs are done to individuals by those who are the servants of the government those injured are not remediless, as such servants or employees may be sued the same as other persons for torts which they have committed. 25 R. C. L. p. 408.

It is further urged that irrespective of this question the demurrer was correctly sustained for the reason that there is a misjoinder which is prejudicial to defendant, and for the additional reason that the complaint is fatally defective in that it is uncertain, unintelligible, and ambiguous in the respects pointed out by the demurrer.

[3] We see no merit in these contentions. A complaint is not necessarily defective in which there is united with a defendant another against whom no liability is alleged. Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 300, 34 Pac. 777. Nor under such circumstances are the rights of the parties necessarily affected by such misjoinder. Hirshfeld v. Weill, 121 Cal. 13, 53 Pac. 402. True, there is no tie indicated by the allegations of the complaint binding the defendants together such as is required under the law to make out a case of joint liability; nor is there in any one of the single acts complained of a possibility of holding both defendants named in the complaint as joint tort-feasors. The pleading shows clearly that the acts complained of were committed by defendant Legge with complete absence of any community of purpose, concert of action, or general plan as would serve to unite defendants and constitute one cause of action for the damage alleged. But this condition did not justify the action of the lower court in sustaining the demurrer of both defendants. The old common-law rule in relation to the inseverability of actions against joint tort-feasors does not exist in this state, it having been modified by section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in substance that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs or for or against one or more of several defendants where the justice of the case requires it. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 239, 248, 116 Pac. 513. Here, as above stated, the complaint shows that the acts done by defendant Legge were done independently, and that there was no concert of action on the part of his codefendant. The defendants were no doubt joined upon the mistaken theory that the doctrine of respondeat superior prevailed against the regents and that they were not immune from suit. Whatever the reason for the joinder may have been, the immunity of the regents did not of itself abate the action against the alleged culpable defendant, or bar a judgment against him if guilty, for when the demurrer of the regents was sustained any objection that might exist by reason of the misjoinder was removed.

[4] Nor do we think, as claimed that the complaint is unintelligible or uncertain. It alleges in unequivocal terms a complete cause of action against defendant Legge. It first charges that for a consideration he personally performed an operation upon plaintiff at the infirmary mentioned for the removal of his tonsils, and that he undertook and agreed to render all medical aid and surgical treatment incident thereto; that he negligently failed to make a thorough examination of plaintiff's neck and throat. It further charges that the operation was performed in a negligent and careless manner without skill in that excessive force was applied to plaintiff's head, jaw, and neck, and as a direct result therefrom plaintiff's jawbone was dislocated and the left side of the atlas vertebræ of his neck was fractured, crushed, and dislocated; and that his physical condition by reason of these injuries became seriously aggravated and painful. Then follow allegations to the effect that plaintiff suffered great pain and anguish, and that in addition thereto and by reason of the treatment plaintiff also suffered inconvenience and annoyance by reason of the unnatural poise or position of his neck and head, which unnatural position is permanent and will continue throughout plaintiff's life. Such allegations we believe to be sufficient to require defendant to plead to the merits and thus give plaintiff his day in court.

For the reasons stated the judgment of the lower court sustaining the demurrer of defendant Legge is reversed.

FAY IMPROVEMENT CO. v. HANLON et al.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑475 — Improvement ordinance providing for installment payment of assessment held intelligible and reasonable.

Section of a street improvement ordinance providing that, if any owner desires to pay assessment in installments, he shall make a bond in form set out, held reasonable, and not, as claimed, unintelligible.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑475—Assessment at more than half value of property, but permitting installment payments, held valid.

Notwithstanding San Francisco Charter, c. 2, art. 6, § 8, subd. 3, prohibiting assessment for street improvement at more than one-half the value of the property, an assessment by ordinance in excess thereof, but permitting payment in installments, under section 33 of the same chapter, was valid, and when property owner failed to arrange for installment payments the entire amount became due.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑46—Ordinances not conflicting with nor repealed by charter amendments continued in force.

All ordinances existing at the time of adoption of charter amendments, and not in conflict therewith or repealed thereby, are continued in force.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Fay Improvement Company against Charles F. Hanlon and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon and Tobin & Tobin, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

John R. Daniels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action to foreclose a lien for street improvement work performed for the benefit of lot No. 59, as shown by the assessment and diagram, situate at the southeast corner of Forty-Fourth avenue and Balboa street, in the city and county of San Francisco, and owned by defendant Charles F. Hanlon. The assessment was made under the procedure provided by Ordinance No. 2439 (N. S.) of the city and county of San Francisco, approved September 4, 1913, under and by virtue of the power given to the supervisors of that municipality by section 33, c. 2, of article 6, of its charter. The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, alleged to have held a mortgage interest in said lot, filed a dismissal of its appeal, leaving Charles F. Hanlon as the sole appellant.

The street improvement assessment, aggregated the sum of $993.13, which is in amount greater than 50 per centum of the value of said lot at which it was assessed upon the last preceding assessment book of the city and county of San Francisco. Subdivision 3 of section 8 of chapter 2, art. 6, of the charter of said city and county of San Francisco, has, since 1913, provided, and still does provide, that—

> "No assessment shall be levied upon any property, which, together with all assessments for street improvements that may have been levied upon the same property during the next year preceding, will amount to a sum greater than fifty per centum of the value at which said property was assessed upon the last preceding assessment book of the city and county."

Section 33, of the same chapter (Stats. 1913, p. 1623), which was a part of the 1913 charter, provided:

> "The method of procedure in this article provided for the improvement of streets, * * * and for the assessment of the expense thereof or any portion of such expense upon private property shall not be deemed exclusive, but the board of supervisors by an affirmative vote of not less than two-thirds of the members thereof, may by ordinance substitute therefor any method of procedure in any general law of the state of California now in force and effect, or as the same may be amended or that may hereafter be enacted, providing for any such improvements in municipalities, and levying assessments for the expense or portion thereof upon private property; or the said board may by a like affirmative vote of the members thereof adopt an ordinance which may from time to time be revised or amended, providing a method of procedure for such improvement and assessment; and in such ordinance if said board deems it expedient, provision may be made for the payment of any assessment levied in pursuance of the provisions thereof in annual installments covering a term not to exceed ten years upon conditions as to said board may seem reasonable and just, the rate of interest to be paid on such payments not to exceed seven per cent. per annum. In any proceeding for the improvement of streets wherein provision is made for the payment of any assessment in annual installments, the amount of such assessment shall not be limited by the provisions contained in subdivision 3 of section 8 of this chapter." (Italics ours.)

Pursuant to this last express authorization of the charter, Ordinance No. 2439 (N. S.) was approved September 4, 1913. Section 29 of said ordinance provides as follows:

> "In case the owner of any lot or parcel of land against which an assessment is imposed desires to avail himself of the privilege of paying such assessment in installments, and for and in consideration of such privilege such owner or person duly authorized by power of attorney (within thirty days from the date of the demand made as required by section 20, or within twenty days from the decision on appeal, if an appeal be taken to the board of supervisors as provided in section 21) shall make and execute before an officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments of the conveyances of real property, and file in the office of the board of public works a bond in triplicate," —substantially in the form therein provided. The form of the bond is a part of said section 29, and provides by its terms that, if the owner of the lot improved acknowledges the regularity and the validity of the assessment that has been imposed on his property and the amount of the assessment, and promises and agrees to pay the same in installments as fixed by the resolution of intention or by the ordinance ordering the work of improvement, he shall be entitled to pay the assessment in installment payments. This is not an unreasonable or injust requirement. Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson, 186 Cal. 267, 199 Pac. 512, 29 A. L. R. 1098. Provision is therein made for the payment of interest, and it is provided that, in the event of default in the payment of any installment or of any interest according to the terms of the bond, then all of such installments or principal and interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable and the board of public works shall sell the property described therein to pay the amount due, together with the expenses of such sale.

Section 39 of said street improvement ordinance, adopted by authority of the charter, further provides:

> "This ordinance is intended to and does provide an alternative system for making the improvements herein provided for, and shall not be held to affect any other method or system provided by the charter of the city and county [of San Francisco] or act of the Legislature, and any proceedings heretofore commenced shall not be affected hereby but shall be continued until completion by and under the method provided by the charter, law or ordinance under which they were originally commenced."

[1] Appellant claims that section 29 of said ordinance is unintelligible, and therefore void. That section has received the attention of this court upon numerous occasions, and its effect in relation to the charter considered. Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 Pac. 225; McGinn v. Van Ness, 40 Cal. App. 600, 181 Pac. 70, 183 Pac. 950; Hutton v. Newhouse, 41 Cal. App. 689, 183 Pac. 276; Federal Const. Co. v. Wolfson, supra; City Improvement Co. v. Pearson, 181 Cal. 640, 185 Pac. 962; Flinn v. Shafter Realty Co., 190 Cal. 316, 212 Pac. 194. This is the first time that the specific objection of unintelligibility has been urged against it. While it may not be structurally or grammatically perfect, there can be no doubt as to its meaning. No difficulty, seemingly, has heretofore been experienced in that respect. Read in its entirety, and in connection with other sections of the ordinance, no doubt can exist as to what was meant thereby.

[2] The proceedings taken by the board of public works and the board of supervisors are regular in every respect. The resolution of intention passed by said board of public works on August 4, 1916, recommending the improvement and thereafter adopted by the board of supervisors, in compliance with section 28 of said ordinance, was as follows:

> "The said board of public works, pursuant to the provisions of part 2 of the street improvement ordinance, does hereby determine and declare that the assessment to be imposed for the said contemplated improvements, respectively, may be paid in five annual installments, and that the rate of interest to be charged on all deferred payments shall be seven per cent. per annum." (Italics ours.)

On the 25th day of June, 1917, following the due course of procedure, the supervisors authorized the board of public works to enter into a contract for the performance of said improvement work; on April 15, 1918, the contract therefor was awarded to plaintiff herein. Appellant Hanlon did not file a written notice with the secretary of said board of public works within 10 days of the first publication of the notice of award, or at any time thereafter, specifying that any previous act or proceeding relating to said improvement was irregular, defective, erroneous, or faulty. Neither did he at any time request the privilege of paying such assessment in installments or at all. He has not paid or offered to pay any part of said assessment. Under the state of the record as presented and the decisions of this court practically determining the point made by appellant against him there remains but little to be said. Section 33, chapter 2, article 6, of the charter of 1913, fully authorized the passage of the ordinance under which this proceeding is had, and subdivision 3 of section 8 of the same chapter must be read in connection therewith.

Section 33 of the charter specifically provides that the general limitation placed upon the amount of the assessment by subdivision 3 of section 8 thereof shall have no application to street improvement assessments wherein provision is made for the payment of the assessment in annual installments.

To the claim that the assessment should have been made payable in installments the answer is that it was so made payable by the express language of the resolution of intention, but appellant refused or failed to conform to the procedure as prescribed pursuant to the provisions of section 29 of said ordinance, and thereby cut himself loose from the privilege which he now invokes.

[3] The proceedings herein were commenced during the existence of the 1913 charter. The charter amendments approved January 18, 1917, did not affect the proceedings begun under the former charter. The amendments simply expressed in direct terms what it had authorized to be done by ordinance under the former charter. All ordinances existing at the time of the adoption of the charter amendments, and not in conflict with or repealed thereby, were continued in force. This is a general rule of statutory construction. Whether the question be determined with reference to the charter as it formerly stood or as amended we see no way by which the payment of the assessment may be avoided. Section 33 of the charter as amended is but an amplification of the old section, making, if possible, more clear the evident intention disclosed by the original section. The procedure providing for the payment of a street assessment which exceeded 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the property in installments having been rejected, the entire amount became at once due.

EATON v. HANLON et al. (S. F. 10596.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚷293(1)—"Resolution of expediency" distinguished from "resolution of intention."

A "resolution of expediency," required by ordinance when the board of public works contemplates street improvements, held merely a procedural preliminary declaration of contemplated proceedings, while the "resolution of intention," required after plans and specifications are prepared, is jurisdictional.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷293(2)—Resolution of expediency held sufficient.

Under ordinance requiring board of public works to adopt resolution of expediency describing proposed street improvement, resolution specifying location, and stating that sidewalks were to be of modified artificial stone, curbs of concrete, and roadway of vitrified brick, held sufficient.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷522—Payment by installments for street improvement is at owner's option.

San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, providing that assessment for street improvement shall be payable in installments, when they exceed one-half the assessed value, means that they shall be so payable at the owner's option, not that he must so pay them, whether he elects to do so or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Clarence B. Eaton against C. F. Hanlon and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

Grover O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a street improvement lien upon the property of defendant Hanlon, situate on Mariposa street, between Potrero avenue and Utah street, city and county of San Francisco. It presents substantially the same questions that were decided in Fay Improvement Co. v. Charles F. Hanlon et al. (S. F. No. 10620) 227 Pac. 482, this day filed. The assessment was made under the same procedure referred to in that case, with the exception that the amended charter of 1917 was in effect at the time the proceedings in this case were commenced, instead of the charter of 1913, as in the other case. The interest of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, is that of a mortgagee.

The amount of the street improvement assessment against said property amounted to the sum of $1,334.075, which was an amount greater than 50 per centum of the value at which said property was assessed for municipal purposes, exclusive of improvements thereon, upon the assessment book of the city and county current at the time of the inception of the improvement proceedings.

That the charter conferred upon the board of supervisors authority to adopt section 29 of the street improvement act is made plain by a perusal of its provisions. Section 33, c. 2, of article 6 of the charter, to the effect that the above limitation shall not apply to any assessments made payable in installments, is about as clear as language can make it. The argument that it is mandatory under the charter of 1917 to require the owner of the property to pay in installments, whether he so desires or not, is not in harmony with the provisions of the charter or the general rules of law. Both the charter and city's improvement ordinance provided that, if the assessment exceeds one-half of the assessed value of the property, provision must be made by the board of supervisors that the owner of the property be permitted to pay in installments if he so desires. The right to impose an assessment greater in amount than 50 per cent. of the actual value of the property is dependent upon whether the board of supervisors has made provision for its payment in installments. If the owner does not choose to accept the benefit extended he surely reserves the right to discharge the debt at once. If the owner declines to accept the privilege guaranteed him, and refuses to pay at all, the court, if suit be brought to foreclose a lien, must give judgment for the whole amount. Defendant Hanlon did not desire to exercise his option. He was given the opportunity to do all that he now contends for. This question, as well as the contention that section 29 of the street improvement ordinance is invalid on the ground that it is unintelligible, is disposed of upon the authority of Fay Improvement Co. v. Hanlon et al., supra, and the cases therein cited.

[1] The only question raised by this appeal that was not decided in the Fay Case, supra, is as to the sufficiency of the expediency resolution. We think the resolution meets every statutory requirement. Section 3 of Street Improvement Ordinance No. 2439 (N. S.) provides:

> "When, in the judgment of the board of public works of said city and county, the public interest or convenience requires that any such improvement be made, the expense of which or any part thereof is to be assessed upon private property and said board deems the same expedient, it shall by resolution declare such expediency and briefly describe such improvement. Thereupon, said board shall cause specifications or plans and specifications for the proposed improvement to be prepared.
> "Section 4. After the specifications or plans and specifications for said contemplated improvement shall have been prepared, as in section 3 provided, the said board shall pass a resolution of its intention to recommend to the supervisors that said improvements be ordered to be made as the same is described in its resolution declaring the expediency thereof. Said resolution of intention shall contain a reference to the specifications or plans and specifications prepared for the contemplated improvement," etc.

[2, 3] The resolution of expediency is nothing more than a preliminary declaration of contemplated proceedings. It has not the importance or force of the resolution of intention. The latter is a jurisdictional requisite, the former procedural. Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson, 186 Cal. 267, 199 Pac. 512, 29 A. L. R. 1098. The expediency resolution was as full in its description of the work to be performed as the ordinance required, and in this respect it provided for "the improvement of Mariposa street between Potrero avenue and Utah street to official line and grade, by the construction of a 6-foot central strip of modified artificial stone sidewalk in accordance with the plan attached to the specifications, and by the construction of concrete curbs and a vitrified brick pavement on the roadway thereof." The reference made by the resolution of expediency to the plan as being attached to the specifications was not required to be inserted therein, and if it should be regarded as mere surplusage the resolution would still contain a sufficient description of the work. It is clear that the sidewalk was to be constructed of modified artificial stone, the curbs were to be concrete, and the roadway was to be of vitrified brick. This meets every requirement of the ordinance. The plans and specifications were approved and adopted on the same day that the preliminary resolution was passed, and were connected therewith by express reference. The ordinance does not require that the description of the work be as minute in descriptive detail as plans and specifications are required to be. It is the resolution of intention which the ordinance requires shall contain a reference to the plans and specifications prepared for the contemplated improvement. Appellant was in no wise prejudiced or misled by the resolution of expediency. The resolution of intention and the plans and specifications, upon inspection, would have given appellants all the information contemplated by the street improvement ordinance. The resolution of intention adopted by the board of supervisors provided that the assessment imposed upon the property might be paid in 10 annual installments. The language of the statute is that the assessment is "payable" in installments, and, of course, this means at the option of the owner, and not that it must be paid in installments whether the owner elects to so pay or not. Aside from the question just discussed we find nothing in this case that is not decided by the case of Fay Improvement Co. v. Hanlon et al., supra, and the cases therein cited.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STAFFORD PACKING CO.

1. Fish 🔑6—Fish packers limited to use of fish in reduction plant authorized by permit.

Fish packers are limited in use of fish in reduction plant by permit from Board of Fish and Game Commissioners, under St. 1919, p. 1204, §§ 4, 6, and section 5, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, § 1, and when permit allowed use of 25 per cent. of fish received, use was restricted accordingly, even though statute authorized permit for 25 per cent. of capacity of plant.

2. Injunction 🔑144—Complaint to enjoin use of fish in reduction plant held to show right to preliminary injunction.

Complaint to enjoin packing company from using more fish than it should in its reduction plant, held to show prima facie that irreparable injury was threatened, and that remedy at law was inadequate so as to warrant preliminary injunction, under St. 1919, p. 1204, § 5, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, § 1, conceding that allegations as to threats and remedy at law were conclusions.

3. Fish 🔑6—State may maintain action to enjoin violation of law by packing company.

State may maintain action in equity to enjoin violation of law by packing company using more fish in its reduction plant than authorized by its permit, on theory that use of such fish is an invasion of property rights held by state in trust for people, in view of Const. art. 1, § 25; Id. art. 4, § 25½; Civ. Code, § 3479; Pen. Code, § 370.

4. Nuisance 🔑1—"Nuisance" defined.

Under Civ. Code, § 3479, Pen. Code, § 370, a nuisance is anything which is injurious to health, or indecent or offensive to senses, or an obstruction to free use of property, so as to interfere with comfortable enjoyment of life or property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Nuisance.]

5. Injunction 🔑152—Whether remedy at law adequate, in first instance question of fact for trial court.

Question whether or not a given remedy at law is adequate is, in first instance, question of fact for trial court, even where evidence is conflicting, if opposing inferences may be reasonably drawn therefrom.

6. Appeal and error 🔑954(1)—Finding that remedy at law inadequate not disturbed unless evidence is legally insufficient to support.

Finding and conclusion of trial court that remedy at law is inadequate, so that injunction should issue, will not be disturbed upon appeal unless it is shown that evidence is legally insufficient to support same.

7. Appeal and error 🔑954(1)—Finding that remedy at law inadequate held not to be disturbed.

On appeal in suit by state for injunction to restrain use of too many fish in reduction plant of packing company, in violation of St. 1919, p. 1204, § 5, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, § 1, trial court's conclusion that remedies at law, provided by St. 1917, p. 1275, making it misdemeanor to pack fish without license, and provision in former giving commission power to suspend license, were inadequate will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Stafford Packing Company. From an order granting a preliminary injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Robert D. Duke, Attorney for Fish and Game Commission, of San Francisco, for the People.

MYERS, C. J. The defendant corporation, which is engaged in the business of canning, packing, and preserving fish, appeals herein from an order granting an injunction pendente lite, restraining the defendant from using, in a reduction plant for the manufacture of fish meal, fish oil, and fertilizer, more than 25 per cent. of all sardines received by it while actually engaged in the canning, packing, and preserving of sardines for human consumption. Sections 4 and 6 of an act to conserve the fish supply in California, etc. (Stats. 1919, pp. 1204, 1205), provide in effect that no person or firm engaged in the business of packing fish shall suffer or permit any preventable deterioration or waste of any fish caught or taken within or without the waters of this state, and brought into this state, or shall divert fish or other fishery products for reduction purposes without first having written permission from the fish and game commission, and that no reduction plant shall receive any fish without such written permission. It is further provided that, if such person or firm is found guilty of violating such permit, the board of fish and game commissioners may, after a hearing, suspend for a period, not to exceed 90 days, any such license which shall have been so issued by it. Section 5 of said act as amended (Stats. 1921, p. 459) provides that no such person or firm shall receive or accept more food fish than its plant can pack or preserve fit for human consumption. It also forbids the use of fish fit for human consumption for reduction purposes, provided that the fish and game commission may, after a hearing, upon application therefor, issue a permit granting the privilege to use in a reduction plant, during a calendar month, an amount of said fish not to exceed 25 per cent. of the amount any such person or firm can pack or preserve for human food during a calendar month.

It is alleged in the complaint herein that the defendant, upon its application and after a hearing, was granted such a permit to use sardines for the manufacture of fish oil, fish meal, or fertilizer during the time it is packing sardines for human food purposes only, provided that the amount so used must not exceed 25 per cent. of the total amount of sardines received at the packing or canning plant of defendant during a calendar month. It is also alleged that continuously during the month of January, 1923, the defendant used fresh sardines fit for canning and preserving purposes, for human consumption, in its reduction plant in excess of the amount allowable under its permit, and in violation of the provisions of law above referred to. It is further alleged that said defendant threatens to continue the use of sardines fit for human consumption in its reduction plant in violation of said order of the commission, and in violation of said laws, "thereby causing great and irrevocable loss and damage to the people of the state of California," and "that there is no speedy and adequate remedy at law." "That said defendant has used said sardines in its reduction plant in the manufacture of fish meal, fish oil, and fertilizer in violation of the laws of the state of California and said orders of the board of fish and game commissioners referred to herein, and threatens to continue to commit said wrongful act unless restrained by this honorable court." The defendant in its answer admits, by failing to deny them, all of the facts alleged in the complaint, except that it denied "that it threatens or ever threatened to continue to use fresh sardines" in its reduction plant as alleged in the complaint. There is no allegation, however, that it does not intend to continue such use of sardines, and it does not allege that it will not continue such use if not restrained by injunction.

Plaintiff supported its application for a provisional injunction by affidavits showing that during the month of January defendant had converted 88.6 per cent. of all the sardines received by it into fish meal and fish oil. Defendant filed counter affidavits in opposition thereto, the allegations of which amount to nothing more than this: That the defendant "has never in any way or by any act threatened, and does not now threaten, to violate any law of the state of California or any order or permit made or issued to it by the fish and game commission of California," and that no "officer, employee or person connected with said corporation has ever made any such threat."

[1] Appellant contends that the order appealed from is in excess of the equity jurisdiction of the court, and that, conceding such jurisdiction, the complaint and evidence were both insufficient to justify its exercise herein. In support of the latter contention, appellant argues that neither the complaint nor the evidence shows a violation on its part of the state law for the reason that the limitation placed thereby upon the quantity of fish which may be used for reduction purposes is "25 per cent. of the amount any such applicant, person, firm, or corporation can can or pack or preserve for human food during a calendar month." Appellant contends that this means 25 per cent. of the maximum capacity of its packing plant. It is not necessary to here determine whether the quoted phrase means that the percentage is to be based upon the theoretical capacity of the packing plant or upon the quantity of fish actually canned, packed, or preserved by it during the month in question. Assuming the correctness of appellant's interpretation of this phrase, the fact still remains that the allegations of the complaint and affidavits do charge facts amounting to a violation both of the law and of the permit issued by the commission. The statute makes it unlawful to use any food fish except fish offal for reduction purposes, except pursuant to and within the limits of a permit issued by the commission. The 25 per cent. mentioned in the statute is the maximum which governs the commission in the issuance of its permit. The maximum which governs the packer is the quantity named in the permit granted by the commission, which may not in any event exceed the maximum set by the statute, but which may be fixed at any less quantity which the commission may prescribe. It is immaterial that the law as interpreted by petitioner would have authorized the commission to issue a permit to the appellant for the use of a larger percentage of fish in its reduction plant. The commission did not do so, and under the law the use of any food fish in a reduction plant is unlawful, except to the extent that it is authorized within the terms of such a permit.

[2] Appellant asserts that an injunction will not issue to prevent the doing of an act which has already been committed, and that the allegation that defendant threatens to continue the doing of the act complained of is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and insufficient as an allegation of fact. These propositions may be conceded. The complaint was filed herein February 14, 1923, and it is alleged therein, and nowhere denied, that throughout the preceding month, January, the defendant used in its reduction plant 88.6 per cent. of all the sardines received by it during that month. This evidences a willful and deliberate violation of the law on the part of the defendant, and justifies the conclusion that it was done pursuant to a policy adopted by the defendant, which the latter would continue to follow unless restrained. It may be conceded, also, that the allegation that "there is no speedy and adequate remedy at law" is a mere conclusion insufficient to entitle plaintiff to the interposition of equity in the absence of the allegation of facts from which such a conclusion would reasonably follow. The necessity and importance of conserving the wild game and fish of this state, for the benefit of the people of the state, have been recognized by this court for the past 30 years (Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129). This is the expressed purpose of the statute hereinabove cited. It was shown herein and is not denied by appellant that it received, during that month of January, 681,623 pounds of fresh sardines fit for canning and preserving purposes, and that it preserved for human consumption less than 12 per cent. thereof. It requires no argument to show that the millions of fish thus destroyed are no longer available to furnish a food supply to the people of the state, or to replenish their own species. If this defendant may thus violate the law with impunity, every other packer may do likewise and would naturally be tempted to do so. Appellant asks us to take judicial notice of the fact that the supply of fish in the Pacific ocean is inexhaustible. If we are authorized to take judicial cognizance upon this subject, we should have to conclude that experience has proven that the available supply of food fish in the ocean in waters readily accessible to the packing plants of the state may be seriously depleted, if not practically exhausted, within a period of a few years, by unrestricted fishing. We are satisfied that the facts alleged and proved herein sufficiently support, prima facie, the conclusions that irreparable injury is threatened, and that the remedy at law is inadequate. Another point bearing upon this latter conclusion will be hereinafter discussed.

[3, 4] Appellant's principal contention is that the state cannot maintain an action in equity for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to prevent the violation of law, except when expressly authorized thereto by statute, and that the sole exception to this rule is where an act sought to be abated or prevented is a public nuisance which affects the health, morals, or safety of the people. Appellant cites a large number of decisions from the courts of other states in support of this contention, but it is not necessary to review them here for the reason that our own courts have spoken definitely upon this question. Appellant concedes that the general right and ownership of fish is in the people of the state, and that the state has the right to regulate and control the taking and disposition thereof. Const. art. 1, § 25; Id. art. 4, § 25½; Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129; People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183; Ex parte Bailey, 155 Cal. 472, 101 Pac. 441, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534, 132 Am. St. Rep. 95; Ex parte Phœdovius, 177 Cal. 238, 170 Pac. 412; In re Parra, 24 Cal. App. 339, 141 Pac. 393. Appellant also concedes that an action to abate a nuisance will not be defeated merely because the act sought to be enjoined is a crime, but appellant insists that an action will not lie to abate or prevent what is charged or alleged to be a niusance "unless it be a nuisance in itself—as the books put it, a nuisance per se."

Appellant defines a nuisance per se as "an act which in itself is not only a violation of law, but which produces results affecting the health, morals, comfort, or peace of the people." The use of fresh fish for conversion into necessary commodities, such as fish meal, fish oil, and fertilizer, not being such a nuisance per se, the conclusion follows that this action will not lie. The fallacy in this argument rests in the restricted definition adopted by appellant. A nuisance is "anything which is injurious to health, or is indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property. * * *" Civ. Code, § 3479; Pen. Code, § 370. (Italics added.) This point was determined adversely to appellant's contention in People v. Truckee Lumber Co., supra. That was an action in the name of the people on the information of the Attorney General to restrain the commission of an alleged nuisance, which consisted in the deposit in the waters of said river of large quantites of refuse matter consisting of sawdust and other deleterious substances, the effect of which was to pollute said stream and the waters thereof and render the same unfit for use, and to kill and destroy the fish therein. The trial court granted the injunction and this court affirmed its action, and in so doing rejected all of the contentions made by appellant herein upon this point. Appellant insists that the decision rested upon the circumstance that the alleged nuisance there complained of was a nuisance per se in that it polluted the waters and rendered them unfit for use. A careful reading of that opinion makes it clear that this is not so. That decision was rested not upon the circumstances that the pollution of the waters created a condition which was "injurious to health" or "offensive to the senses," but upon the fact that it was an invasion of the property rights which were held by the state in trust for the people of the state. In other words, it was "an obstruction to the free use of property." The court there said:

> "The first point made against the complaint is that the facts alleged do not constitute a public nuisance within the definition of our Code. But this objection would seem to overlook the most material feature of the complaint. It is alleged that the acts of defendant have the effect of polluting and poisoning the waters of the river, and thereby killing and destroying the fish therein. Anything which is 'an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property by an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons,' is a public nuisance. Pen. Code, § 370; Civ. Code, §§ 3479, 3480. The fish within our waters constitute the most important constituent of that species of property commonly designated as wild game, the general right and ownership of which is in the people of the state (Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 483, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129), as in England it was in the king; and the right and power to protect and preserve such property for the common use and benefit is one of the recognized prerogatives of the sovereign, coming to us from the common law, and preserved and expressly provided for by the statutes of this and every other state of the Union. The complaint shows that by the repeated and continuing acts of defendant this public property right is being and will continue to be greatly interfered with and impaired, and that such acts constitute a nuisance, both under our statute and at common law, is not open to serious question. People v. Elk River, etc., Co., 107 Cal. 219, 48 Am. St. Rep. 121."

The court there quoted with approval from State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 484, 47 Am. Rep. 199, as follows:

> "It is a well-established principle that every person shall so use and enjoy his own property, however absolute and unqualified his title, that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the public. Hence, while the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishery upon his own land, he must so exercise that right as not to injure others in the enjoyment of a similar right, upon their lands upon the stream above and below."

And, in summing up its conclusion, the court said:

> "The mere fact, then, that the interference or obstruction complained of may in fact be in a stream where the right of fishery is exclusively in private riparian owners, does not make the acts here complained of any less an invasion of the public right, nor prevent the state from protecting its general interest in the property."

It is thus made plain that the basis of equitable interposition in that case was the threatened injury to the property rights of the people which are held in trust by the state for the people. Appellant suggests that the court there rested its action upon the circumstance that the act there complained of "unlawfully obstructed the free use" of the Truckee river, but the court in its opinion expressly recognized that the case did not come within that definition of a nuisance for the reason that the Truckee river was not a navigable stream.

[5-7] Appellant argues that the injunction should not issue herein for the reason that there is an adequate remedy at law. It refers in this connection to the power of the commission, after a hearing, to suspend for a period not exceeding 90 days the license of a packer found guilty of violating its permit. It asserts that this power in conjunction with the provisions of another statute (Stats. 1917, p. 1275), making it a misdemeanor to engage in the business of packing fish without first procuring a license therefor, furnishes a complete and adequate remedy at law. Appellant does not believe that the act providing for the suspension of a license, because of the violation of a permit, is constitutional or valid, but says:

> "However, it is not necessary, for the consideration and determination of the pending controversy, to discuss and determine whether this statutory provision is constitutional. That the law provides a speedy, ample, and effective remedy for committing the offense charged in the operation of a reduction plant is obvious."

If the remedy thus afforded is unconstitutional and therefore nugatory, we cannot quite see how it can be adequate, but for the purposes hereof we shall assume the validity of the statute and the power of the commission thereunder to revoke appellant's license. The question whether or not a given remedy at law is adequate is in the first instance a question of fact for the trial court, and even where the evidence is unconflicting, if opposing inferences may be reasonably drawn therefrom, it still remains a question of fact in the first instance. The finding and conclusion of the trial court thereon will not be disturbed upon appeal, therefore, unless it is shown that the evidence is legally insufficient to support the same. The power of the commission to suspend a license can be exercised only after a hearing had upon written charges filed with the commission and served upon the alleged offender, and upon due notice to the latter. The commission is given the right to issue subpœnas, but has no power to compel obedience to them. If, when the date which has been fixed for the hearing arrives, a witness who has been subpœnaed fails to appear, or appears and refuses to testify, the commission may then file a petition in the superior court setting up these facts, whereupon the latter may issue an order to show cause, and have the same served upon the delinquent witness, requiring him to appear before the court, at a day fixed, to show cause why he should not appear or testify before the commission. Upon such hearing, if it shall appear to the court that said subpœna was regularly issued by the commission, the court shall thereupon enter an order that the witness appear before the commission at a time and place to be fixed by the court. It is thus apparent that a resourceful defendant may delay the proceedings of a hearing before the commission, indefinitely. In the meantime, the defendant may continue the wasteful destruction of fish at the rate of millions per month. If it is finally found guilty by the commission, the utmost penalty which the latter can impose is a suspension of license for a period not exceeding 90 days. In the meantime the fishing season for that particular year will probably have ended, and the 90 days' suspension of license would be inconsequential. If not, as suggested by counsel for the commission, the defendant may then lease his plant to some other person who may continue the operation thereof. We are satisfied that the conclusion of the trial judge that the remedy thus afforded is not adequate cannot and should not be disturbed by us. We do not understand appellant to seriously contend that the criminal prosecution of defendant, upon a misdemeanor charge for violating the terms of its permit, would afford an adequate remedy herein.

It is suggested that the court in issuing this injunction was assuming to exercise the police power of the state, and in so doing invaded the exclusive province of the Legislature. It is said that, if the court had the authority to issue this injunction under the circumstances existing, it might have done so equally in the absence of any act of the Legislature regulating the taking and use of fish, or limiting the quantity thereof to be used for reduction purposes. In other words, that it could have established by judicial fiat a rule that no more than 25 per cent. of the sardines may be so used, and that in so doing it would have been, in effect, enacting a statutory rule, and so usurping the province of the Legislature. This involves an erroneous conception of the nature and effect of the court's action. In the first place, the court acted only upon the facts of the particular case and with reference only to the parties thereto. The decree issued by it did not have, and could not have had, the binding effect of law as a rule governing the action of any one other than the parties to that action. The Legislature in enacting the regulations here involved was exercising the police power of the state. The effect of those regulations was to make the use of fish for reduction purposes in excess of the limits there prescribed both wrongful and unlawful, but the court in the action herein was not at all concerned with the unlawfulness of those acts, but only with their wrongfulness as an invasion of the property rights of the people. Having determined that the acts complained of constituted a wrongful invasion of those property rights, and having further determined that the threatened continuance thereof would work irreparable injury for which there was no adequate remedy at law, there was a complete foundation for equitable interposition and equitable relief.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MEIER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR STANISLAUS COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2820.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1924.)

1. Justices of the peace 🔑166(2)—Statute requires dismissal of appeals not brought to trial within year and not actions as expressed in act.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, requires dismissal of "appeals" from justice to superior courts, if not brought to trial within year, rather than of "actions," as therein expressed.

2. Statutes 🔑189—Harmful results of literal interpretation considered.

It is not legitimate function of courts to legislate, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1858, but in construing laws they are not always governed by literal phraseology, if application of law, so construed, would produce harmful results.

3. Statutes 🔑201—Courts may substitute correct word.

If context or other considerations show erroneous use of one word for another, substitution of which will make statute harmonious, courts may correct error.

4. Statutes 🔑117(1)—Act referring solely to dismissal of appeals in title void as to requirement of dismissal of actions.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, if construed as requiring dismissal of both action and appeal from justice to superior court, if appeal is not brought to trial within year from filing, would be void as to provision for dismissal of action, as not expressing subject-matter in title, in violation of Const. art. 4, § 24.

5. Justices of the peace 🔑166(2)—Appeal from justice to superior court must be dismissed, if not brought to trial within year, in absence of stipulation.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, is mandatory, and, in absence of showing that time within which appeals from justice court to superior court must be brought to trial has been extended by stipulation, trial court must order appeal dismissed.

6. Mandamus 🔑43—Refusal to produce account book for inspection by defendant held immaterial in mandamus to compel dismissal of appeal from justice's judgment for plaintiff.

Whether plaintiff's counsel represented to defendant's counsel that book containing account sued on had been mislaid and could not be produced for inspection on defendant's demand, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1000, held immaterial on plaintiff's application for writ of mandate to compel superior court to dismiss appeal from justice's court for failure to bring it to trial within year, as required by section 981a; penalty for not complying with demand, being exclusion of entries of account as evidence.

Application by H. C. Meier for writ of mandate to Superior Court of Stanislaus County, L. W. Fulkerth, Judge. Writ granted.

Albert L. Johnson, of Modesto, for petitioner.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent court and the judge thereof, on a motion to that end, made in said court, to make and enter an order dismissing the appeal in a certain action appealed to said court from the justice's court of Newman township, in the county of Stanislaus.

The motion to dismiss was based upon section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was added to said Code by an act of the Legislature of 1923, the title of which reads as follows:

"An act to add a new section to the Code of Civil Procedure, to be numbered 981a relating to dismissal of appeal." Stats. 1923, p. 755.

Said section reads as follows:

"No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken; provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, a judgment or dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924; and provided, further, that any superior court may, by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted, provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year."

The petition for the writ of mandate shows: That the petitioner, on the 21st day of February, 1922, commenced an action in the justice's court of said Newman township against one John H. Elfers and his brother, Louis Elfers, to obtain a judgment for moneys alleged to be due petitioner for materials furnished and labor performed at the special instance and request of said Elfers Bros.; that said Louis Elfers did not answer the complaint, but that within due time said John H. Elfers answered the complaint and as to him the case came to issue, was subsequently tried and judgment rendered and entered in favor of the petitioner against both defendants in the sum of $297.10, with interest, all amounting to the sum of $356.11; that on the 22d day of December, 1922, the said John H. Elfers appealed the case to the respondent court, upon questions of both law and fact; that on the 2d day of January, 1923, attorney for defendant and appellant caused the case to be set for trial on the 8th day of May, 1923, at 10 o'clock a. m., in department 1 of the respondent court, presided over by the respondent judge; that several days prior to and on the 8th day of May, 1923, the respondent judge informed the respective attorneys of the appellant in the court below and the petitioner (respondent in the case on appeal) that it would not be possible to try said case upon that day (May 8, 1923), and that the trial thereof would have to be postponed to a later date, "because of the precedence of another trial upon the calendar" of said court; that thereafter "neither the appellant nor his attorney ever made any effort to set the said case for trial and to determine the appeal herein until after the lawful period for setting said cause had expired; that said appeal was not brought to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court."

The petition further states that, on the 10th day of January, 1924, the petitioner filed with the clerk of respondent court and served a written notice, dated January 5, 1924, that he would, on the 14th day of January, 1924, move the said court for an order dismissing the appeal of said John H. Elfers in said case "upon the ground that the said appeal had not been brought to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court," it being further alleged that the time within which the statute requires such action on appeal to be brought to trial was not extended by stipulation of the parties filed with the clerk of the superior court. The written notice of motion followed the language of section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure and not only called for a dismissal of the appeal but also a dismissal of the action.

On the 14th day of January, 1924, said motion to dismiss was heard upon the papers in the case and affidavits by the respective parties and their respective attorneys, and, the matter having been on that day submitted for decision, the respondents took the same under advisement, and later made and caused to be entered an order denying said motion, and at the same time set the case down for trial for the 25th day of February, 1924.

To the petition here the respondents, as a return to the order to show cause, have filed an answer setting forth a brief history of the case from its inception in the justice's court to the date of the hearing of the motion to dismiss, including the pleadings in said case and affidavits filed in the respondent court by the appellant there in support of his resistance to the motion and counter affidavits likewise filed by the petitioner. The salient facts stated in the petition are not denied nor controverted.

[1] The court in its written decision denying the motion, which is embodied in the return to the application for the writ herein sought, found that no written stipulation entered into by the parties extending the time for bringing the action to trial beyond the time prescribed by section 981a had ever been filed with the clerk of the said court, nor was there an oral stipulation made in open court extending the time, "but the court denies the motion to dismiss on the ground that the section relied on, to wit, section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides for the dismissal of the action as well as the appeal from the judgment, and that, as the motion to dismiss follows the exact language of the section, and is as broad as the section itself a granting of the motion to dismiss would have the effect of putting respondent (petitioner here) out of court on his own motion. The motion to dismiss," proceeds the decision, "is also denied on the ground that section 981a is void for uncertainty."

The language of the section seems plain enough, but, literally viewed, involves the very quintessence of absurdity. The section seems to place solely upon the appealing party the duty of bringing the action to trial within the year limit prescribed thereby, and if he defaults in that particular, there is, viewing strictly the language of the section, no alternative left to him or some other interested party, or the court on its own motion, but to dismiss the action. In other words, the section affords no choice as between dismissing the appeal, if such a course be authorized thereby and dismissing the action, but, in mandatory language, declares that the action must, in any event, be dismissed. Thus the respondent in the court below would be compelled, without fault or negligence on his part, to suffer the loss of the fruits or benefit of the judgment he obtained in the inferior court.

Doubtless, if the section as it now reads could be upheld as a reasonable legal enactment in all its terms, the respondent below, on failure of the appealing party to press the trial of the action within the specified time, would himself be entitled to force the action to trial within said time. At any rate, such respondent would be required to do this, in case the appealing party failed to bring the action to trial within the period prescribed or lose the benefit of his judgment.

It appears very clear, however, that the Legislature must have inadvertently and unintentionally used the word "actions" in the section in the place of the word "appeals." This proposition would seem to be supportable, not alone upon a consideration of the unreasonableness of the section or the preposterous consequences following literally the application thereof as it now stands, but also by a consideration of the section in its entirety and also the title of the act adding it to the Code. The first part of the section, it will be noted, does not expressly refer to the dismissal of appeals. It will further be perceived that the latter part of the section contains two provisos, at least one, if not both, of which refer to the dismissal of appeals and not to the dismissal of actions. It would seem to be obviously true that, if the Legislature in enacting the section had intended, ex industria, thus to authorize the dismissal of the actions because of default on the part of the appealing party to bring the same to trial within the prescribed time limit, it would have carried that intention through the entire section in language so clear as not to leave the matter in doubt. This it failed to do, as the two provisos referred to plainly demonstrate. Again, when we look to the title of the act adding section 981a to the Code to ascertain the subject-matter thereof, we find that it refers solely to the dismissal of appeals in such actions, and does not refer to or mention "dismissal of actions." We may assume that the Legislature, in the making of laws, always purposes to follow the mandates of the Constitution as to the manner of the enactment thereof, and that, had it intended to include in the section under review a provision that such actions should be dismissed for failure to bring them to trial within the specified time, it would have expressed that intention in the title thereof. From all these considerations it would seem there could follow no other rational conclusion than that the Legislature, rather than intending to say in the section that "all such actions heretofore or hereafter appealed must be dismissed," meant to say that the appeals in all such actions shall be dismissed. In brief, it is clear that, considering the section as a whole, together with the title of the action adding it to the Code, the true index of the legislative intent as to the penalty to be imposed for the failure to bring the action to trial within the prescribed time is contained in the second proviso of the section.

[2, 3] It is the established rule that, in the construction of statutes or written instruments, "the office of the judge is simply to ascertain and declare what is in terms or in substance contained therein, not to insert what has been omitted, or to omit what has been inserted" (section 1858, Code Civ. Proc.), which means, of course, that it is not within the legitimate function of courts to legislate or to make contracts for parties; yet it is the duty of the courts to give enforcement to all laws enacted by the Legislature which are, in their provisions and purposes, harmonious with the provisions of the federal and state Constitutions, but in construing such laws they are not required in all cases to be governed by the literal phraseology thereof or bound to the acceptance and approval of every word they contain, if, by so doing, such laws, when applied, would produce harmful rather than beneficial results. If the use of a single word in a statute would render it an unreasonable exercise of the legislative power, when applied to given cases, then it would be the bounden duty of the courts to so declare. In such case, however, if the context of the statute or other considerations therefrom arising show that the word has been by the Legislature erroneously used for another word which, when substituted for the mischievous one, will make the statute harmonious in all its parts and with the obvious purpose and intent of the statute so that its enforcement will be in full accord with such purpose and intent, then the courts may correct the error. This proposition is well stated, and the text sustained by many cases cited in the footnotes thereof, in 25 Ruling Case Law, § 227, p. 978, as follows:

> "Legislative enactments are not more than any other writings to be defeated on account > of mistakes, errors or omissions, provided the intention of the Legislature can be collected from the whole statute. Where one word has been erroneously used for another, or a word omitted, and the context affords the means of correction, the proper word will be deemed substituted or supplied. This is but making the strict letter of the statute yield to the obvious intent."

See, also, Swinnerton v. Monterey County, 76 Cal. 113, 115, 18 Pac. 135; Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 384, 387, 55 Pac. 1060.

[4] It may be suggested that, if the section may be viewed as providing both for the dismissal of appeals and the dismissal of actions, the results here would be the same. If the language of the section, "and all such actions heretofore or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein," etc., had been omitted from the section, the language immediately preceding it, "no action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior, court shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings had therein," would necessarily imply, and, indeed, carry with it the right to have the appeal dismissed. Hence it might be argued that the intention of the Legislature was to provide both for the dismissal of the appeals in such actions and the dismissal of such actions. Thus construing the section, the provision authorizing the dismissal of such actions would have to be eliminated, for the reason that, since the dismissal of appeals and the dismissal of actions involve two different and wholly unrelated or dissimilar subjects, and the matter of the dismissal of such actions is not expressed in the title of the act adding said section to the Code, the enactment, in so far as it purports to provide for the dismissal of such actions, is unconstitutional and void. Article 4, § 24, Const. That section of the Constitution provides, in part:

> "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any such subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title."

Thus it will be perceived that upon that theory of the act incorporating said section into the Code of Civil Procedure the provision of the section purporting to authorize the dismissal of such action would have to be expunged from the section, leaving it merely as the authority for the dismissal of appeals in such actions.

We will rest our conclusion herein, however, on the interpertation of the section first above given, viz.: That the phrase, "all such actions must be dismissed," was erroneously used by the Legislature; it being the intention of the lawmaking body, as the same is gathered from the context of the act and the title thereof, to use in place of said phrase the language, "all such appeals must be dismissed." And upon this construction of the section, and the showing made by the petitioner, it is clear that the prayer of the petition should be granted and the respondents directed to grant petitioner's motion to dismiss the appeal but not the action.

[5] Section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure is mandatory in its terms, and, in the absence of a showing that the time within which the section requires actions appealed from a justice court to a superior court must be brought to trial has been extended by stipulation of the parties entered into prior to the expiration of the time limit and duly filed, then there is nothing left for the trial court to do but to order the appeal dismissed. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 Pac. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670, Perrin v. Miller, 35 Cal. App. 129, 169 Pac. 426; Ravn v. Planz, 37 Cal. App. 735, 174 Pac. 690; Boyd v. S. P. R. R. Co., 185 Cal. 344, 346, 197 Pac. 58. These cases involve motions to dismiss actions as authorized by sections 581a (for failure to cause summons to be issued within a year) and section 583 (for failure to bring the action to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer) of the Code of Civil Procedure. The language and the general purpose of those sections, though, are the same as those of section 981a, and all said sections, the last named as well as the former, are, in their application, governed by the same principle. In fact, all three are analogous, if indeed, they may not strictly be so denominated, to statutes of limitations.

[6] As the trial court stated in its written decision, there was no stipulation, either in writing or orally made in open court, between the parties, extending the time for the trial of the action beyond the period fixed by the statute. The affidavits of the attorney for the respondent below and his client contained statements that they had made a demand on the attorney for the petitioner for an inspection of the book containing the account upon which the action was predicated and for a copy of said account (section 1000, Code Civ. Proc.); that counsel for the petitioner here represented to said counsel that said book had been mislaid or could not be found, and that he was unable to furnish the respondent in the court below a copy of the account or produce the book itself for inspection by him. The affidavit of the attorney for the petitioner declares that he had no recollection of stating that the book had been lost; that the same was in his office at the time the demand was made, and was there at the time of the making of his affidavit, and that he was ready to produce the same at any time the action might have been seasonably brought to trial. This matter, however, is wholly immaterial to the inquiry here. If the action had been brought to trial within time, and counsel had failed to comply with the demand of the defendant in the action below for an inspection of the book containing the account upon which the action was brought, or had failed to furnish said party a copy of said account, the penalty as imposed by the statute would be, in the absence of a legal excuse for not complying with the demand, that the entries of the account in the books would be excluded as evidence in the case. See section 1000, Code Civ. Proc. Obviously, this proposition has no bearing upon the question before us in this proceeding.

Let a peremptory writ of mandamus issue requiring the respondents here to make and enter an order dismissing the appeal referred to herein.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. (Cr. 775.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 10, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1924.)

1. Rape 🔑60—Jury held not required to fix place of imprisonment.

In prosecution for rape committed on female under 16, before 1923 amendment (St. 1923, p. 271) of Pen. Code, § 264, became effective, jury was not required to make finding in verdict as to whether defendant should be confined in county jail or state prison; latter being place fixed by section 261, subd. 1.

2. Criminal law 🔑14—Amendment of law as to punishment held not bar to punishment for act already committed in violation of amended law.

Act May 8, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 271), amending Pen. Code, § 264, to provide for punishment of rape on female under 18 in violation of section 261, subd. 1, by imprisonment in county jail or state prison, as recommended by jury, does not bar punishment of act already committed in violation of amended law, in view of Pol. Code, § 329.

3. Rape 🔑6—Question of force immaterial in prosecution for rape on female under age of consent.

Question of force is immaterial in prosecution for rape on female under age of consent.

4. Rape 🔑59(9)—Instruction held not prejudicial to defendant, as depriving jury of right to fix place of punishment.

In prosecution for rape on female 15 years old, instruction as to defendant's guilt, if female was under 18, held not prejudicial to defendant, as depriving jury of right to fix place of punishment, under Pen. Code, § 264 (before amendment of 1923 [St. 1923, p. 271]), in absence of any testimony that prosecutrix was over 16.

5. Rape 🔑59(14)—Instruction that element of force was inapplicable held proper, in absence of evidence thereof, in statutory rape case.

In prosecution for rape on female under age of consent, instruction that neither element of force nor question of consent was applicable held proper, in absence of testimony showing any element of force.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Felty Hersie Davis was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. On the 30th day of August, 1923, an information was filed in the superior court of the county of Mendocino charging the defendant with the commission of rape, a felony, as follows, to wit:

> "The said Felty Hersie Davis, on or about the 23d day of June, A. D. 1923, at the said Mendocino county, state of California, and before the filing of this information, then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously had and accomplished an act of sexual intercourse with and upon one Wilda Finley, a female person, then and there under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of 15 years, and not the wife of the said defendant, Felty Hersie Davis, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

Trial was had on January 2 and 3, 1924. The defendant was found guilty, the verdict reading as follows:

> "We, the jury, find the said defendant guilty as charged in the information."

Thereafter, and on the 7th day of January, 1924, judgment was rendered and sentence pronounced, as provided by section 264, Penal Code, as it existed prior to the amendment, approved May 8, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 271). The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, defendant appeals therefrom, and from the judgment entered as aforesaid.

[1] It is urgently contended by the appellant that the verdict rendered by the jury is void, and that the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment upon the defendant by reason of the fact that the amendment to section 264 of the Penal Code, as it existed at the date of the trial, required the jury to return in its verdict a finding as to whether the defendant should be confined in the county jail or in the state prison. At the time of the commission of the offense the amendment to section 264, enacted by the Legislature in 1923, had not yet become effective. Section 264, Penal Code, at that date read as follows:

> "Rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than fifty years, except where the offense is under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code and the female is over the age of sixteen years and under the age of eighteen years in which case the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years, and in such case the jury shall determine by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison."

Subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

> "Rape is an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances: 1. Where the female is under the age of eighteen years."

It will thus be seen that, at the time the offense in question was committed, the jury was required to fix the place of punishment only when the female in question was between the ages of 16 and 18 years. The information upon which the defendant was arraigned, tried, and found guilty charged the defendant with the offense of rape committed upon a female of the age of 15 years; hence there was no law requiring the jury to make any finding in its verdict as to the place of incarceration, the law fixing that place as the state penitentiary. Neither the court nor the jury was given any discretion in the matter.

[2] By the act approved May 8, 1923, section 264 of the Penal Code was amended to read as follows:

> "Rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than fifty years, except where the offense is under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, in which case the punishment shall be either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years, and in such case the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison: Provided, that when the defendant pleads guilty of an offense under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code the punishment shall be in the discretion of the trial court, either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years."

The evident intention of the Legislature was to correct the omission in the section as it originally stood, to empower the court upon plea of guilty to exercise the discretion which had theretofore been vested in the jury upon trial, when the female outraged was between the ages of 16 and 18 years; but the unhappy wording of the section makes the amendment apply to all cases coming under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, when the female is under the age of 18 years. The amended section did not become effective until some little time after the commission of the offense for which the defendant was tried and convicted, but was in full force and effect at the date of the trial. Upon this state of facts the appellant devotes a large portion of his brief to an exposition and setting forth of the cases having to do with ex post facto laws. With these cases and the definition of what constitutes an ex post facto law we agree, but not with their applicability to the case at bar.

In the presentation of this case section 329 of the Political Code appears to have been overlooked. That section reads as follows:

> "The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment or information and punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act."

There is nothing in the section, as amended by the act of the Legislature of May 8, 1923, indicating any intention to interfere in any manner whatever with any offense previously committed, the mode of procedure, or the punishment affixed thereto. It has been held by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 597, 26 Pac. 61, that this section applies to a section changed by amendment, and also to instances where the punishment is changed by an amendment to the section. This case contains a full exposition of the applicability of section 329, and we do not need to add anything thereto further than to state that it fully and definitely decides the questions presented to this court adversely to the appellant.

[3] It is next contended by the appellant that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury. The instructions assailed are as follows:

> "In the present case, neither the element of force or the question of consent has any application at all."

The information charges the defendant with the commission of rape upon a female of the age of 15 years. Being under the age of consent, the offense would be the same whether force were or were not used.

[4] The court further instructed the jury:

> "It is not essential to a conviction in this action that the testimony of the prosecutrix, Wilda Finley, should be corroborated by other evidence. It is sufficient if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt, from all the evidence in the case, that the crime charged, has in fact been committed as alleged," and then gave the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence, beyond and to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, that on the date mentioned, to wit, June 23, 1923, at the said county of Mendocino, state of California, this defendant did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously carnally know and have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon one Wilda Finley, a female person, who was not then and there the wife of the said defendant, and that she, the said Wilda Finley, was then and there under the age of 18 years, then you should find the defendant guilty as charged."

The only objection which could be urged to this instruction would be that, if the female was between the ages of 16 and 18 years, it would be incumbent upon the jury to fix the place of punishment, in the event they found the defendant guilty. No testimony has been called to our attention showing that the age of Wilda Finley was other than that alleged in the information, from which it follows that the defendant was not in any wise prejudiced, because, unless there is some testimony to that effect, it was not a matter for the jury to consider. It was simply a question of whether they believed beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony introduced that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged in the information. The verdict of the jury so found. This eliminates everything that might be founded upon the assumption of the female being between the ages of 16 and 18 years, as the law relating to such offenses then stood.

[5] The instructions did not charge upon questions of fact but simply stated the law in ordinary language which we think the jury could very well understand. We may also add that our attention has not been called to any testimony showing any element of force, one way or the other, or any reason why the first instruction quoted was not applicable to the case as presented to the jury. Without any setting forth herein, we will add that we have read the instructions given by the court to the jury as a whole, and when so taken, we find nothing objectionable therein, or anything upon which an order of reversal might be predicated. The record discloses that the defendant had a fair trial, according to the law applicable to his case.

It therefore follows that the order of the trial court denying a new trial and the judgment entered herein should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. DEWINDT. (Cr. 1084.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1167(1)—Error in description of person injured held not cause for reversal.

Possible error in indictment in describing irrigation district from which defendant was alleged to have embezzled money, as municipal corporation, held not cause for reversal; no injury to defendant being shown.

2. Embezzlement ⚷11(1)—Demand for money in defendant's possession and his refusal to return it not essential to conviction.

It is not necessary to conviction to show demand upon defendant for funds in his possession and alleged to have been embezzled and his refusal to comply with demand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Harry Dewindt was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Berry, of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. Appellant was charged with the embezzlement of $942 from the Imperial irrigation district. The jury returned a verdict against the defendant, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant was employed as assistant cashier of the Calipatria division of the Imperial irrigation district from the 26th day of July, 1923, to and including the 18th day of August, 1923. On August 9, 1923, Mr. Hewitt, the cashier of this division of the district, went on a vacation, and the defendant was left in charge of the office of the district during the absence of the cashier. The defendant was arrested on Saturday, the 16th day of August, 1923, at about 7 o'clock in the evening. At the time of his arrest he had on his person $792, money belonging to the Imperial irrigation district. He had previously made arrangements with one Pelfey to drive him from Calipatria to Calexico, and he was arrested just as he was leaving his room on his way to Pelfey's machine, in which he was to ride from Calipatria to Calexico. A few days before his arrest he had made several trips to Mexicali, which is just across the international boundary line, between California and Mexico, from the city of Calexico. On one of these trips he had been observed by Mr. Guest, the superintendent of the Calipatria division of the irrigation district, who testified that he saw the defendant gambling. Immediately after his arrest he said to the arresting officer:

> "Well, there is no use, I had just as well be a good sport. I am only short about $100, and I will fix that up all right."

Mr. Guest, the superintendent, testified that he had a conversation with the defendant at the city jail at Calipatria shortly after his arrest, and the following is Mr. Guest's testimony:

> "He said he spent some of the money in Mexicali, and he intended to repay it back, but that he had spent so much he didn't see how he could pay it back. I asked him how much he had spent, and he said $150 or $200 at the outside.
> "Q. Did he say how he had spent the money in Mexicali? A. Yes, sir; gambling.
> "Q. State anything else he said. A. He said, after thinking he had spent so much he couldn't pay it back, he might as well get all he could and get away before they caught him."

On August 20, 1923, an audit of the books of the company showed a total shortage in defendant's account with the district of $1,005.45. The testimony further showed that the defendant, at 11 o'clock on the morning of the day of his arrest, drew from the bank, on a check drawn by him to "Cash," the sum of $250. When asked by an officer of the bank if it was not out of the ordinary to draw such a check at such a time, the defendant replied that he was drawing the check to pay some bills. The testimony further shows that the defendant in his conversation with Mr. Guest, the superintendent, shortly after his arrest, admitted that, besides the $792 which was taken from him, he still owed the district something like $150 to $200, and that, if given time, he could get the amount due from him, and he would pay it to the district, and that, after the audit of the books of the district had been made, he did pay to the district the sum of $213.45, to cover the balance due from him.

The information charges that the defendant was the agent and servant of the Imperial irrigation district, "a municipal corporation," and that, by virtue of his employment, the money belonging to the said district, and which he was accused of embezzling, came into his hands as such agent and servant, and that thereafter he embezzled and appropriated this money to his own use.

[1] Appellant contends that there was no evidence introduced at the trial which tended to prove that the Imperial irrigation district was a municipal corporation, but that the only evidence upon this point was to the effect that the Imperial irrigation district was a quasi public or a quasi municipal corporation. He further contends that he was charged with embezzling the money of a municipal corporation, and that the prosecution could not substitute any other corporation in the place of the one designated in the information. By reference to the information it would appear that appellant was charged with embezzling the money of the Imperial irrigation district, a municipal corporation. The status of the Imperial irrigation district, and whether it was or was not a municipal corporation, was to be determined from the statute which provided for its formation, and not from any evidence that might have been introduced at the trial. The designation of the Imperial irrigation district, in the information, as a municipal corporation was not a material part of the information. At most it was simply a description of the person injured, and, even conceding that this was an erroneous description, yet it does not appear from anything that has been brought to our attention that the defendant was in any way injured by this misdescription. The Imperial irrigation district, we assume, was a well-known institution in the community where the defendant resided. It was evidently well known to the defendant, who was, at the time of his arrest, an employee thereof. Defendant does not claim to have been misled by any failure to properly describe in the information the Imperial irrigation district, or to have sustained any injury by any such mistake. If, therefore, there was any error in the description of the Imperial irrigation district, as long as this error worked no injury to the defendant, it is not such an error as would justify this court in disturbing the judgment rendered against the defendant.

[2] It is next contended by the appellant that before he could be found guilty of the crime of embezzlement it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that a demand had been made upon him for the money in his possession, belonging to the district, and that he had refused to return the money after such demand. The only authority cited by appellant in support of this contention is People v. Crane, 34 Cal. App. 599, 168 Pac. 377. This case, in our opinion, not only fails to sustain appellant's position, but holds directly to the contrary. On page 610 (168 Pac. 381) of the opinion of this case we find the following statement of the law upon this subject:

> "The contention that no embezzlement of the money could take place without a demand by the owner for its return having been previously made upon the defendant is untenable. A demand for the return of property or money intrusted to a bailee or trustee, followed by a refusal to return the property or money, is not itself an element of the crime of embezzlement, but constitutes mere evidence of embezzlement. It is true that a demand, followed by a refusal, is sometimes indispensable evidence of embezzlement, but it is the fraudulent and felonious conversion of the money or other property that constitutes the offense, and that may often be proved without a demand [citing cases]."

We have found no authority in conflict with this case of People v. Crane, and in our opinion it completely disposes of this contention of appellant.

There was no error on the part of the court in refusing to give two instructions requested by the appellant. These proposed instructions were offered upon the theory that in order to prove that defendant was guilty of embezzlement it was necessary for the prosecution to prove a demand for the return of the money in the possession of defendant, and a refusal on the latter's part to comply with such demand. We have already considered that subject, and have held adversely to appellant's contention that such proof of demand and refusal were necessary in a prosecution for embezzlement. These proposed instructions, therefore, in our opinion, fail to correctly state the law, and the court committed no error in refusing to give them.

In a general way appellant raises the point that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. The point, however, was not argued to any extent by appellant. We conclude, therefore, that this point has been practically abandoned by the appellant. We have, however, reviewed the evidence in the case, and in our opinion it was clearly sufficient to warrant the jury in rendering a verdict of guilty against the defendant.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VANDERBURG. (Cr. 750.)

1. Criminal law 🔑103(1)—Escape 🔑1—Person escaping from guards outside walls escapes from "prison," and trial may be had in any county; "prisoner."

A person serving a sentence in state prison is, in contemplation of law, a "prisoner" therein when at work outside prison under surveillance of prison guards, and if he escapes when outside he escapes from "prison," within meaning of Pen. Code, § 787, permitting charge of escape from state prison to be tried in any county of state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Prison; Prisoner.]

2. Escape 🔑1—Escape from employee paid by highway commission, acting under prison captain of guard, constituted "escape from prison."

Escape by convict from employee paid by highway commission, but acting directly under prison captain of guard, constituted offense of "escape from prison" under Pen. Code, § 106.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Escape.]

3. Criminal law 🔑786(2)—Instruction as to impeachment of witness held not prejudicial.

Where defendant in prosecution for escape testified, an instruction that a witness may be impeached by party against whom he or she is called by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that he or she has been convicted of a felony, or by evidence that he or she has at other times made inconsistent statements, held not prejudicial, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052.

4. Statutes 🔑74(1)—Statute penalizing escape held to operate uniformly.

Pen. Code, § 106, relating to escape, is not unconstitutional, as not operating uniformly with other penal provisions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Lawrence Vanderburg was convicted of escaping from state prison, and appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The defendant, a prisoner regularly confined within the state prison, at Folsom, Cal., was, while serving his term of imprisonment, taken from said prison to the county of Trinity, to work in road construction in that county, and while there he escaped from the surveillance of the prison guards. He was convicted of the offense and prosecutes this appeal.

The notice of appeal states that the appeal is taken from the final judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial do not appear. However, in the written application for a transcript of the testimony, the "grounds of said appeal" as therein set forth are the usual grounds of motion for a new trial. However that may be, the case will be dealt with as if a proper motion for a new trial was embodied in the record.

Appellant appears in his own behalf, and by a lengthy brief urges four main points wherein error was committed to his prejudice: First, it is claimed that, as the offense was committed in Trinity county, the superior court of Sacramento county had no jurisdiction; secondly, that no proper proof was given as to the fact that he was under surveillance of a prison guard when he escaped; thirdly, that a certain instruction as to impeachment was erroneous; fourthly, that the section of the law under which this conviction was had is unconstitutional, in that it does not operate uniformly.

[1] 1. The superior court of Sacramento county had jurisdiction. In the case of Bradford v. Glenn, as Judge of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, 188 Cal. 350, 205 Pac. 449, this question was before the Supreme Court of the state, under proceedings in mandamus, and it was there held that—

> "A person serving a sentence of imprisonment in a state prison is, in contemplation of law, a prisoner therein, as well when at work outside under the surveillance of prison guards as when confined within its walls, so that if he escapes when outside he escapes from a prison, within the meaning of section 787 [Pen. Code]."

Section 787 of the Penal Code provides that a charge of escaping from a prison may be tried in any county of the state.

[2] 2. At the trial proof was offered, without objection, of the fact that one Kaiser was a regular guard of the state prison at Folsom; that he was detailed from that prison, to act as a guard at the road camp in Trinity county. He was at all times subject to the authorities of the prison, and was directly under a prison captain of the guard. By cross-examination it did appear that while acting as such guard his salary was paid by the California highway commission from state highway funds. As far as his duties were concerned, the guarding of prisoners while at road camps, he took orders from prison officials only. He was in no sense under the jurisdiction of the highway commission. The proof was sufficient and was admitted without objection.

[3] 3. The proof on the part of the people in part consisted of the original record of conviction of the defendant. At the time of its introduction it should have been limited to the single issue then before the trial court as to the issue: "Was this defendant a lawfully confined prisoner?" Later, if defendant became a witness, it should have been reoffered for all purposes, including impeachment. The very charge on trial of necessity demanded proof of prior conviction of a felony. The trial court gave the following instruction, proposed by the people:

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "A witness may be impeached by the party against whom he or she is called by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that he or she has been convicted of a felony, or by evidence that he or she has at other times made statements inconsistent with his or her present testimony."

This is but a statement of a portion of sections 2051 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same instruction in general terms is given in most criminal cases. Under the circumstances I cannot see that any substantial right of the defendant was interfered with, or taken away, or that he could have suffered any prejudice by reason of this instruction. In this connection it is proper to remark that the defendant offered no instructions.

[4] 4. As to the claim that section 106 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional, in that it does not operate uniformly with other penal provisions, we cannot agree. The section does affect any and all persons convicted under it in the same manner.

Failing to find any reversible error in the record, and there being sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Proc. § 1847.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑706(6, 7)—Negligence and contributory negligence held for jury on evidence as to collision.

Evidence that plaintiff had defective eyesight, that the evening was dark and rain falling, making streets slippery, and that impact with defendant's heavy truck demolished plaintiff's Ford, and thrust truck around, held not to show as a matter of law that direct cause of accident was defendant's negligence, or that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

4. Evidence 🔑7—Common knowledge that water on glass obscures vision.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the vision of one attempting to look through glass becomes obscured when water is falling upon and trickling down and over it.

5. Negligence 🔑82—Contributory negligence defense.

Plaintiff's negligence, amounting to a want of ordinary care which, operating concurrently with defendant's negligence, contributes proximately to plaintiff's injuries, will prevent a recovery, whether or not defendant by exercise of ordinary care could have guarded against it.

6. Trial 🔑296(4, 5) — Error in instruction cured by other instructions.

In action for injuries due to automobile collision, error in instruction on contributory negligence held cured by other instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by C. F. Phillips against the Hobbs-Parson Company, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. K. Harris and Harris & Hayhurst, all of Fresno, for appellant.

George Cosgrave and George R. Lovejoy, both of Fresno, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict returned for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered upon the verdict.

On the 15th day of November, 1920, near the hour of 5 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff, while driving a Ford roadster in a southerly direction along the west side of J street, a public thoroughfare in the city of Fresno, an auto truck, owned by the defendant, and driven by one Ray Summers, an employee of the defendant, was, so the complaint alleges, "suddenly and carelessly driven backwards from the westerly curbing of J street, where the car had been parked, and struck the automobile which plaintiff was, as aforesaid, driving." At the time of the collision, so the complaint alleges, it was "more than a half an hour after sunset," and "it was dark, cloudy, and raining, and the atmospheric conditions rendered the operation of vehicles dangerous to the traffic on and use of highways." The result of the collision, so the complaint avers, was that the windshield of plaintiff's automobile was broken, and a piece of the glass from said windshield was, by the impact, thrown against and struck the right eye of plaintiff, "and greatly damaged and injured the same"; that the injury so received to his said eye was of such a character as that "plaintiff is compelled to wear glasses, and is not able, and will not be able, to engage in such remunerative occupations as he would otherwise be able to engage in were it not for the injuries so received to his said eye; that the plaintiff, on account of said injury so received by him to his said eye, has been damaged in the sum of $25,000." It is alleged that at the time of the collision the said auto truck of the defendant "had no lights either in front or in the rear, as required by law, or at all, and said auto truck was then and there driven by said Ray Summers in a careless and reckless manner and without fault or negligence on the part of plaintiff."

The answer, while admitting that the windshield of plaintiff's automobile was broken by a collision between the latter's car and the defendant's truck, on the occasion mentioned in the complaint, denies all the other averments of the last-named pleading, and, as a special defense, sets up the plea of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which negligence, so the answer charges, was the proximate cause of the collision and the resulting injuries to plaintiff.

The plaintiff contends here that the evidence addressed to the issues shows, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff's injuries were directly or proximately and solely caused by or through the negligence of the defendant or its employee, without any fault or negligence whatsoever on the part of the plaintiff. It is further insisted that the evidence upon its face shows that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that but for two erroneous instructions given by the court upon the question of contributory negligence the verdict would probably have been for the plaintiff.

The evidence shows that at the time of the accident plaintiff was 24 years of age and was in the employ of the Standard Oil Company in the city of Fresno as its advertising manager, his duties as such requiring him to travel through some four or five different counties adjacent to and in the neighborhood of Fresno county, at various intervals of time. He had, prior to the accident in question, met with another accident in which he suffered the loss or use of his left eye or, as he described the condition of the left eye, "I had no vision in my left eye at all—I could barely tell night from day, and my right eye was perfect." He had never, prior to the accident in question, in which his right eye was injured, used eyeglasses.

The evidence without conflict shows that it was dark at the hour at which the accident happened—between 5 and 6 o'clock p. m.—that it was raining, and had been prior to the happening of the collision, and that the streets, due to the rain, were "slippery." The evidence, without conflict, further shows that the street in the block in which the accident occurred was lighted—that is, the street lights, four on each side of the street in said block, were on and reflected their usual light along and over the street.

The plaintiff testified that, within a brief time after 5 o'clock p. m. on the day of the accident, he started from the office of the Standard Oil Company and went to a point on the street near said company's office where he had parked his Ford automobile or roadster, intending, accompanied by a Mr. Beebe, also employed by said company, to drive to the place of business in Fresno of a Mr. Mugniani; that he and Beebe entered the machine and proceeded on their way south on the right-hand side of J street, at the rate of about twelve miles per hour; that, as driver of the machine, he sat on the left-hand side thereof; that the lights of his car were on; that he was "driving cautiously, the streets were wet and raining, and just as I got in front of Neilsen's why, a truck backed right out into my car—at least we got together right there in front of Neilsen's and broke the car up, and smashed it all to pieces, in fact, and the windshield broke. Part of it went to my right eye, piece of glass into my right eye and cut it, and I went to the Emergency Hospital and later to the Burnett Sanitarium." He stated that he was at the time driving "astraddle of the right-hand tracks of the street car, with my left wheel near the left-hand side of the right-hand tracks"; that the truck "backed out from the curb, I guess, at an angle of 45 degrees towards me"; that there were no lights on the truck. The roadster came in collision with the "corner of the bed of the truck." the plaintiff's car being struck "practically in the center of the radiator." He stated that he was within six feet of the truck before he saw it moving into the street from the curbing; that "it came right out within the scope of the lights on my car." He further stated that as he was driving he was looking "straight through" the windshield of his car, and could discern objects before him, although, he admitted, the windshield was wet from the rain, the roadster having been parked and having remained in the street while it was raining before he started out with it, and that at the time he was driving there was rain still running down the windshield.

The injury to his right eye was of a serious nature, and the vision thereof materially impaired permanently, so the doctor who attended him testified.

C. H. Beebe, the party riding with the plaintiff when the accident occurred, was thrown against the windshield by the force of the collision and received a few minor bruises and lacerations of the flesh. His testimony corroborated in all substantial particulars that of the plaintiff. He stated that at the time that the plaintiff was driving down J street and just before the accident happened the rain was running over and down the windshield of plaintiff's car. He declared, though, that his vision through the windshield was perfectly clear.

There were a few other witnesses who were in the immediate vicinity of where the accident occurred at the time of the happening thereof, and who testified, for the plaintiff, as to the fact of the collision, but whose testimony, except that of the witness Hopwood, furnished meager information as to the manner in which the collision happened to be brought about. The witness Hopwood described the manner in which the collision occurred about as the plaintiff and Beebe did. He said the truck was moving and backing into the street from the curbing when the Ford roadster struck it.

Ray Summers, the driver of the defendant's truck, testified that about five or ten minutes after 5 o'clock p. m. he left the defendant's store, went to where the truck had been left standing by him, and "turned on the Presto for my lights—tried to light them and they wouldn't light, so I turned my Presto out and cranked the machine and got in the machine and started to back out"; that, in backing, an auto truck has "but one speed" which is lower than the low speed going forward; that on the occasion of the accident he backed out "very slow" for a short distance, when he observed the plaintiff's car traveling toward him, and that he thereupon stopped his truck. He testified that, when he stopped the truck, plaintiff was at a distance of 25 feet from him or where his truck was standing. He testified, as did other witnesses, that the effect of the striking of the truck by the Ford car "straightened my truck out, as if I had been backing straight forward from the curb, * * * I mean at right angles to the curb. It was turned by the impact at an angle to the curb about 45 degrees." In other words, he explained that "the impact threw it (the truck) so it was straight toward the curb."

John De Camp witnessed the collision and saw the truck back out from the curbing immediately prior thereto. He stated that the truck was stopped before the collision occurred.

Milo L. Rowell, manager of the defendant's business in Fresno, testified that the auto truck, with which the plaintiff's car collided, measured fifteen feet and six inches in length, that the width of the rear of the bed was six feet and two inches, and that the weight of the machine was 4,370 pounds. He also stated that the weight of plaintiff's roadster was 1,600 pounds. This witness further testified that he had ascertained that the sun set on the day of the accident at the hour of 4:49 o'clock p. m.

The foregoing comprehends a fair statement of the evidence introduced before the jury by both parties.

It will be in order first to consider the point made by the plaintiff that the defendant was guilty of negligence per se by reason of its failure or omission to have the lights of its truck on at the time the accident occurred.

Section 13 of the State Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 206), which governed at the time the accident in question occurred, provided, among other things, that:

> "All times during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, every automobile while on the public highway shall carry at the front at least two lighted lamps, and every such automobile * * * at the times and under the conditions in this section hereinbefore specified, shall carry at the rear a lighted lamp exhibiting a red light plainly visible, under normal atmospheric conditions, for a distance of five hundred feet toward the rear and so constructed and placed that the number plate carried on the rear of such automobile or trailer shall be illuminated by a white light in such manner that the number thereon can be plainly distinguished under normal atmospheric conditions at a distance of not less than fifty feet toward the rear," etc.

Subdivision d of the same section requires that at the time and under the conditions specified by said section every motor truck of two tons carrying capacity or over, "which is so governed or mechanically constructed or controlled that it cannot exceed a speed of fifteen miles per hour, shall carry at the front at least two lighted lamps which shall be visible at least two hundred feet in the direction in which the motor truck is proceeding, and when the vehicle is proceeding on a street or highway not so lighted as to reveal any person, vehicle or substantial object on the street or highway straight ahead of such motor truck for a distance of at least two hundred feet, such front light shall be sufficient to reveal any person, vehicle or substantial object on the road straight ahead for a distance of seventy-five feet or over, and shall be equipped with a tail light such as is required on other motor vehicles."

It is admitted that the accident happened after the sun had set and that the defendant had no lights on his truck, either in front or the rear thereof, at the time he started to back it from the curbing into the street. The evidence is not clear as to the precise time at which the accident occurred. The plaintiff, as seen, stated that he left the office of the Standard Oil Company at about 5 o'clock p. m., went to where his car was parked, a short distance from the company's office, entered the car and "shortly after 5 o'clock" was proceeding down J street, being stopped for a moment by a traffic officer before reaching the point at which he ran into the truck. Summers, driver of the truck, did not attempt definitely to fix the time the accident happened, but did state that his working hours were from 7 o'clock a. m. to 5 o'clock p. m. each day, and that he invariably quit working at the latter hour. The witness, De Camp, fixed the time at between 5 and 5:15 p. m.

[1] It will be observed from a reading of the above excerpts from section 13 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 that, if the accident occurred after the lapse of half an hour after the sun set on the day of the mishap, the omission of the defendant to carry lighted lamps, both in front and in the rear of the truck, at the time of the accident, constituted on its part negligence per se, or as a matter of law. If, on the other hand, the accident occurred before the lapse of half an hour after the sun set, then the question whether the defendant was guilty of negligence at all was one of fact for the determination of the jury. As to this matter, however—that is, as to the precise time at which the accident occurred—the evidence appears to be rather indefinite and uncertain. One of the witnesses for the defendant, it is true, fixed the time at between 5 and 5:15 o'clock p. m. This would bring the time of the accident within the half hour after sunset, the sun having gone down at 4:49 p. m. But the testimony of the plaintiff and the witness Beebe on this point that they left the Standard Oil Company's office at 5 p. m., walked a short distance to the plaintiff's car, entered and started the car, and proceeded at the rate of 12 miles per hour until the crash came, would give the jury some foundation for calculating the time it took them to reach the point where the collision occurred, and the jury could thus have felt justified in concluding that the accident occurred after the expiration of half an hour after the sun had set. Thus there may be some ground for the theory that, upon the question as to the time of the accident, there was and is some conflict in the evidence. In this state of the evidence upon that proposition it was for the jury to determine the time, either with some degree of exactness or at least approximately. It follows that it cannot be said that the defendant, in so far as is concerned its failure to carry lighted lamps on its truck at the time of the accident, was guilty of negligence per se. This is not to say, however, that it was not within the province of the jury to decide whether the defendant was guilty of negligence by reason of the fact that it moved its truck from the curbing into the street without having a lighted lamp in the rear visible a sufficient distance from where it stood or was moving to enable the driver of an automobile proceeding toward it, by the exercise of ordinary care and caution, to see it in ample time to avoid colliding with it. But, conceding the negligence of the defendant, the question arises whether or not the plaintiff himself, in driving his car, while approaching the place where the truck was, was guilty of negligence without which the accident would not have occurred. In other words, the question is whether, as the answer charges and the defendant here contends, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident.

[2] It may be granted that the question whether or not the accident was proximately caused by the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff is a close one. It is for this reason peculiarly one the determination of which was for the jury. Indeed, carefully considering all the evidence and the inferences reasonably deducible therefrom—inferences which, it must be assumed from the verdict, the jury did draw—we cannot reconcile ourselves to the conclusion that, as to the effect of the evidence, a court of review would be authorized to substitute its judgment for that of the jury. A jury is not bound or compelled to accept the testimony of any witness as conclusive upon the fact or facts to which he testifies. The triers of fact are always the exclusive judges of the credibility of any witness testifying before them, and, while they must start out with the presumption that the witness intends to and does speak the truth, still such presumption may be overcome by the manner in which he has testified, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence impeaching his character for truth, honesty, and integrity, etc. (the latter test not involved herein), or by contradictory evidence Code Civ. Proc., § 1847. The manner in which the plaintiff and the witness Beebe testified was before the jury. It is not here, and in the very nature of the situation could not be. There was no affirmative contradiction of their testimony. But may not the manner in which a witness testifies often operate as effectually as in impeachment of the verity of his story as proof of a positive character tending to contradict him? See Clark v. Tulare Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 431, 112 Pac. 564 et seq., for an answer to this question. Then there may exist in the case certain physical facts (indeed, there are such facts in this case) which are irreconcilable with the testimony of the witness, or, at least, so a jury might justly find.

[3, 4] In the instant case the plaintiff, who was driving the machine, was much handicapped in such employment from the fact that he had the use of but one eye, and this under weather and atmospheric conditions which greatly augmented the inconvenience and the danger of driving a car after the sun had passed to the other side. The streets were more or less slippery, making it a difficult undertaking to stop an automobile in one of those dangerous emergencies which only too often arise in automotive traffic, and there was the added peril ordinarily incident to the blurring of the windshield of a car as the result of rainwater flowing down and over it. And in this connection it may be suggested that the jury might well have given little weight to the testimony of the plaintiff and the witness Beebe to the effect that, although the windshield of the Ford was wet, and rain still running down and over it, they were able to see through it with perfect clearness and so observe objects before them; for it is a matter of common knowledge that, when there is water on glass, the vision of one attempting to look through it becomes so obscured as to make it very difficult, even to those having normal eyesight, to discern distinctly an object even a short distance before him, and the vision naturally will become the more obscured when the water is falling upon and trickling down and over the glass. This must be particularly true as to the windshield of an automobile while the machine is moving at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour. But equally as important as are the foregoing considerations, in the determination of the weight to which the testimony of the plaintiff and Beebe was entitled, and also as bearing upon the question whether the plaintiff, under the conditions shown to exist at the time referred to, exercised that care—at least ordinary care—which the law requires of a driver of an automobile operating the same on the public highways, is the circumstance that the collision was of such force as not only to have practically demolished the Ford machine, but to have caused the large, heavy truck to be moved or thrown from its original position, at an angle to the curb of about 45 degrees, to a position in which it stood at right angles to or in a straight line toward the curb. This circumstance was important in the matter of the determination by the jury of the rate of speed at which the plaintiff was driving. At all events, it is clear that upon this record it does not lie in the mouth of a court of review either to hold that the evidence, as a matter of law, discloses that the direct cause of the accident was the negligence of the defendant, or likewise to hold that, even conceding that the defendant was guilty of negligence which was, in a measure, responsible for the injuries of the plaintiff, the plaintiff himself was wholly free from blame or not guilty of negligence without which the accident and its consequences would not have occurred.

[5, 6] The law is, as the trial court in clear language stated it to the jury, that "negligence on the part of the plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care which, operating concurrently with the negligence of the defendant, contributes proximately to plaintiff's injuries, will prevent a recovery in this action by plaintiff, whether or not defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have guarded against it."

After reading to the jury certain provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, setting forth certain rules as to the care with which and the speed at which the driver of any vehicle shall operate the same upon any public highway, and also as to the character of the headlights of motor vehicles and how such lights shall be "arranged, adjusted, and constructed where the car is fully loaded," the court instructed the jury, in two different instructions, that, if they "find from the evidence that the plaintiff violated any of these rules, and that such violation contributed to the injuries complained of by plaintiff you must find for the defendant."

Those instructions do not accurately state the rule, because of omitting the word "proximately," so that they would have read in part, if said word had been used: "Such violation proximately contributed to the injuries complained of," etc. But the error in giving said instructions was fully cured by a correct statement of the rule in several other instructions embodied in the court's charge, and particularly by the following given instruction: "Contributory negligence is defined as that negligence of plaintiff which contributes to his injuries and without which said injuries would not have occurred."

In view of the foregoing, and the other instructions in which the rule was properly and clearly stated, we do not see how the jury could have been misled to the prejudice of plaintiff by the instructions complained of.

The judgment is affirmed.

INGLE MFG. CO. v. SAN DIEGO OIL PRODUCTS CORPORATION.
(Civ. 4191.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 24, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1924.)

1. Sales 🔑441(3)—Evidence held to sustain findings for seller in action for price of iron tanks.

In action to recover contract price of iron tanks, evidence held to sustain findings that the tanks did comply with plaintiff's written guaranty and Civ. Code, § 1770, requiring reasonable fitness for purpose for which manufactured, and that leakages were caused by defendant's defective platform.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Judgment not disturbed, where findings are supported by the evidence.

Where the findings are supported by the evidence, judgment based thereon will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by the Ingle Manufacturing Company against the San Diego Oil Products Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for appellant.

Joseph S. Campbell, of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover the agreed purchase price of $2,396 for twelve galvanized iron tanks, each of the capacity of 8,189 gallons.

The contract was evidenced by certain letters passing between the parties. Of such letters those which are considered of material consequence in determining this controversy specified that the tanks be guaranteed against leaks before leaving plaintiff's factory, and that the tanks be placed on platforms not exceeding twelve inches in height. The construction of the tanks was commenced at the plaintiff's factory, but was completed on the property of the defendant. The platforms on which the tanks were to rest were furnished and constructed by the defendant, and, while used for the purpose for which they were intended, the trial court found that they were not "accepted by the plaintiff," and "that the plaintiff assumed no obligations in regard to the foundations furnished by the defendant." The court further found:

> "That said tanks did comply with plaintiff's written guarantee and did comply with the express warranty found in Civil Code, § 1770, and were reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were manufactured; that four of said tanks leaked to the extent of 295¾ gallons, but that the plaintiff was not responsible for the leaks for the reason that the foundation upon which said tanks were placed, and which foundation was furnished by the defendant, was not substantial, and presented an uneven and yielding surface, and that the leakages were caused by the defective platform furnished by the defendant, and that the plaintiff is not responsible therefor; that the said tanks were not defective in workmanship."

If it be determined with reference to the tanks which leaked that all the warranties, express as well as implied, were fulfilled by the plaintiff, or that such tanks leaked because of the fault of the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment; on the other hand, if the leaks were caused by the fault of the plaintiff, the judgment should be reversed. That part of the contract which provided that the tanks should be guaranteed against leaks before leaving the factory of the plaintiff was modified by implied consent of the parties, in that the tanks were only partially constructed at the factory of the plaintiff and the tanks were completed at the plant of the defendant. It must therefore have been within the contemplation of the parties as a part of such modification that, whether constructed at the plaintiff's factory or at the defendant's plant (without reference to the foundation on which the tanks rested), the tanks would be free from leaks on their completion. The warranty contained in section 1770 of the Civil Code, covering the manufacture of articles in the class in which the subject-matter of this action falls, is to the effect that these tanks were guaranteed by the manufacturer to be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were made. As shown by the findings, considering the fact that the tanks leaked only to the extent of 295¾ gallons, which was less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. of the aggregate of 342,627 gallons of oil contained in the tanks during their use of about four months; or, to put the matter more concretely, about 1 drop out of 16,000 drops in a one week's storage of oil—the conclusion by the lower court that the tanks did comply with the terms of the contract between the parties, as well as with the warranty as contained in and required by the provisions of section 1770 of the Civil Code, does not seem entirely unreasonable. But, assuming that the aggregate capacity of the tanks was about 98,000 gallons, the week's leakage, instead of being represented by 1 drop out of 16,000 drops, would be shown by a loss of 3 drops out of 16,000 drops, or slightly less than ½ a drop per day. The contract was uncertain in its terms as to who was obligated to construct the foundation; but, in view of the construction placed upon the language of the contract by the parties thereto, and the consequent assumption by the defendant of that part of the contract, it must be presumed that the intention was that such duty was to devolve upon the defendant. The testimony of the plaintiff's superintendent, as taken from the transcript on appeal, is as follows:

> "When I first went out to the defendant's plant, I wanted to know where the tanks were going to be placed. Mr. Peacock showed me where the tanks were to be located, and asked me about the foundation. He asked me if a base of scrap lumber he had there, of various lengths, breadths, and thicknesses, would do. I said 'No.' He asked if the tanks could be set right on the ground—I said they could, but the chemical action that would result would cause holes and leaks. Then he asked me if a base made of some three inch by eight inch planks about ten feet long would do. I replied if they were placed on the ground, properly leveled, they would, in my judgment, serve the purpose all right. The defendant's men then leveled off the ground and placed boards for us to put the tanks on. I should say these planks were laid from two to three inches apart. The first supply of planks were of uniform length, of about sixteen feet long, but they were exhausted before they had enough foundation. After that defendant got some other planks which were mostly two by twelve, and of various lengths to complete the foundation. I should judge five or six tanks were placed on the planks of uniform length and thickness. Some of the planks were so placed that the ends of the planks were beneath tanks. I should judge every other tank had plank ends beneath it. The tanks were eleven feet in diameter, and were set from a foot to eighteen inches apart. * * * We had heavy rain fall after the first day or two we were on the job, which prevented our completing the tanks right away. * * * The eaves of the shed covering the tanks containing the crude oil emptied just about on the edge of the platforms which were beneath the tanks we built. * * * The water that flowed off this roof flowed right on the ground in and around these tanks. * * * The ground around and about the platform upon which the tanks were placed was soaked with water."

With reference to the effect upon the tanks produced by the manner of construction of the platforms and their surroundings, the same witness stated:

> "The tanks were leaking because the seams had cracked in one or two places, causing leaks. * * * I concluded these cracks were caused by the settling of the foundation. I found some planks had settled more than others, and that the planks were not even on a level. In some places planks had settled so much that they no longer touched or supported the tank. I found a leak at one such place where one plank was high and the planks on either side had settled so they were three-fourths of an inch below the bottom of the tank. Such an unevenness of the foundation would cause the bottom of the tank to bulge and put an unnecessary strain on the seams. This would tend to crack open the solder and cause a leak. A full tank of oil would weigh approximately 56,000 pounds; that would make a weight of about 580 pounds per square foot all over the surface of the bottom of the tank. That weight would be sufficient to draw and open the seams at the bottom of the tank if it was resting upon an uneven surface. I called the attention of defendant's men to the fact that the foundation was not level, in several instances, when they were laying the planks; then, later, when I went down to the plant to repair leaks, I called to Mr. Peacock's attention the fact that the foundation was not level in places. He said he would fix it, but he did not do so. * * * If the foundations of the tanks were not level that would cause strains on the sides of the tanks. That strain might appear anywhere on the body of the tanks, and it would cause the tank to draw at the joints. * * * Where I put the stove bolts in the bottom, the tanks were leaking where the solder had cracked on the seam. I believe it was the strain caused by the unevenness of the foundation that made the solder crack."

Another witness stated:

> "I suggested that to remedy the faulty foundation the planks should be brought up together, that the ends be matched up, not left staggered, and that they be braced underneath. The foundation consisted of loose planks laid on the ground. These planks were not of uniform thickness and the ends of the planks were so arranged that some joints were beneath the tank. In some places the ground had settled so that the tanks were not resting on the planks as they should have been. The bottoms of the tanks were in places suspended between the planks."

A third witness testified that:

> "The foundations were not even, that is, the surface of the planks was not even. Some of the planks had settled away from the bottom of the tank. I should say that in one place there was approximately three-fourths of an inch between the plank and the tank. * * * From what I have observed I can tell the effect on galvanized tanks of the character of those I saw in this case. If they were filled with oil and the foundations on which they were setting was unlevel I know the unlevelness at the joints would cause a drawing and stretching of the metal which would pull a seam apart on a joint where it was soldered."

[1] The contract, as far as the warranty against leaks was concerned, originally contemplated that the tanks would not leak before leaving the factory. Consequently any question of the tanks being placed either on the bare ground, or on a plank foundation, or on a cement foundation, was not considered by the parties as having anything to do with the subject of whether on their completion the tanks would leak or not. If immediately upon completion of their manufacture, and assuming that they might have been tested while resting temporarily on the bare ground or elsewhere, it had been found that the tanks were free from leaks, they would have met the condition of the contract that they were guaranteed against leaks before leaving the factory. Where or in what position the tanks were ordered to be placed by the defendant (other than that plaintiff should not be compelled to install them on foundations over twelve inches in height) was of no concern of the plaintiff, and had nothing to do with the requirement that they be free from leaks on the completion of their manufacture. The location of the tanks and the conditions which were to surround them rested entirely within the control of the defendant. As the findings of the lower court show were the actual conditions, "the foundation upon which said tanks were placed, and which foundation was furnished by the defendant corporation, was not substantial, and presented an uneven and yielding surface and that the leakages were caused by the defective platform furnished by the defendant."

[2] The statement made by respondent's superintendent that in his judgment the planks would "serve the purpose all right" for the foundation, if the ground were properly leveled, even though coupled with the use by plaintiff of such foundations, cannot be taken as a modification of the guaranty of the tanks against leaks before leaving the factory, especially in view of the testimony that attention was repeatedly called to the fact that the foundation was not level, and that defendant's superintendent said "he would fix it." but that he did not do so. The evidence shows that after the tanks were completed, and during the time that the parties were considering the leaky condition of the four tanks, the cause of the leaks was entirely attributed to the faulty foundations upon which the tanks rested. The judge of the trial court made a personal examination of the tanks, and presumably based his conclusions as to their fitness partly upon his observations and partly upon the testimony of witnesses. It very satisfactorily appears from the evidence that the defendant assumed the responsibility of constructing the foundations for the tanks, and that the leaks were entirely due to the faulty construction of such foundations. Plaintiff did not undertake to build and deliver unleakable tanks on the platforms furnished by the defendant. Its engagement was that the tanks would not leak at the time they were ready for delivery at its factory, which place was later changed as of the defendant's plant. The fact that, after the tanks were completed and were resting upon the foundations constructed by the defendant, the plaintiff attempted to make them tight and assured defendant that they would be made tight, does not affect the original contract, but rather goes to a matter of business policy or expediency. Even at considerable cost and annoyance the plaintiff may have wished to entirely please defendant, not only for the purpose of influencing possible future business with the defendant, but for the sake of sustaining the business reputation of the plaintiff in the community in which it was transacting business. The whole question here involved depends primarily on the facts. According to the findings by the lower court, those facts are all against defendant's contentions. At any rate, the court found that the platforms "were not accepted by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff assumed no obligations in regard to the foundations furnished by the defendant; that said tanks did comply with plaintiff's written guaranty, and did comply with the express warranty found in Civil Code, § 1770, and were reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were manufactured, and that the leakages were caused by the defective platform furnished by the defendant." The findings are supported by the evidence, and the rule is unquestioned that in such circumstances the appellate court will not interfere with the judgment.

PEOPLE v. MORI. (Cr. 748.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1924.)

Criminal law ⚷1169(5)—Admitting testimony of similar offense held prejudicial error.

In prosecution for unlawful sale of liquor, admission of testimony as to defendant's sale on date other than alleged or proved was prejudicial error, and not cured by instructions that the sole object of its admission was to show the character of defendant's place, and not to prove a separate offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

John Mori was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

George E. Foote and H. W. Zagoren, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. From a judgment of the superior court of the county of Sacramento, adjudging defendant guilty of a violation of the statute relating to the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The defendant was charged with an illegal sale of intoxicating liquor on the ——— day of July, 1923. The proof disclosed a sale to one Robbins, a deputy sheriff, on July 28, 1923. As a part of the proof adduced by the district attorney, one Donald Cox, also a deputy sheriff, testified, under objection by the defendant, as to purchasing liquor, on August 19, at the place of business of the defendant, and at the same place where the alleged first sale of liquor was made, the purchase being from a bartender of the defendant, but in the presence of the defendant Mori. Before the introduction of this evidence in relation to a sale of liquor on August 19 the attorneys for the defendant moved the court to restrict the district attorney from offering testimony of the August sale of liquor. The trial judge refused to so do. Upon the offer being made of such testimony, objection was again made to its introduction, and, after it had been given before the jury, motion was made to strike it from the record. It was admitted as part of the case in chief, and was allowed to remain in the record.

During the trial, and before giving the regular instructions, the trial court gave the jury a special instruction as to this testimony relating to the August sale, in part in the following language.

> "Testimony introduced this morning by Mr. Cox, in which he is alleged to have made certain purchases * * * is admissible, not for the purpose of proving another distinct offense upon that charge, but showing the character of the place and purpose of the defendant; now that is the sole object for which that testimony was admitted, but not for the purpose of showing any distinct or particular crime at that particular time, merely for the purpose of showing character of the place and the purpose of the defendant."

Special objection was made to this instruction, and the same was assigned as error.

The evidence was clearly inadmissible, and it has been repeatedly so held, as may be seen by the following cases: People v. Morales, 45 Cal. App. 553, 188 Pac. 58, and People v. Smith (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 405. In the last-named case the facts were substantially the same as in the present action. To say this did not result in a miscarriage of justice is to assume that the jury only considered the testimony of the witness Robbins as to the sale made to him. What was said by Justice Houser of Division 1 of the Second appellate district in the case of People v. Smith, above cited, is applicable here. It was there said:

> "The 'saving grace' of the constitutional provision cannot be here invoked. Defendant used every means within his power in the way of objections to the admission of the evidence regarding other offenses, as well as by making a motion to strike the evidence, which was followed, not only by his own denial of the alleged transactions, but also by independent evidence tending to establish his innocence thereof. Neither did the instructions given by the court to the jury remove the prejudice against defendant which must have been created by the reception of the objectionable evidence of such former sales of liquor by defendant. While it may be that without such evidence of other sales the case made out against defendant is strong enough to support the judgment, the great probabilities are that the evidence of other violations of the statute contributed to the verdict, if such evidence was not the controlling factor in its inducement. It is a dangerous practice, and one which is not in keeping with American ideals, to charge a man with one offense and on his trial therefor either to prove, or offer to prove, that he has at other times and places committed offenses of a nature similar to the one of which he is accused."

In several recent cases proof of another offense was permitted, but in each case there were some special circumstances which clearly showed that no special harm could have come to defendant by reason of such evidence.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

MOUNTAIN CLUB v. PINNEY.

(Civ. 4461; L. A. 7164.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 12, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 10, 1924.)

1. Reformation of instruments 🔑45(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding of mistake in description in deed.

In action to reform deed on ground of mutual mistake in inserting in instrument property description which it contained, evidence held to sustain finding of mistake.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑239(1)—Innocent purchaser for value without notice not affected by mistake in prior deed by grantor to another.

Under Civ. Code, § 3399, an innocent purchaser for value without notice is not affected by mistake in description of land in prior deed by his grantor to third person.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑232(2)—Possession, which will operate to impart notice to purchaser for value, stated.

Possession of real property, which will operate to impart notice to the world and to a purchaser for value who claims to rely upon record title, must be open, visible, unambiguous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and notorious, and must indicate occupant.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑244—Evidence held to sustain finding of such possession as to constitute constructive notice.

Evidence held to sustain finding that possession by plaintiffs and their predecessors not consistent with record title was of such character as to give constructive notice of plaintiff's rights to defendant relying upon record title.

5. Reformation of instruments 🔑32—Plaintiff, seeking reformation of description in deed, held not guilty of laches.

Plaintiff, seeking reformation of description in deed, and predecessors, held not guilty of laches.

6. Reformation of instruments 🔑23, 32—Plaintiff held not estopped by acquiescence or conduct to claim right as against purchaser for value to reformation of deed.

Plaintiff, suing for reformation of description in deed, held not estopped on account of laches and conduct as against purchaser for value.

7. Adverse possession 🔑27—Evidence held to sustain finding of title by adverse possession.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding of title by adverse possession, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, against contention there was no sufficient inclosure.

8. Adverse possession 🔑27—Evidence held to sustain finding that land was sufficiently cultivated.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that land claimed adversely was sufficiently cultivated or improved.

9. Adverse possession 🔑95—Finding that claimant complied with requirement as to payment of taxes sustained by facts.

Evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff complied with requirements as to payment of taxes, or that land in question was not assessed for taxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex. B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by the Mountain Club against Harry J. Pinney. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Ticknor, Carter & Webster, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action concerns a certain parcel of real property in the San Bernardino mountains, to which we shall in this opinion refer as lot 5. The complaint is in two counts. The first of these alleges the execution of a certain deed to plaintiff's predecessors by one Schneider, and pleads with great particularity facts constituting a cause of action upon the ground of mistake, the alleged mistake consisting of the insertion in the deed of a property description which is not a description of the land intended to be conveyed by the grantor and to be received by the grantee. The second count is a complaint to quiet title in the ordinary form. The prayer is for a reformation of the deed and other documents, and for a decree quieting title to the property conveyed by the deed as reformed. The trial court found for plaintiff upon both counts of the complaint, and rendered judgment accordingly. Defendant appeals.

The first point made by appellant is that the evidence in the record is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the parties to the deed were laboring under a mutual mistake in inserting in the instrument the property description which it contained, and a consideration of the question presented requires a statement of various portions of the evidence material not alone to the point itself, but to others which will be examined later. Schneider, before the execution of the deed in question, was the owner also of a certain lot 8, which lay immediately to the south of lot 5. Each of the lots, it is to be understood, was so designated and numbered upon the government plats and according to government surveys, and they were taken up by Schneider and patented to him as government lands. The two lots together contain 101.24 acres, and 50.82 acres of this area lie in lot 5. Some years prior to the execution of the deed in question here Schneider, desiring to take up other government lands in lieu of a part of his holdings, executed to the government his deed attempting to convey the south 30 acres of lot 5 and all of lot 8. This deed was executed in 1901, and was recorded in the county recorder's office in the same year. It was, however, never accepted by the government, although nothing appeared of record indicating that fact until the year 1920, when a disclaimer by the government was placed of record. It is to be observed here, for it is an important point in the litigation, that beyond a doubt Schneider believed that his deed to the government, conceding that it was to become effective, left him as the owner, in lots 5 and 8, of only the north 20.82 acres of the former. That acreage, however, is unfit for cultivation and for human habitation, being rugged and mountainous, and Schneider, for a long time before he executed the deed to the government, had lived in a log house on the south 30 acres of lot 5. Not only so, but he resided there for a long time thereafter, possibly, in fact, until a short time after the making of the deed to respondent's predecessors which is in question here. During a period commencing prior to the deed to the government and running until the date of the deed to respondent's predecessors Schneider cultivated and maintained in the neighborhood of the house an apple orchard and a small alfalfa field. All of his improvements were surrounded by what we shall for the present term an inclosure, leaving the real nature of the structure so called to be discussed later. The ground thus surrounded was irregular in shape, but was so conformed as to have what may be termed its northerly, easterly, southerly and westerly sides. It was all within the boundaries of the south 30 acres of lot 5. To this inclosure, together with all that it contained, we shall hereafter refer as the Schneider homestead. The northerly side of the homestead was at or about the foot of the rise which extended northward into the north 20.82 acres of the lot, while its southerly side was bounded by the northerly bank of the Santa Ana river. This stream meanders across the south 30 acres of lot 5 in a course which, at least where it passes the Schneider homestead, is not greatly divergent from the rectilinear, and which runs westerly, but with a southerly trend. Although Schneider understood that his deed to the government left him as the record owner of the north 20.82 acres of lot 5, it is certain that he believed that the homestead lay within that acreage. A forest ranger in the employ of the government testified thus concerning a conversation he had with Schneider about the year 1907:

> "We were standing in front of his ranch house there, near the creek, and he pointed to me across the creek about 50 or 60 feet and he said, 'I have traded to the government all of the land except this piece that we are on; I have reserved the place where the apples and orchard and alfalfa patch were'—and where his houses were."

Not only is this testimony in the record, but the situation is apparent without it. There was no reason whatever for Schneider having retained the worthless mountainous land which actually lay within the limits of the 20.82 acres. There was every reason for his retaining the only land of value in his entire holding, the land which he had cultivated, upon which he had built, and upon which he had dwelt. It is perfectly evident, if we may express the idea of lineal extent in terms relating to surface, that he believed that his entire property lay 20.82 acres south of its actual location under the government surveys.

Leaving these basic features of the evidence bearing upon the question of mistake, we come now to a mention of those portions of the record which disclose the negotiations leading up to the execution of the deed from Schneider to respondent's predecessors. Respondent was organized for the purpose of providing a summer hunting and fishing location for its members, consisting, during the history of the organization, of from five to twelve men. One Cave, a member of the club, entered into negotiations with Schneider for the purchase of a site convenient for the purposes of himself and the other members. This was in the year 1907. Cave testified that his first conversation with Scheider was on the premises at the homestead. He says:

> "I asked him where the land laid, and he designated the east line about where his fence was, the west line where his fence was, and the south line the Santa Ana river, and the north line taking in all the tillable land up to the hill, and it covered all the land under cultivation and under fence."

One De Hart, also a member of respondent, was present at the conversation between Cave and Schneider. De Hart testified:

> "Schneider said that he had turned back part of his land for scrip to the government, and that all he had retained was what he lived on. * * * He said there was perhaps 60 or 40 acres of land that he had retained, and that this part where he lived was all that was any account anyhow of the land."

One Allen, a lawyer, was employed by the members of respondent for the purpose of formulating an agreement for the purchase of Schneider's property. He and Schneider had a conversation concerning the proposed transfer. Upon being asked what Schneider said "respecting the property that he proposed or intended to describe in this agreement," Allen testified, "He said that he wished to convey all the property that he owned in Santa Ana Canyon, in San Bernardino County." According to Allen, further, Schneider told him that "he had no papers showing his title." Allen then got from a title company a description of the property apparently intended to be conveyed and inserted it in the agreement. The same description was incorporated in the deed later executed by Schneider to the members of respondent, who were its predecessors in interest. The property thus described is the north 20.82 acres of lot 5. The mistake of which respondent's first cause of action is predicated, and which was found by the trial court to exist, is the alleged mistake in reproducing in the deed this description of a mountainous tract of land instead of a description of the Schneider homestead.

[1] It is vigorously contended by appellant that neither Schneider nor the members of respondent could have been laboring under such a mistake. It is pointed out that the description actually inserted in the deed calls for a tract inclosed within right lines, and especially that it calls for a southern boundary consisting of a right east and west line. In contrast with these indubitably correct assertions we are reminded that the inclosure surrounding the Schneider homestead was irregular and was meandering in part, and, particularly, that the southerly line of that inclosure, marked by the banks of the river, is not straight, and that it departs from a true east and west direction. We are convinced not only that these circumstances did not require the trial court to find that there was no mistake, but that they are not even inconsistent with the parts of the record, either referred to or quoted above, from which the inference that there was a mistake could readily be drawn, if, indeed, that inference were not necessarily to be drawn therefrom. It was, of course, apparent to the members of respondent that the homestead, as pointed out to them by Schneider, was not inclosed within right lines, but there is nothing in the record as noted up to this point which is inconsistent with the idea that they believed they were buying and Schneider believed he was selling a larger tract the exterior boundaries of which were outside the inclosure surrounding the homestead and of which the latter was but a part. In truth, certain portions of the record which we have reserved for present mention show affirmatively that the idea just expressed was in the minds of all the parties to the negotiations. Upon this point we refer to a part of Cave's testimony:

"Q. He [Schneider] wasn't exactly certain as to the north boundary? A. Well, he didn't tell me anything about any corner; he said it ran back on the hill. It ran far enough north to take in all his tillable land.

"Q. He didn't tell you it stopped with the tillable land? He gave you to understand it took in the tillable land and might take in even more? A. Yes; that was the idea I got. * * *

"Q. Was the entire 20.82 acres approximately all practically in cultivation? A. No.

"Q. And what portion of it would you say was in cultivation? A. In orchard and alfalfa I should say approximately six acres. * * *

"Q. And the rest of it you feel was susceptible of cultivation? A. No; the rest of it was in river wash and in the hills on the north."

As an answer to one of a series of questions concerning the lines of the inclosure round the Schneider homestead, the particular question relating to the northerly boundary, Cave testified:

"I was not particularly interested in the line as long as it covered all the land of any value. As long as it went back in the hills, I didn't care how far."

A further examination proceeded:

"Q. How far, as long as it didn't stop short of that land, you designate as tillable land? A. That is all I was concerned with.

"Q. You at that time made no effort to find out the exact location. A. No, sir.

"Q. And made no survey? A. Made no survey. * * *

"Q. At the time you talked with Mr. Schneider, * * * was there anything said about the number of acres embraced in this tract? A. I don't remember that there was. I think the first knowledge we had of the acreage was when we got the search from the record."

It is to be observed that the testimony of De Hart, already quoted, bears directly upon the particular question now under discussion, and he further testified even more explicitly on the point. He said:

"[Schneider] led me to believe that the property we were supposed to purchase was the land that the apple grove and the alfalfa patch—in fact all of the land that was under the fence, and running over on the other side of the river, on the south side of the river, in other words; and all of the land which was up on the hill, and the buckthorn which he could not penetrate at all—that is, unless you cut your way in."

Taking all the testimony together, the fact that the property actually described in the deed is bounded by right lines does not show that the alleged mistake did not occur. There is in the record, it is true, some slight evidence tending to indicate that the members of respondent believed that Schnieder, in pointing out the inclosure surrounding the homestead, was showing them the exterior boundaries of the entire property about to be conveyed, but the portions of the testimony to which we have referred more than justified the trial court in adopting the view that they believed, and that Schneider believed and intended them to believe, that the homestead was but a part of the entire property still owned by him. If we consider specially the point most strongly urged by appellant that the act of Schneider in pointing to the river bank as his southern boundary could not have deceived the members of respondent, for the reason that the deed showed that boundary to be a right line, we are prompted to observe that the location of the river was such that they might reasonably have understood that Schneider was pointing to a natural boundary which he had employed on the ground roughly to approximate the southern conventional boundary of his land. We remark this, of course, in addition to what we have already said upon the point to which we now address ourselves. On the whole, we are satisfied that the finding as to mistake is supported by the evidence.

[2] A treatment of the next question presented by appellant requires an additional statement of the facts. Schneider died in 1911. It was first shown of record in 1920, as we have already observed, that his deed attempting to convey lot 8 and the south 30 acres of lot 5 to the government had been rejected. With this showing it at once appeared of record that the estate of Schneider was the owner of the two lots in their entirety, with the exception of the north 20.82 acres of lot 5, title to which appeared of record in respondent. Already, however, in 1919, the public administrator of San Bernardino county had taken out letters of administration upon the estate, and such proceedings were had in the probate court that appellant, Pinney, purchased at an administrator's sale, for a valuable consideration, in 1920, all of the real property standing of record in Schneider's name. After this event, the present action was commenced. We are now brought to the second point made by appellant. He contends that he is an innocent purchaser for value without notice, and that, as such, he is neither affected nor bound by any mistake which Schneider and the members of respondent may have made in inserting the description in the deed executed by him to them. It is a well-established rule of law, carried into the Code in this state, that an innocent purchaser for value without notice is not affected by a mistake such as the trial court found was made between Schneider and his grantees (Civ. Code, § 3399); but respondent insists that appellant is not a purchaser without notice, and the trial court so found. We are thus presented with the real question to be determined by us upon the branch of the case now under consideration. The point made by respondent is that its possession of the Schneider homestead during a long period of time was such, when accompanied by the dominion it exercised over the property while in possession, that constructive notice that it claimed the premises was thereby conveyed to the world. In disposing of this contention we shall first deal with the facts upon which it is made and shall thereafter consider the authorities bearing upon the law of constructive notice under the facts disclosed. The deed from Schneider to the members of respondent was executed in August, 1907, and the grantees under that instrument in turn executed their deed to respondent in February, 1908. Under an arrangement incorporated in the agreement above mentioned, and which preceded the first of these deeds, Schneider reserved the right to live on the homestead described, however, as was the case in all the instruments relating to the property, as the north 20.82 acres of lot 5. Schneider's right to occupy the premises was exercised for but a brief period, if at all, as the record shows that he was taken ill, and that in August, 1907, the month in which he executed his deed to the members of respondent, he was removed to a hospital in Redlands. He never again was upon the homestead.

It now becomes necessary, as a basis upon which to indicate the nature of the possession of respondent, and its acts connected therewith, to point out the character of the inclosure surrounding the homestead, together with other physical features of the place, at the time of the deed from Schneider to the members of respondent. The testimony on these questions relates to the occasion, already mentioned, upon which Cave, accompanied by De Hart, had his conversation with Schneider on the premises. Cave testified that the east and west boundaries were marked by fences consisting of some brush and some wire, the brush having been cut from the land and thrown up along the fence line; that the south line was the bank of the river, although there was a little piece of rock fence and some rail fence along the top of the bank, running in a meandering line near the edge; that the east fence contained brush and rails and poles which had been cut from along the river; that the west fence was of the same kind, some rail and some brush and some wire; that the north end of the east fence ran into the buckthorn brush at the bottom of the mountainside, and that the same was true of the north end of the west fence; that the south end of the west fence ended at the river, where there was quite a bank and that along the bank, where it was necessary to keep cattle out, there had been brush piled and poles put across; and that the south end of the east fence did not come to the river bank, but that there was an old trail between the end of the fence and the bank. De Hart testified that there were several cabins and outhouses or smokehouses on the homestead; that the entire north boundary of the premises was marked by the growing buckthorn of the mountains, so dense that cattle would not go through it, except for a short distance at the east end, where there was a little wire; that the west fence was of wire and rail, and that the south fence was wire and the river; that where the brush on the north was used as a boundary it was so thick that it would turn cattle; that the east fence was wire and partially rails or partially poles; that the fence was sufficient to protect the ranch, there being alfalfa in the barn at the time; and that the wire fence was composed of three strands.

Coming now to the possession and acts of respondent, made evident through the activities of its members, De Hart testified that his connection with the club was maintained for eight or ten years after 1907; that during the period of his membership the fences around the homestead were kept in repair; that the fence on all sides around the place was not continuous, but it was a fence that would turn cattle; that it was not continuous on the north side; that the irrigating ditch went along there; that during his membership an outshed or woodshed was torn down; that along a part of the way on the north side of the homestead no barrier existed except buckthorn brush, which was so thick that cattle would not go through it; that this buckthorn was the barrier along the entire north side, except a short distance at the easterly end where a little wire was employed; that on the west side the members of the club put in wire all the way through the brush; that the property was entirely closed by these obstructions and fences, so much so that it kept the cattle out which were pastured on the ranch, and that there was a growing alfalfa patch there which would naturally invite them; that the alfalfa patch was maintained by the club for several years; that the obstructions and fences were maintained all the time he was a member, and that the stock driven in by members was kept pastured inside the inclosure; that for the first three or four years of his membership in the club he made frequent visits to the homestead during the summer, but that the other members made infrequent visits; that about September, 1907, or a little later, he put a new roof over the kitchen of one of the cabins and put in a new floor and that on the occasion when this work was done he remained on the homestead about six weeks with a Captain Cox, a carpenter employed by respondent; that during that time different members of the club were also there at times, including Cave and one Sucher and one Biggin, and that Biggin remained about two weeks, the others not so long; that De Hart was again at the place early in April, 1908, and remained perhaps a week, perhaps four or five days, for the opening of the fishing season; that he was there for occasional fishing trips and vacations during the summer of 1908, and that on those trips he saw other members of the club there, and that they remained there for periods ranging from a day or two to a week or two; that during his membership in the club he should not say that the property was unoccupied the greater portion of the year; that it was then occupied more than half of each year, but that it was occupied more than it is now; that one year he was there continuously for about five months; that after three or four years he discontinued going to the homestead to the extent that he had been going, but that until his membership ended he went there a couple or three times in the spring or summer; that these were short trips, but that once during the season he perhaps stayed a week; that frequently when he went in during the first three or four years of his membership he would find the place unoccupied; that such was the general situation, but that he tried to go in when no one else was there; that members of the club went in to the homestead at times during the winter, whenever the roads were open, but that there was no continuous occupation during the winter; that the east fence twisted around on the north side until it got to the thick brush and from that on the brush was so thick that it turned the cattle; that the fence on the east side is now all wire, but Schneider had on that side partially rails or partially poles; that the bluff of the Santa Ana river at the south of the homestead is a bluff which is straight enough up and down—perhaps five or six feet— so that cattle could not come in there; that the fence is not a continuous fence, but it makes a continuous fence with the nature of the land; that the property was kept in better condition than it was by Schneider; that the club pruned the apple trees every three years, which was sufficient, but that Schneider did not prune them at all; that the club had to keep a fence there that would keep stock out and keep the stock of the members in, and that the club did; that he was on the homestead three times after his membership ended; that the last time he was there was a year ago last fall (which was the fall of 1919, as the action was tried in June, 1921); that the property was in as good condition as when Schneider had it, and, with the exception of the alfalfa patch, it was in better condition; that he made no change in the physical appearance of the property in any way while he was a member of respondent other than to make the necessary repairs from time to time; that the club refenced the place, you might say; that there were three spools of wire that went in, outside of the wire that Schneider had there, and that the fence was supposed to have been made cattle tight; that it seemed to him that while he was a member of respondent the Santa Ana side of the fence was carried all the way along; that the apples from the orchard were harvested every year when they were not frozen and were sold; that the club planted some garden on the place; that at one time there was a hand-printed sign on the place which read "Private Property"; that it was at the gate at the east end where people would be coming in, and that it was put up by members of respondent; that the letters on the sign were an inch and a half, perhaps larger; that the sign was a foot and a half long by a foot wide, the color of wood and with black letters; and that it was up during all the time that he was a member of the club, having been placed in 1907 or 1908. Biggin, the president of respondent and a member since its organization, testified that he first went to the Schneider homestead to make use of it as a member of respondent in the summer of 1908; that, starting in that year, he has spent thirty days on the property in each year; that he has taken his family there a great deal, and that he has taken visitors or friends there with him; that he has been on the property many times each year, at various times during the year, running from May 1 to January 1; that after January 1 that country is sometimes open and sometimes snowed in; that at the time he has been going to the property other members have been doing the same, and that others have been there considerably at times when he was there; that, as an instance, two years ago Cave and certain of his relatives were there over Sunday, and some of them remained three or four days afterward; that there were many such cases, and that, as another instance, three years ago, beginning July 1, Biggin's family and one of his office women spent two and a half months at the homestead, during which time he himself was there quite a good deal; that all the members of the club resorted to the property after it was acquired in 1907, some more than others; that while De Hart was a member he was on the place more than any one else, but that, since that time Biggin has been there most, and that Cave, who was deceased at the time of the trial, spent a lot of time there, whenever he could get there; that about five years ago Biggin and a friend of his took off the old roof and put on a new roof on the west cabin and cleaned up the trash; that he has built a good deal of fence in there, too, which was necessary to keep stock out; that he did not think that there was one fence post on the property which was there in 1907, and that he did not think that any of the same wire was left; that the fences have always been kept in sufficient repair to keep the stock out, and that, where there was no fence, there was a natural barrier; that fence was built along the entire river bank, but that part of it, along with part of the bank, was washed out by storms in 1916, and that the part of the fence thus destroyed was replaced by the club the next spring; that the stand of alfalfa which was on the property during Schneider's time was not kept up after 1916, for the reason that the flood of that year washed out the irrigating ditch; that the apple orchard was not plowed or harrowed by respondent, but that the trees were irrigated until 1916, when the ditch was washed out, and pruned five times after 1907; that he never penetrated north from the orchard to a line marked by a surveyor as the south line of the 20.82 acres on a map introduced in evidence and that the country there is impassable; that last fall there was a sign on an oak tree on the southeast corner of the homestead, which was the place of entrance to it; that the sign was placed by Biggin himself; that it has been on the tree most of the time during possession of respondent and that it read "Private Property—Keep Out"; that there was also a sign on the south side of the west cabin, near the entrance to it; that this sign had remained in place for five to seven years up to last fall, when it was still there; that he himself placed this sign, and that it read: "Private Property of Mountain Club —Please Keep Out"; that this sign was about twelve inches by sixteen, with letters an inch and a half high; that there was also formerly on the premises a sign which was posted shortly after respondent took possession and which remained in place for ten years, but which was not in place after the expiration of that time; that this sign read "Private Property, Keep Out"; that there was also a sign, made on about two and a half feet of a six-inch board, placed by the gateway where the members went to get water from the river; that this sign was put up by some member, and read "Mountain Club"; that it was placed some time within the last ten years, but that he could not tell how long it remained; that three of the five prunings of the apple trees occurred in winter; that for two months at a time, seven or eight years ago, an employee of respondent pruned trees and cut wood on the homestead, living in a tent on the premises during the period; and that in the spring of 1920, soon after the probate sale to appellant, the homestead was furnished to the extent that it had been all along, that is, in the kitchen there was a range, table, sideboard, cupboard and sink, in the west room there were mattresses and covers for two beds, blankets and sheets and pillow cases, and two large chests, one a tin and zinc-lined chest that contained the bedding. This complex array of testimony covers the main features of the evidence bearing upon the question whether notice of respondent's claim to the homestead was constructively conveyed to appellant, and we have stated it with a reasonable degree of fullness, because it relates not alone to that point but as well to the question of respondent's alleged title by adverse possession, later to be considered.

Disposition must be made of a specific point presented by appellant concerning the evidence just recited before we come to the general question of the effect of that evidence as imparting constructive notice to him. Appellant says that in order to produce the result which, according to respondent, flows from the testimony in the case, the showing of change of possession from Schneider to respondent must have been of such a nature as to convey to any person examining the property some visible evidence of the fact that Schneider had transferred his right to a third person. It is also said that there must have been something in the evidence to indicate that some one other than Schneider was claiming title to the homestead, and that, after Schneider's death, some one other than his personal representatives was in possession of it. In making these suggestions appellant temporarily loses sight of the comedy of errors out of which arises this most interesting litigation. Appellant, claiming never to have seen the homestead before the probate sale, had, together with the remainder of the world, only such constructive notice as was imparted by the records of San Bernardino county, if we for the moment forget the claim of respondent concerning the alleged constructive notice conveyed by its possession. In fact, appellant contends that the only notice he ever had was that furnished by the record. And yet—and this is the fact which appellant temporarily forgets—the county records showed title in the government to the parcel within which lies the homestead, from the recording of Schneider's deed to the government, in 1901, to the recording of the government's disclaimer, in 1920. Schneider's occupation from 1901 to 1907 and respondent's occupation from the latter year to 1920 are referable to the same mistake—the belief on the part of Schneider that he had omitted from his deed to the government the portion of lot 5 within which lay his little homestead. Considering this just view, it made no difference whether, as time rolled on for nearly twenty years, the possession of the property was that of Schneider, that of his personal representatives, that of the predecessors of respondent, or that of respondent itself. No matter what persons were in possession among all these, their possession was in opposition to the record title. At least, it was apparently in opposition to the record title, for there is no claim made that the evidence of possession, in any of its factors or elements, that is, the possessio pedis, or actual possession, pointed in any way to the government as the occupant. The world, then, including appellant, was put upon such notice, from 1901 to 1920, as the evidence of possession imparted, and was during the same period put upon corresponding inquiry. What the nature or effect of that notice was we shall presently inquire.

If, however, we forget the very evident situation outlined in the paragraph just closed, and meet appellant on the ground chosen by him, we must remark that there was in August, 1907, a change in the possession of the homestead which must have been evident even to the casual observer. For a long time prior to that month Schneider had lived alone upon the property. After that month he was never again to be seen upon it, and in his place there at once appeared the various members of respondent, and particularly, at first, the diligent De Hart. We need not here repeat the recital of the activities of this member of the Mountain Club during the weeks that he occupied the homestead immediately upon the departure of the aged Schneider. It is enough to say that his movements about the place were such that they must have at once struck an observer as indicating a complete control and dominion over it. If we attend to appellant's contention that the change of possession must have been such as to give notice that persons other than Schneider's personal representatives were in control of the property, a ready answer is at once apparent. Schneider lived for four years after his departure from the homestead and the entry of respondent's predecessors upon it. He could have had no personal representatives during that period. In fact, he actually had none until when in 1919, twelve years after he gave up his residence on the homestead, the public administrator was granted letters upon his estate. Whether appellant, a purchaser at a sale under probate proceeding, is bound to take notice of this fact, we need not pause to inquire, as during the four years preceding Schneider's death the change of possession had not only occurred, but respondent and its predecessors had exercised a marked and notorious dominion over the property, unembarrassed by the presence of Schneider for a single moment. From these observations it is apparent that appellant's point that there was no striking evidence of change of possession must fall.

[3, 4] The nature of the possession of real property which will operate to impart notice to the world, and, therefore, to a purchaser for value who claims to rely upon the record title, is pointed out in cases cited in appellant's brief: (1) The possession must be open, visible, unambiguous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and notorious. Hellman v. Levy, 55 Cal. 117; Randall v. Allen, 180 Cal. 298, 180 Pac. 941. (2) It must indicate the occupant. Randall v. Allen, supra. The last of these requisites is, in particular cases, to be found as a resultant from those enumerated in the first list. This is shown in one of the cases cited, the opinion in which also points out the general character of the possession which will convey constructive notice of the claim of the occupant. The court in that case refers to "Cox v. Devinney, 65 N. J. L. 389 (47 Atl. 569), wherein it was held the record purchaser was not charged with notice by a possession of the character indicated [in an earlier part of the opinion]. The court states [in Cox v. Devinney] the reasons for the decision as follows: 'While the general rule is that possession of land is notice to a purchaser of the possessor's right therein, nevertheless such possession, to be effectual, as notice, must be not only exclusive and uninterrupted, it must also be open, notorious and visible, i. e., it must indicate the occupant. The fact that lands are under cultivation does not, of itself, suggest that anyone other than the reputed owner of the premises is in possession of them. In order to charge a purchaser with notice, the occupation must be of a character which would put a prudent person upon inquiry; it must indicate that someone other than he who appears by the record to be the owner has rights in the premises. * * *' With the general principle of Cox v. Devinney (putting upon the statement that the possession 'must indicate the occupant', the meaning which was undoubtedly intended, that it must indicate an occupant other than the record owner, not that it must indicate who such occupant is) the decisions of this state are in accord. * * * They may be summed up as holding that possession in order to be sufficient to establish notice must be open, notorious, exclusive and visible, and not consistent with the record title. This is likewise the general rule in this country upon the point. * * * Underlying these requirements is the idea that the circumstances relied on to establish constructive notice, whether they be possession or something else, must be such that a prudent man would be put upon inquiry." Randall v. Allen, supra. The rule governing such cases is also pointed out in Bessho v. General Petroleum Corporation, 186 Cal. 133, 199 Pac. 22. To indicate how fully the facts in the present litigation satisfy the requirements of the decisions upon the point now under examination we have only to direct attention to the testimony which we have so fully stated. The evidence shows a possession not consistent with the record title, whether that title be viewed in its aspect as resting in the government, from 1901 to 1920, or as resting in the estate of Schneider, during the brief period in 1920, between the date of the recording of the government's disclaimer and the date upon which appellant purchased at the probate sale. Further, the possession was surely of a character calculated to put a prudent man on inquiry. To our minds the evidence plainly supports the finding of the trial court to the effect that appellant was not a purchaser without notice.

[5] The next point made by appellant is that respondent and its predecessors have been guilty of laches in the commencement of the action and are therefore not entitled to equitable relief. The disposition of this question is largely affected by what we have said in discussing another point, for the present question is based upon the fact that the description in the deed from Schneider to the predecessors of respondent called for a tract of land bounded by right lines. It is said that this circumstance should have apprised respondent at once of the fact that the Schneider homestead was not the property intended to be conveyed by the deed. We need not here repeat and are content merely to refer to what we have already said upon this specific point in disposing of the question whether there was a mutual mistake at the time of the execution of the deed, concurred in by Schneider and respondent's predecessors. We may add, however, a few brief observations tending even more strikingly to show the utter futility of the contention that respondent has been guilty of laches. Having entered upon the homestead under the apparently well-founded conviction that the irregularly shaped tract lay within the exterior boundaries of the regularly bounded 20.82 acres of lot 5, respondent was confirmed in its mistake, rather than disabused of it, with the passing years. The possession of the club was kept intact from 1907 to 1920 without even the hint of molestation. During the first four years of this time Schneider was alive and was content, at least as far as the fate of the homestead was concerned. There is not a breath in the record to indicate that he did not end his days in the belief that he had conveyed the inclosure to the predecessors of respondent. To show how all circumstances conspired to perpetuate the original mistake, most natural, certainly, to the extent that the members of respondent participated in it, we are to observe that the assessor of San Bernardino county labored under it as well, for it will appear when we come to consider another point made by appellant that the assessor, in assessing the taxes against respondent upon the 20.82 acres, included an assessment for the improvements on the homestead as being within that acreage. This course he pursued year after year. It is difficult to perceive how appellant, under such an array of circumstances, can seriously make the claim that respondent has been guilty of laches. The real situation is most simple. Respondent had no hint until after appellant bought at the probate sale that the mistake of the long ago had actually occurred, and under all the circumstances the lateness of its disillusionment was both natural and excusable. This action was commenced a little more than fifteen months after the probate sale was confirmed by the superior court, taking even the date of the filing of the amended complaint as our guide, the date of the filing of the complaint not being shown by the record. Under all the circumstances respondent was sufficiently diligent in the commencement of the suit.

[6] It is insisted that respondent is estopped to claim against appellant the relief which was awarded by the trial court, and appellant, in making the point, states that it is closely allied to two questions of which we have already made disposition, that is to say, first, that there was no mistake in either the execution or acceptance of the deed from Schneider to respondent's predecessors, and, second, that respondent was guilty of laches in the commencement of the action. To our minds the relationship between the questions is so close that the present point is determined by what we have said as to the other two. In our opinion the asserted estoppel does not exist.

[7] Another point made by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding of the trial court that respondent acquired title to the Schneider homestead by adverse possession. The solution of this question depends upon the terms of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, in part:

> "For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming title, not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases only: 1. Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure. 2. Where it has been usually cultivated or improved."

The section also requires that, in order to establish a title by adverse possession, it must be shown that land "has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously," and that the occupant has "paid all taxes, state, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed" upon the land. Respondent claims and the trial court found that title by adverse possession was acquired because of an occupancy of the homestead during the years 1911 to 1915, inclusive. Appellant's first assault on the finding is upon the contention that the property was not protected by a substantial inclosure during the period. In view of the evidence we may dismiss with a mere mention all question as to the nature of the inclosure on the easterly and westerly sides. The record amply shows that a substantial fence was maintained on both of these sides. The only reason for reserving questions as to the northerly and southerly boundaries for separate treatment is that, on the north and at least partially on the south, natural obstructions are relied upon as constituting the inclosure on those sides. The subdivision of section 325 which is numbered 1 is satisfied by the employment of natural barriers for the purpose of completing an inclosure, provided only that they be effective as part of an actual inclosure, the usual measure as to their effectiveness being found in the answer to the question whether they will turn cattle. Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 Pac. 705; Smith v. Hicks, 139 Cal. 217, 73 Pac. 144. The record here presents an answer to that question which shows a substantial support for the finding of the trial court. We consider first the northerly boundary. De Hart refers to the buckthorn which Schneider could not penetrate at all—that is "unless you cut your way in," and he further characterizes it as so dense that cattle would not go through it, so thick that it would turn cattle, and so thick that cattle would not go through it. Biggin says, of the north side, that the country there is impassable. Turning now to the question of the southerly boundary line: Cave testifies concerning Schneider's time that along the bank, where it was necessary to keep cattle out, there had been brush piled and poles put across. De Hart says that the bluff of the Santa Ana river * * * is a bluff which is straight enough up and down—perhaps five or six feet—so that cattle could not come in there, and that it seemed to him that while he was a member of respondent the Santa Ana side of the fence was carried all the way along. Biggin testifies that fence was built along the entire river bank, but that part of it, along with part of the bank, was washed out by storms in 1916, and that the part of the fence thus destroyed was replaced by the club the next spring. There can be little doubt as to the nature of the "fence" on the northerly and southerly sides from this separate consideration of those sides, but its effectiveness as a whole, still, however, keeping more particularly in mind the northerly and southerly sections of the barrier, is shown decisively by some of the testimony. De Hart testifies that at the time Cave and he talked first with Schneider the fence was sufficient to protect the ranch; there being alfalfa in the barn at the time. Speaking of the time during which he was a member, which ran for eight or ten years after 1907, De Hart says that the property was entirely closed by these obstructions and fences, so much so that it kept the cattle out which were pastured on the ranch, evidently referring to nearby property, and that there was a growing alfalfa patch on the homestead which would naturally attract them. He also says that the stock driven in by members was kept pastured inside the inclosure, that, while the fence was not continuous, it made a continuous "fence" with the nature of the land, and that the club maintained a fence that would keep stock out and keep the stock of the members in. Biggin testifies that the fences have always been kept in sufficient repair to keep the stock out, and that where there was no fence there was a natural barrier. We have no doubt, after a consideration of all this evidence, that the trial court was eminently justified in finding that the homestead was protected by a substantial inclosure during the years 1911 to 1915, inclusive.

[8] It is contended that the finding as to adverse possession is unsupported by the evidence, for the reason that, to quote from the statute, the homestead was not shown to have been "usually cultivated or improved" during the period covered by the finding. We are satisfied that this contention is not well founded, but, having gone so fully into the question of inclosure, we do not find it necessary to be at equal pains upon the present point. We merely refer, as a sufficient support for the finding in the respect mentioned, to the testimony in the record concerning the manner in which the alfalfa and apple trees were irrigated and cared for and the crops harvested from 1907 until the irrigation ditch was washed out in 1916.

[9] Appellant's final contention is that the finding as to adverse possession is not supported by the evidence because the record fails to show that respondent complied with the provisions of the statute concerning the payment of taxes. It has been said that in order to meet the requirement a claimant of title by adverse possession "must prove either that no taxes were levied and assessed upon the land, or that he had paid all taxes which were levied thereon." Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 Pac. 160. In the present case the evidence shows that no taxes were levied or assessed upon any land which embraced the Schneider homestead during the years 1911 to 1915, inclusive, except in a single instance presently to be noticed, although in each year an assessment was made upon the north 20.82 acres of lot 5, or upon 20.82 acres in lot 5, the tax so levied having been paid in each instance by respondent. We have observed in another place, as illustrating the contretemps which runs through the entire record here, that the several assessments of taxes on the 20.82 acres included an assessment for the improvements on the homestead. Respondent therefore actually paid taxes annually upon those improvements, in connection with the payments made upon a tract of land on which they were not situated, although that fact appears not to affect the present question. We have mentioned one instance in the period 1911–1915 in which a tax was assessed against land on which the Schneider homestead is located, although the sequel will show that a considerable portion of the homestead lies outside the boundaries of the tract against which that assessment was levied. In 1912 an assessment was made in the name of Schneider against the north 30.62 acres of lot 5. This assessment, the tax not having been paid, was carried on the delinquent rolls until in 1916, when, upon the application of respondent to the board of supervisors, it was canceled as a double assessment. While it was double as to the north 20.82 acres of the lot, it was not double as to 9.80 acres lying south of the former area. Appellant says that it was the duty of respondent under the law as to adverse possession to pay the tax upon the 9.80 acres, and this is the sole ground upon which he contends that, in the matter of the payment of taxes, the finding as to adverse possession is not supported by the evidence. He says that the order canceling the assessment, made in 1916, cannot reach back and excuse a failure to pay, as, so he says, the tax as to the last-mentioned acreage was valid. No authority is presented to sustain this contention, and respondent cites none which is in point, to our minds. to dispute it. As we regard the question now under consideration as the only doubtful one in the case, and as it appears, as far as we can discover, to be one of first impression, we shall proceed, with care, to analyze a little more circumspectly the point made, and shall then, with an equal degree of circumspection, endeavor to ascertain the facts to which it is to be applied. We shall assume, without deciding, that appellant is correct in his postulate that the order of the board of supervisors made in 1916 does not of itself excuse respondent's failure to pay the tax based upon the questioned assessment. In other words, we shall determine the question as if the order of the board had never been made and upon the assessment itself.

There is yet another circumstance to be noted in stating the question. We do not perceive how, as appellant contends, respondent was liable to pay or how he could have paid any tax on the 9.80 acres, and this for the simple reason that the amount of that tax could not have been ascertained. It certainly, so it seems to us, could not be reckoned upon the employment for purposes of computation of a fraction the numerator and denominator of which are, respectively, 9.80 and 30.62. It appears to us that, if respondent, in order to satisfy the statute as to adverse possession, must have paid any tax under the questioned assessment, he must have paid the entire tax for two reasons: (1) Regarding respondent as the claimant to the homestead the assessment was not double even as to the 20.82 acres, as respondent's ownership of record of that tract is a fortuitous condition. Considering respondent as the occupant of the homestead, the present question must be treated as if some other person were the record owner of the 20.82 acres. (2) It apparently matters not if the assessment were double as to 20.82 acres. Still viewing the situation from the standpoint of respondent as the occupant of the homestead, the board of supervisors should have canceled the assessment on the 20.82 acres, which does not include the homestead, and not the assessment on the 30.62 acres, which does include about two-thirds of it, as the facts now to be outlined will show. There is in the record a plat which delineates lot 5, and which shows the location within it of the homestead. The southerly boundary of the 20.82 acres is also shown. The homestead lies wholly south of that boundary. We have measured, as nearly correctly as we may, half the distance from the northerly boundary of lot 5 to the southerly boundary of the 20.82 acres, and at an equal distance south of the last-mentioned boundary we have drawn across the lot as shown on the plat a line parallel to that boundary. We have by that process inclosed a tract approximately one-half the size of the 20.82 acres, or 10.41 acres. When we add the acreage of the two pieces we have a tract approximately 31.23 acres in extent, near enough in size to the assessed tract of 30.62 acres to answer our present purpose. The adoption of this process is made necessary, it will be observed, because of our inability to draw from the record before us a line which will exactly exhibit a smaller tract of 9.80 acres or a larger tract of 30.62 acres. The surveyor who made the survey from which the plat in the record is produced testified that the Schneider homestead contains approximately five or six acres. The plat shows that more than one-third of the homestead lies south of the line we have drawn, and therefore outside the 31.23 acre tract. If we take the extreme acreage of the homestead as stated by the engineer, that is, six acres, we are able to say that less than four acres of it lie within the 31.23-acre tract. This four acres, approximately, also lies, as we have already indicated, within the tract of about 10.41 acres confined on the plat by the line which we have projected. Moreover, the homestead is entirely surrounded by the superficies of the 10.41 acres, except on its southerly side. If we attempt to depict the situation more graphically we may liken the 31.23-acre tract to a rectangular sheet of paper, whereupon it will appear that 4 acres minus may be represented by an irregularly shaped fragment torn from about the middle of the lower side of the sheet. The relationship of this fragment to the paper from which it is taken will stand in the proportion of 4 to approximately 31.23. Keeping in mind the facts thus stated, and returning from our approximate acreages to the exact figures which result from the assessment, we may state in several forms the question to be solved by us: (1) Was respondent bound to pay the entire tax on the 30.62 acres? (2) Was it bound to pay a tax, computed in whatever manner, upon the 9.80 acres? (3) Was it bound to pay a tax computed in whatever manner, on the less than 4 acres of the homestead included within the 9.80 acres? (4) Stating the problem negatively, respondent surely was not bound to pay a tax upon the entire homestead, for more than one-third of its area lies outside the 30.62 acres, and was unassessed in any sense.

We have found no authority which fits the peculiar conditions shown by the record, but we are able to discover analogies between certain propositions of law and the question before us, and from them we are enabled to determine the point. In a standard work the very general proposition is laid down that "to establish a lien for taxes on realty and sustain proceedings for the forfeiture or sale of the land for nonpayment of the tax, it is necessary that the assessment shall contain such a description as will identify the particular parcel of land assessed with certainty and beyond any reasonable possibility of doubt or mistake." 37 Cyc. 1052. It is said in another work that "A sufficient description of the property intended to be assessed is inherently essential to a valid tax on real estate, and if the property is not described in the assessment list with sufficient accuracy and particularity to render it capable of ready identification, the tax thereon is void." 26 R. C. L., tit. Taxation, par. 314. A well-known author writes:

> "In listing the land [for taxation] it must be described with particularity sufficient to afford the owner the means of identification, and not to mislead him." Cooley, Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 740.

See, also, Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733, 78 Pac. 293.

Several California cases may be mentioned as having some bearing upon the point now under consideration, although it is to be understood that in none of them were the facts closely akin to those now before us. They are cited merely as instances showing specific application of the general principle embraced in the quotations above set forth. It is said in one case that "the statute requires that the description, either by common designation, or name, or by metes and bounds, shall appear on the face of the assessment roll; so that by inspecting it the owner and all other persons may know what particular land is assessed." People v. Cone, 48 Cal. 427. It is also said that "the description should be sufficient in itself to identify the land," Miller v. Williams, 135 Cal. 183, 67 Pac. 788, and that an assessment must contain something "which would establish the identity of the tract or parcel of land sought to be assessed. * * * A necessary thing in proceedings to enforce the collection of a tax." Smith v. City of Los Angeles, 158 Cal. 702, 112 Pac. 307. Other decisions of the Supreme Court might be cited in support of the general principle which we have in mind, but we need not take the time nor the space to list them. In relying on the principle we are not unmindful of the fact that the assessment here in question is perfectly plain on its face. It describes the north 30.62 acres of lot 5, a parcel of land to be located with consummate ease, but the tract to which appellant seeks to fasten the assessment is the Schneider homestead, and under that contention it appears to us that respondent as the occupant of the homestead, is the "owner" who is to be enabled under the law to identify its land as the land assessed. The question which we are to decide is not whether the assessment is sufficient to stand as the levy of a tax on the north 30.62 acres of lot 5, but whether under it respondent must have paid a tax on the homestead, situated partly within and partly without the acreage mentioned, in order to satisfy the statute requiring the payment of taxes to establish a title by adverse possession. We cannot avoid the conclusion that respondent was not required so to pay and that the trial court was justified in making the implied finding, embraced within its finding as to adverse possession, that the homestead was not assessed for taxes in the year 1912.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a transfer and hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain all of the findings of fact which were necessary to support the judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the first cause of action, which was for reformation of the deed, and we are satisfied with the conclusion of that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal which deals with the questions arising under said first cause of action. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to determine whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support the finding and conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff acquired title by adverse possession. We therefore neither approve nor disapprove the portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal which deals with that question.

1. Indictment and information 🔑61—Judicial notice that city board of education is school board authorized to allow claim against district.

Indictment alleging presentation of fraudulent claim to school board of Sacramento city school district sufficiently stated offense of presenting fraudulent claim to city board, authorized to allow or pay it, if genuine (Pen. Code, § 72); court taking judicial notice that city board of education, in which government and control of public schools of such district is vested by Sacramento Charter, §§ 53, 55, is school board of, and only official body authorized to allow claim against, such district.

2. False pretenses 🔑18—Board of education of chartered city is "city board" within statute defining felony of presenting fraudulent claim for allowance or payment.

Board of education of chartered city is "city board" within Pen. Code, § 72, declaring presentation of fraudulent claim to "city board" for allowance or payment a felony.

3. False pretenses 🔑37—Indictment for presenting fraudulent claim held not defective, in not alleging presentation for allowance or payment.

Indictment, alleging presentation of fraudulent claim and demand for payment of specified sum to city school board authorized to allow claims, held not defective in not alleging presentation for allowance or payment.

4. Criminal law 🔑590(2)—Refusal of request for continuance by counsel appointed for defendant falsely representing himself as without means held not unreasonable.

Refusal of request for continuance by counsel, appointed day before that set for trial, on vacation of order appointing other counsel for defendant on latter's representation that he was without means, held not unreasonable, in view of evidence of defendant's substantial means and his bad faith in requesting appointment of counsel.

5. Criminal law 🔑898—Refusal of continuance held cured by subsequent continuances.

Error, if any, in refusing request for continuance by counsel appointed for defendant day before trial, held cured by subsequent continuances allowing counsel time requested in which to prepare for trial of issues in real controversy.

6. Criminal law 🔑1170½(1)—Sustaining objection to question to impeaching witness as to statement substantially admitted by witness sought to be impeached held not prejudicial.

Sustaining objection to question asked for purpose of impeaching witness, from whom no direct answer to question put to him had been elicited, held not prejudicial error, where natural inference from his answer was that he had at least substantially made statement sought to be proved by impeaching witness.

7. False pretenses 🔑18—School board's determination of validity of claim and order for payment constitutes "allowance."

School board's determination of validity of claim against district and order for payment, as authorized by Pol. Code, §§ 1543, 1608, constitutes "allowance" within Pen. Code, § 72, declaring presentation of fraudulent claim for allowance to city board, authorized to allow it, if genuine, a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Allowance.]

8. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Refusal of instruction to find state's witnesses accomplices in case of reasonable doubt held not prejudicial.

Refusal of requested instruction to find that state's witnesses were accomplices, if jury entertained reasonable doubt, held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of such witnesses' uncontradicted testimony that they participated in offense charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Charles S. Ralph was convicted of fraudulently presenting bill or claim to public officer for allowance and payment, and appeals. Affirmed.

Mark L. Burns and R. Platnauer, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the "crime of fraudulently presenting a bill or claim to a public officer for allowance and payment, a felony, as charged in the indictment." This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The indictment charges:

> That the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the Sacramento city school district 30 tons of coal at the price of $12.30 a ton; that he delivered 25 tons and 256 pounds thereof and no more; that thereafter he "did willfully, unlawfully, knowingly and feloniously, and with the intent to defraud said Sacramento city school district, present and caused to be presented to the officers of said Sacramento city school district, to wit, to the school board of said school district, a certain false and fraudulent claim and demand for the payment to him, said defendant, of the sum of $369, the said claim or demand being for 30 full tons of said coal at the price of $12.30 per ton, which defendant falsely claimed he had delivered to said school district on said contract, which said claim and demand the officials of said school district were authorized then and there to pay and allow if said claim and demand were genuine, which said claim was by said officials of said Sacramento city school district allowed in full and thereafter paid in due course to said defendant."

It is not claimed that the evidence is insufficient to show defendant's guilt. The defendant was in the wood and coal business. His salesman and office manager, A. S. Kennedy, testified that the defendant said "the coal was sold very cheap" and directed the witness to "short weight it"; that pursuant to such directions the witness instructed the man who made delivery of the coal, Barney Brooks, "to put on a few sacks of coal in sacks and use it as a tail board, when they backed up to the car; to throw the coal on and take the load over to the public scales and weigh the load and, on the way back, to drop off the loaded sacks, then make his delivery to the school, and when he made his delivery to the school, to come back and pick up the loaded sacks and use them as a tail gate"; and that the man "went ahead and followed instructions." The foreman of the grand jury which returned the indictment testified: That the defendant voluntarily stated before that body: "I don't want Kennedy to take all the blame * * * for the short delivery of this coal." That when asked if Kennedy had told him of his plan for the short delivery the defendant answered: "He had told me of it. * * * I didn't answer 'Yes' or 'No.'" That a grand juror asked him if he thought it was right to make the short delivery, and defendant replied: "As I look back over it now, I don't think it was." The foreman further testified in part as follows:

> "I remember myself of asking Mr. Ralph if these men who worked for him informed him of this shortage, why he did not make the delivery at that time, and his answer was that, 'I knew this thing was coming up, and I was waiting to see what was going to happen; I expected to make good when the matter was brought up.' But he had waited a month and a half and hadn't made good, and the matter was brought up; that is, he waited a month and a half after the coal was delivered before he presented his bill to the city for the coal.
> "Q. And did he state anything as to whether he knew of the short delivery before he presented the claim to the city? A. Well, the men had gone to him and told him about it, and he admitted that they did tell him about it. * * *
> "Q. He told you that the men had told him about the shortage * * * before the bill was presented? A. Yes, sir."

Several other members of the grand jury gave similar testimony. The defendant testified:

> That in the grand jury room "there were many questions asked, and sometimes they were asked two or three at a time, and * * * there was quite a bit of confusion, as would be amongst 15 or 16 people trying to interrogate one witness. Some of the questions I may have misunderstood; some of them I didn't."

He denied having directed Kennedy to give short weight in delivering the coal or of having any knowledge that short weights were given, and testified:

> That before the coal was delivered "Mr. Kennedy said: 'For the rotten way in which the school department has treated us in this deal, we should short weight it.' * * * I said: 'Kennedy are you crazy?' * * * That was all there was of it."

While there is other testimony favorable to defendant and tending to discredit some of that produced by the prosecution, a very strong case was made against him.

Section 72 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Every person who, with intent to defraud, presents for allowance or for payment to any state board or officer, or to any county, town, city, ward, or village board or officer, authorized to allow or pay the same if genuine, any false or fraudulent claim, bill, account, voucher, or writing, is guilty of felony."

[1] It is contended that the indictment does not state a public offense; that the allegation therein that the alleged fraudulent claim was presented to "the officers of said Sacramento city school district, to wit, to the school board of said school district" does not constitute an averment that such claim was presented to the city board of education, the only body authorized to allow the claim. Article 9 of the charter of Sacramento provides:

> "Sec. 53. The government of the Sacramento city school district and the Sacramento city high school district shall be vested in a board of education consisting of five members. * * *
> "Sec. 55. The board of education shall have the entire control and management of the public schools of the city in accordance with the Constitution and the general laws of the state." Stats. 1921, p. 1939.

The courts take judicial notice that the city board of education is the "school board" of Sacramento city school district, and the only official body authorized by law to allow a claim against the district. The term "school board" is in common use to designate either the board of school trustees or the city board of education, depending upon the character of the district, and no one could be in doubt as to the meaning of the term. The defendant did not demur to the indictment. To hold that the indictment does not state an offense would be to reverse the maxim that "the law respects form less than substance."

[2] It is urged that the board of education of a chartered city is not a city board. The contrary has been held. Stern v. City Council of Berkeley, 25 Cal. App. 685, 689, 145 Pac. 167.

[3] It is next urged that the indictment is defective in failing to allege that the fraudulent claim was presented "for allowance or payment." It is alleged that the defendant presented to the board the "fraudulent claim and demand for the payment to him * * * of the sum of $369." For one to present to a board, authorized to allow claims, a claim and demand for payment of the same to him, is certainly to present the claim for allowance, the only way in which it could be paid to him.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant him a reasonable time to prepare for trial. Two previous trials had resulted in disagreements of the juries. October 19, 1923, defendant's counsel withdrew from the case. November 13th was the day set for the third trial. On that day the defendant informed the court that he was without counsel and stated that he "was without means to employ counsel, and desired the court to appoint counsel to defend him." The court thereupon appointed Charles A. Bliss as counsel for defendant and continued the trial for two days. November 14th, at 11:55 o'clock a. m., the court vacated the order appointing Bliss and made an order appointing Mark L. Burns as counsel for defendant. November 15th Burns presented affidavits to the effect that the reporter's transcript of the testimony taken at the first trial consisted of 306 typewritten pages, and a portion of that at the second trial covered 194 pages, and that of the proceedings before the grand jury consisted of 69 pages, that he had no information as to any of the facts in the case prior to his appointment, and that it had been physically impossible for him to prepare for the trial within the time given him, and requested a continuance of five days. If nothing further appeared than the foregoing, it would appear that the action of the court in forcing the case to trial was clearly unreasonable. The district attorney, however, presented a writing dated August 9, 1923, addressed to the corporation commissioner of this state, and signed by defendant, in which appears the following: "My statement shows that I have fixed assets to the extent of $13,415.84." From this and other evidence of a similar character the court would have been justified in vacating the order appointing counsel for defendant, on the ground that his statement to the effect that he was without means to employ counsel was false, and that his request for the appointment of counsel to defend him was made in bad faith. It further appears that the selection of the jury was completed on the 16th of November. Evidence concerning which there seems to have been no controversy or dispute was introduced on that day, and the trial was then continued to November 19th, and on the latter day, without taking any testimony, the case was adjourned to November 21st. It thus appears that counsel for defendant had five clear days in which to prepare for the trial of issues in real controversy, the length of time he had originally requested. If it was error to refuse the requested continuance in the first instance the subsequent continuances cured the error.

[6] Kennedy testified on direct examination:

> "I was called to appear before the grand jury, * * * and I wanted to get some legal advice * * * because I made up my mind what I intended to do, * * * so I went to Mr. Ralph's attorney, Mr. Bliss, and * * * I explained it, the case, to Mr. Bliss, that I * * * wanted to take the whole thing upon any own shoulders. * * * Took the whole blame myself, * * * in order to make Mr. Bliss understand * * * what I wanted to know from him, that, if I took the entire blame upon my own shoulders, and things went against me, what was the penalty. So, after Mr. Bliss heard my statement, story, in which I acknowledged everything, why then he told me what the penalty would be."

What the purpose of the prosecution was in introducing this testimony does not appear. It seems to have been wholly immaterial and inadmissible, but defendant made no objection thereto. On cross-examination by counsel for defendant the following occurred:

> "Q. I will ask you if you made this statement to Mr. Bliss: 'That Mr. Ralph did not know anything about the shortage, and the whole thing was worked out and carried out by myself, and that Mr. Ralph had nothing to do with it?' A. I don't remember just what statement that I made to Mr. Bliss, but what I explained this morning was that * * * if I took this thing on my own shoulders, what would the penalty be. * * * I only had five minutes to talk with Mr. Bliss, and, in order to get this thing right, the only way I could get it in was to take the whole blame upon my own shoulders and ask Mr. Bliss what would the penalty be."

The inference to be drawn from the answer is that in the conversation referred to Kennedy stated that he alone committed the offense, and it would follow that the defendant "had nothing to do with it." Counsel for defendant then dropped the subject, as if satisfied, and did not insist upon a categorical answer to the question. He thereafter called Mr. Bliss as a witness for defendant, and asked him whether Kennedy had made the statement contained in the question. The court sustained the prosecution's objection to the question, apparently upon the ground that Kennedy had admitted making the statement. The question was permissible only for the purpose of impeaching the witness Kennedy, and counsel should have laid the foundation therefor by eliciting from such witness a direct answer to the question put to him. Had the witness testified that he did not remember whether he had made the statement to Bliss, the answer would have furnished a sufficient foundation for the impeaching question. Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 436, 120 Pac. 49. The natural inference from his answer, however, is that he had, in substance at least, made such statement. Since the purported statement was in direct conflict with Kennedy's testimony to the effect that the defendant directed him to commit the fraud, the court might well have overruled the objection to the impeaching question, but, in view of Kennedy's substantial admission that he had made the statement, it is thought that the defendant suffered no prejudice from the ruling made.

[7] At the oral argument the appellant contended that the city board of education is not authorized to allow claims of the character of that involved in this action. The board has authority "to manage and control school property" and "to purchase school furniture * * * and apparatus, and such other articles as may be necessary for the use of schools." Pol. Code, § 1608. It is also authorized to order the payment of claims against the district. If the county superintendent approves the claim, he indorses upon the order, "Examined and approved." The order is then presented to the county auditor, "who shall, in case he allows said demand, indorse upon it, 'Allowed.'" Pol. Code, § 1543. From the foregoing provisions it seems clear that the function of the school board in allowing claims against the district is similar to that of a board of supervisors in allowing claims against a county. Neither the county superintendent nor the auditor is ordinarily in a position to ascertain whether materials have been purchased and delivered to a school district or the quality or value thereof, and the Code provisions upon the subject do not contemplate that those officers shall make the investigation, but the duty of determining such facts has been imposed upon the school board. Such determination as to the validity of a claim, together with an order for the payment thereof, certainly constitutes an allowance of such claim, within the meaning of section 72 of the Penal Code.

[8] The defendant requested the court to instruct the jurors that it was material to determine whether the witnesses Kennedy and Brooks were accomplices, and that, if they entertained a reasonable doubt upon that question, they should find that such witnesses were accomplices. At defendant's request the court instructed the jury—

> "That all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, are accomplices."

Kennedy testified that he instructed Brooks to remove a part of each load of coal after it was weighed and before the delivery thereof, and Brooks testified that he so removed 12 sacks of coal from each of 8 loads. Assuming that the jurors were of ordinary intelligence, they must have been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from the testimony of Kennedy and Brooks, which was wholly uncontradicted as to their part in the fraud, that these witnesses were accomplices, under the foregoing definition given by the court, and therefore, the refusal of the proposed instruction was not prejudicial.

The other grounds urged for a reversal are so manifestly untenable as to merit no discussion.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

GREENE v. TOWN OF LAKEPORT.

(Civ. 2809.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 20, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑800—Motion to dismiss appeal for lack of certified copy of transcript denied, where appellant subsequently filed one.

Plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's appeal, on the ground defendant failed to file a properly certified transcript on appeal, will be denied, where, after permission granted at the hearing of the motion, defendant filed a duly certified copy of the transcript, in view of Supreme Court rule 15.

2. Appeal and error 🔑655(3)—On appeal on judgment roll alone, matter purporting to be statement of facts material to case stricken.

On appeal on judgment roll alone, matter set out by appellant under cover of printed transcript and purporting to be statement of facts material to case, is no part of record, and will be stricken therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by D. W. Greene against the Town of Lakeport, in which defendant appealed. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for appellant.

C. M. Crawford and H. G. Crawford, both of Lakeport, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal herein on the ground that no properly certified transcript on appeal has been filed.

[1, 2] The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone. The transcript is printed, and, as originally filed, contained what purported to be copies of the judgment roll and the notice of appeal, with the clerk's certificate attached thereto. Neither the clerk's signature nor seal appeared upon either certificate, but his name appeared in print at the end thereof. At the hearing of the motion appellant asked permission to file an authenticated copy of the transcript, and, permission being granted, it has filed a duly certified copy thereof. Under the same cover containing the printed transcript, appellant has set out what purports to be a statement of the facts material to the case. This statement is no part of the record on appeal, and it is ordered that the same be stricken therefrom.

Under the authority of rule XV of the Supreme Court, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986; Swortfiguer v. White, 137 Cal. 391, 70 Pac. 214; Garroway v. Jennings, 189 Cal. 97, 207 Pac. 554.

HILL-TELLMAN v. MUSICIANS' UNION OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4778.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 14, 1924.)

Certiorari ⚷14—Writ held improper remedy to review order of nongovernmental private association imposing fine on member.

Writ of certiorari held not proper remedy to review an order of a nongovernmental body such as an order of a voluntary unincorporated musicians' association, imposing a fine on a former member.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Petition by Mary J. E. Hill-Tellman for writ of certiorari to review an order of the Musicians' Union of San Francisco and others, imposing a fine on petitioner. From a judgment and orders in favor of defendants, petitioner appeals. Orders and judgment affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sapiro, Levy, Hatfield & Hayes, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against her after a demurrer had been sustained to her petition for a writ of review, without leave to amend. Plaintiff sought to have a writ of review issue from the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, directed to the defendants, Musicians' Union of San Francisco, an unincorporated volunteer association, and certain of its officers, for the purpose of inquiring into the action of defendants in imposing a fine upon plaintiff. She alleged that the fine was imposed after her resignation from the Musicians' Union, but does not seek reinstatement therein nor claim to be a member of such Union. She prayed that the judgment and penalty imposed upon her by said defendants be vacated and annulled.

Defendant demurred and moved to quash the alternative writ issued at the time of the filing of the petition. The demurrer was sustained and the motion granted, and judgment for costs entered in favor of the defendants.

The action of the trial court was based upon the ground that writs of review issue only to governmental bodies and not to voluntary unincorporated associations such as the Musicians' Union. No authority is cited by the appellant to contradict this holding, and, as pointed out by the learned trial court, the cases relied upon deal with boards or officers acting as public agents and invested by law with judicial or quasi judicial authority in the administration of the business of the state or a political subdivision thereof. No case has been cited which authorizes a writ of certiorari when complaint is made of the action of a private association such as the organization involved here. We disagree with appellant that this fact is without significance in the absence of a direct holding in the state denying the writ under such circumstances. We think the absence of any instance in this state or elsewhere of the issuance of this writ against a nongovernmental body indicates that the writ is not the proper remedy in such situations. In the case of Whitehead v. Gray, 12 N. J. Law, 36, the Supreme Court of New Jersey denied the issuance of a writ to review the proceedings of private arbitrators, saying:

> "There is no precedent of such a certiorari, in this court, in the other states of the Union, or in the English reports, so far as I am able to learn, either from my own researches or from the brief of the plaintiff's counsel. Hence a very cogent and almost irresistible argument results against the present employment of this writ. So frequent here and elsewhere are arbitrations; so numerous are awards; so invariably is the losing party dissatisfied; so commonly are the very complaints made which are here urged; so usual is it for the unsuccessful litigant to suppose, and oftentimes most sincerely, that the arbitrators have done too little for him and too much against him; and the common modes of redress against awards are deemed so arduous and straitened, that we may presume, if not conclude, the omission to use the writ of certiorari is from the conviction of the profession, that it cannot lawfully be done. In The King v. Whitbread, Doug. 549, Lord Mansfield said: 'Though great industry has been employed, no case was produced, in which a certiorari has been granted to remove proceedings before the commissioners of excise. This circumstance alone affords strong ground to suspect that none is grantable.'"

In the case of Whitney v. Board, 14 Cal. 479, cited by appellant, it was said, with reference to the propriety of the issuance of a writ of review:

> "The only question is: Does the body whose acts are to be reviewed, exercise judicial functions under the Constitution and laws of the state?"

In the case of Spring Valley Water Works v. Board of Supervisors, 52 Cal. 132, 137, the court said:

> "From the foregoing and other cases heretofore decided, it sufficiently appears that it has always been considered by this court that the office of certiorari is to bring here for review the proceedings of governmental boards exercising a mixed authority only when the matter is one in which they have acted judicially."

In the case of Imperial Valley Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 Pac. 780, a writ was issued to review the acts of the board of supervisors in the organization of an irrigation district. It was there said:

> "Although such boards do not have the character of an ordinary court of law or equity, they frequently are required to exercise judicial functions in the course of the duties enjoined upon them. In Robinson v. Board, 16 Cal. 208, the court says: 'It is sufficient if they are invested by the Legislature with power to decide on the property or rights of the citizens. In making their decision they act judicially whatever may be their public character.' * * * It is sufficient to come within the purview of the writ if such proceedings are of a judicial nature and are exercised by a quasi judicial body."

It appearing from the foregoing authorities that the plaintiff has mistaken her remedy, it becomes unnecessary for us to consider the further question discussed by the parties with reference to the adequacy of plaintiff's remedy at law.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

OLIVER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4832.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑82(2)—Mandamus 🔑4(4)—Order denying motion to amend entry of judgment nunc pro tunc held appealable; remedy by appeal held adequate.

An order denying a motion to amend an entry of judgment nunc pro tunc is an appealable order, as being one made after final judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, and generally the appeal affords an ample remedy.

2. Mandamus 🔑154(2)—Petition pleading conclusion that remedy by appeal was inadequate held insufficient.

Mandamus to compel amendment of entry of judgment nunc pro tunc would not lie where petition therefor contained no allegation to indicate that appeal did not afford a full, speedy, and adequate remedy, except the bare recital of that fact, which was but a mere conclusion of the pleader.

Petition by A. J. Oliver, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of the Commercial Brass Foundry, a partnership, for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another. Writ denied and proceeding dismissed.

See, also, 223 Pac. 558.

McKannay & Hunt, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Leon A. Blum and David K. Watkins, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for writ of mandate to be directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for the insertion of certain names nunc pro tunc as of November 13, 1922, the date of the entry of a certain judgment, so as to conform to the facts.

The action in which the judgment was rendered was one in which petitioner, acting as trustee in bankruptcy in the estate of Commercial Brass Foundry, a proceeding pending in the United States District Court, brought an action on August 12, 1921, as such trustee, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, against Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership, to recover the sum of $689.49, alleged to have been received by defendant as a preference, voidable under the provisions of section 60a and 60b of the National Bankruptcy Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 9643) and the amendments thereto. The caption used in the complaint was, "Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership composed of Earl I. Staples and L. A. Pfeiffer, defendants." In the complaint it is alleged in paragraph 2 thereof that at and during all of the dates and times hereafter mentioned the defendant Staples & Pfeiffer was and now is a partnership composed of the defendants Earl I. Staples and L. A. Pfeiffer, and engaged in business in said city and county. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against the "defendants." Thereafter on the 8th day of September, 1921, defendants filed a demurrer in said action without specifying any defendant or defendants by name or otherwise identifying any particular defendant or defendants. Throughout subsequent pleadings and orders defendant was designated by both parties as "defendants" generally, although the caption of the pleadings and orders remained the same. In the amended complaint the description of the defendant is, "Staples & Pfeiffer, composed of Earl I. Staples and L. A. Pfeiffer, defendants". The prayer is as follows: "Wherefore plaintiff prays for judgment against defendants."

The action was tried before said superior court, department 7 thereof, Hon. E. P. Mogan sitting as judge; and thereafter and on the 13th day of November, 1922, the said judge signed and filed his findings of fact and conclusions of law. Paragraph 2 of said findings of fact reads as follows:

> "At and during all the dates and times herein mentioned the defendant Staples & Pfeiffer was and now is a partnership composed of the defendants Earl I. Staples and L. A. Pfeiffer, and engaged in business at the said city and county."

In the findings of fact the reference is always to "defendants." The conclusions of law are that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against the "defendants."

Thereafter and on the 13th day of November, 1922, judgment was entered in the action. The judgment does not specify the names of the persons against whom the judgment was rendered. The caption is as follows:

> "A. J. Oliver, as trustee in bankruptcy of Commercial Brass Foundry, a partnership, plaintiff, v. Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership composed of Earl I. Staples, and L. A. Pfeiffer, defendants."

The body of the judgment recites:

> "The above-entitled action came on regularly for trial * * * the answer thereto of the above-named defendants * * * appearing as counsel for defendants. * * * It is hereby ordered that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendants the sum of $538.49 and costs of this action taxed at $48."

Thereafter on the 24th of November, 1922, defendant in said action filed its notice of motion to retax costs, which recites: "Please take notice that the defendants, * * *" and is signed by the attorneys as "attorneys for defendants."

In the notice to the clerk to prepare a transcript the defendant is referred to as "defendants," and the notice of appeal describes it as being "defendants" as does also the notice of justification of sureties.

Thereafter on the 14th day of September, 1923, the plaintiff in said action filed in said superior court his notice of motion to amend the said judgment nunc pro tunc by inserting therein the names of the defendants, namely, "Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership, and Earl I. Staples and L. A. Pfeiffer, as individuals, as the persons against whom the judgment was rendered, so that the judgment entered shall conform to the judgment actually rendered by the court," and in said notice of motion stated that the same would be made upon the grounds that the judgment as entered was a clerical misprision and failed to name specifically the defendants against whom it was rendered, it being claimed that the record showed who the defendants were and against whom the judgment was actually rendered by the court. The said motion came on for hearing before the said superior court on October 5, 1923. The defendant in said action through its counsel appeared in opposition to said motion. The said motion was heard and submitted, and thereafter on the 16th day of October, 1923, the said superior court made an order denying the motion, and thereafter this proceeding was instituted.

Respondents demurred and answered to the petition, and they claim that it does not state a cause for the issuance of a writ of mandate for various reasons.

[1] It is first contended that the petition shows upon its face that respondent superior court duly acted on said motion, and in the exercise of its discretion, regularly made an order denying said motion; that said order denying said motion is an appealable order, and such appeal will afford a plain, speedy, adequate, and complete remedy, assuming that respondent was in error in denying said motion; that it does not appear from the petition that petitioner has not a plain, speedy, adequate, or complete remedy in the ordinary course of law to obtain the relief he seeks. It is further urged that the petition shows on its face that the judgment entered in said action corresponds with and conforms to and expresses the judgment actually rendered and declared by the court in said action, and that accordingly there was no clerical misprision in its entry.

In support of the latter contention it is pointed out that amendments to judgments can only be made for the purpose of having the record conform to the truth, and not for the purpose of reviewing or changing the judgment (citing Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226; Smith v. Ross, 57 Cal. App. 191, 207 Pac. 55), and where, as here, a judgment is entered in the exact form in which it is rendered, there is no room for a correction nunc pro tunc (Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 Pac. 775), but that the remedy for relief is by proceedings under section 632 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Accordingly, it is claimed that as the petition shows that the party defendant was sued as a partnership entity, the mere use of the word "defendants" in the subsequent pleadings and other documents by both parties did not have the effect of making the partners defendants as individuals, and petitioner is not therefore entitled to the amendment (citing Bollman Co. v. Bachman Co., 16 Cal. App. 589, 117 Pac. 690, 122 Pac. 835).

Whatever merit there may be in this contention we do not deem a discussion or decision upon the question necessary as we are of the opinion that the right to have the amendment made in this proceeding cannot be maintained. An order denying a motion to amend an entry of judgment nunc pro tunc is an appealable order as being one made after final judgment. Section 963, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc. As a general rule the appeal affords an ample remedy.

[2] The petition herein contains no allegations to indicate that an appeal does not afford a full, speedy and adequate remedy, except the bare recital of this fact, which is but a mere conclusion of the pleader. Under such circumstances mandamus will not lie (Turney v. Morrissey, 22 Cal. App. 271, 134 Pac. 335; Foster v. Traeger, 56 Cal. App. 339, 204 Pac. 1089; Montgomery v. Neilon, 41 Cal. App. 184, 182 Pac. 456).

We are cited to case of Boust v. Superior Ct., 162 Cal. 343, 122 Pac. 956, and other cases as opposing this view. A discussion of these authorities would answer no useful purpose. Suffice it to say that there may be cases depending upon their facts where appellate courts will require by mandamus the correction of a judgment in furtherance of justice so that it may conform to the truth, and that this remedy will be granted either before or after an appeal, provided, of course, that the amendment does not affect the substantial rights of the parties. The instant case, however, presents no such facts, nor does it indicate that any useful purpose will be accomplished by the issuance of the writ that cannot otherwise be obtained. It is manifest from the allegations of the petition that the proceeding is instituted for the purpose of meeting anticipated questions presented by defendant upon its appeal from the judgment which is here pending.

This being so the writ will not issue (Holland v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 361, 146 Pac. 878; Napa Union High School v. Board of Supervisors, 54 Cal. App. 326, 201 Pac. 948). It is therefore denied and the proceeding dismissed.

We concur: KNIGHT, J.; ST. SURE, J.

HALL v. FAIRCHILD-GILMORE-WILTON CO. (Civ. 4061.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 18, 1924.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑47(6)—City or Legislature cannot take for other purposes land dedicated for park purposes.

Where land is once dedicated for park purposes a city, or even the Legislature, cannot take it for other purposes.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑426—Assessment of park for improvement of street unauthorized.

A city cannot devote property purchased for a park to improvement of a public street, and the assessment of such property for street improvement would be invalid.

3. Dedication 🔑19(2), 37—Offer to dedicate may be made by platting and permitting public use; user by public is valid acceptance.

If the owner of land has it surveyed and platted with the intended public use clearly indicated, allowing the public to so treat it, the offer to dedicate is sufficient, and no formal acceptance is necessary, and use of the land by the public is sufficient to show acceptance.

4. Dedication 🔑64—Board of park commissioners held to have no power to turn land dedicated to park purposes into streets.

Where a board of city park commissioners had management of parks with power to lay out, regulate, and improve them, its authority was that of a trustee, and it did not have authority to permit land dedicated to park purposes to be turned into streets.

5. Dedication 🔑35(1)—City held to have jurisdiction to treat streets as public highways and to improve them.

Where streets were named and shown on a map for many years, and reference was made to the map in an assessment for improvements and in diagrams and bonds issued pursuant thereto, they had become dedicated and accepted as public highways so as to give a city jurisdiction to treat them as such and to improve them.

6. Constitutional law 🔑290(3)—Municipal corporations 🔑293(1)—Notice of contemplated street improvement held sufficient.

Where city council adopted grade ordinance for street improvement before passing resolution of intention, but the grade was established when first resolution of intention was first published, and before posting notice, property owners had sufficient notice; technical failure to follow statutory procedure not being denial of due process.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑515(1)—Defects in improvement proceedings remedied by curative acts.

Defects in proceedings for street improvements and assessments therefor resulting from failure to strictly pursue statutory procedure held remedied by curative acts.

8. Constitutional law 🔑193—Curative statutes within legislative power to cure defects in proceedings.

A curative statute is within the legislative power to cure defects in proceedings, if the things omitted to be done or irregularly done might have been dispensed with or made immaterial by prior law.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑410(1)—Improvement of street illegally taken from park not a benefit to abutting lots.

Where taking strip of land from a park for street purposes was illegal, none of the work performed or expense incurred on that part of the improvement was a benefit to any of the lots abutting thereon.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑514(2) —Reassessment required.

Under St. 1921, p. 563, as amended by St. 1923, p. 110, providing for a reassessment whenever an assessment is or shall be void or unenforceable for any cause, where an assessment made in 1920 for improving park land was invalid, a reassessment under the 1923 statute should be made.

11. Statutes 🔑268—Curative acts necessarily retroactive.

The rule that a statute should not be construed to operate retroactively, unless the legislative intent be clear that it should so operate, has no application to curative acts, which are necessarily retroactive.

12. Municipal corporations 🔑514(4)—Statute authorizing reassessment held valid.

St. 1921, p. 563, as amended by St. 1923, p. 110, providing for reassessment wherever assessment for public improvement "heretofore issued or which may be hereafter issued" shall be void or unenforceable, and not made effective by curative provisions of act, held valid as against objection that it is retroactive.

13. Municipal corporations 🔑515(1)—Legislature cannot legalize void assessment.

A Legislature cannot legalize a street assessment, void for failure to comply with the state or federal Constitution.

14. Municipal corporations 🔑518(2)—Interest on reassessment properly computed.

Where assessments were made for street improvements on land dedicated for park purposes, and later held void, on reassessment under St. 1923, p. 110, interest should be computed from date of the recording of the original assessment, in view of the fact that the original act provided for interest upon unpaid assessments, and that interest was running when the act was amended.

15. Municipal corporations 🔑518(2)—Provision for interest on assessment authorized.

Legislature had power to require the interest on assessment for street work to be paid from the date when the original assessment was recorded.

16. Appeal and error 🔑1203(1)—Proceedings subsequent to reversal upon appeal conform to pertinent amendatory legislation.

In action to quiet title against a lien resulting from assessment for street improvements, where an amendment of a statute relating to such assessments was in effect when the trial court's judgment was reversed and a reassessment ordered, proceedings subsequent to reversal upon appeal must conform to the amended legislation, and a reassessment necessary will be made under the provisions of the amendment.

17. Statutes 🔑230—Mode of procedure and right to remedies of pre-existing statutes cease on amendment, unless expressly reserved.

Where an amendment became effective, the mode of procedure and any rights to remedies of pre-existing statutes ceased, unless such mode or right was expressly reserved by amendment or had been perfected by steps taken under the former act.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Suit by M. Hall against the Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Herbert C. Kelly and Laurence H. Smith, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. After an opinion rendered by this court on appeal of the instant proceeding, a rehearing was granted by the Supreme Court, which entered an order directing that the matter be retransferred here for such action as this court might deem proper, in view of the amendment of section 12¼ of the Vrooman Act, passed in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 110). In other respects, the opinion formerly written by this court must be regarded as having met with the approval of the Supreme Court. We shall therefore follow that opinion, except for giving consideration to the point presented for the first time upon application for hearing before the Supreme Court, and which merely requires that we determine whether or not the act as it stood in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 563) or the amendment of section 12¼ of 1923, shall prevail in making the reassessment contemplated by our former opinion.

The action is one to quiet title to a number of lots in the city of San Diego.

In the defendant's answer it asserts the ownership of a lien thereon arising as the result of an assessment for the improvement of certain streets under the Vrooman Act. The trial court held that the lien was void because of the facts found, but concluded that the curative clause in the bond act remedied the defects in the proceedings as to the property against which bonds had been issued. A decree was entered accordingly, quieting plaintiff's title as to lots which had been assessed for less than $25, but holding that defendant was the owner of a valid lien in each instance where a bond had been issued. The plaintiff moved to set aside this latter part of the judgment, and to amend the conclusions of law pursuant to sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which motion was denied. Plaintiff thereupon appealed from so much of the judgment as declared the street bonds valid as above stated, and from the order denying the motion to modify the judgment.

The findings of the trial court detail the various steps which were taken in the assessment proceeding. It was found that the street improvement work in question was ordered to be done by the legislative body of the city of San Diego, and generally that the proceeding was conducted under the Vrooman Act.

"That portions of the ground for the improvement of which said resolution of intention No.

24453 made provision were at all times prior to November 27, 1918, part of that certain public square known as Washington Square, and shown and designated as such on said Pascoe map; that there has been no dedication, opening, or setting apart for street purposes of said portion of Washington Square, except by virtue of that certain ordinance passed by the legislative body of said city, November 20, 1918, approved by the mayor of said city November 27, 1918."

Here follows a copy of ordinance No. 7563 of the city of San Diego, where it is recited that the board of park commissioners of said city had requested and authorized the opening, naming, and dedicating of certain public ways along and over that certain public square in Old Town in the city of San Diego, named and dedicated Washington Square. That it was for the public interest and convenience that such portions of said Washington Square should be used by the public, and for public ways and thoroughfares. It was then ordained:

> "That a strip of land (describing strips lying along each side of said square, and including) 90 feet in width off of and along the southwesterly side of said Washington Square, be, and the same is hereby, dedicated and set aside as and for a public way and thoroughfare, and the same shall be known as and is hereby named San Diego Avenue."

The court also found:

> "That the portion of said Washington Square designated by said ordinance No. 7563 as public streets constitutes more than 60 per cent. of the total area of said public square. That the portion of said Washington Square declared by said ordinance No. 7563 to be a portion of San Diego avenue was included by said resolution of intention No. 24453, as a portion of San Diego avenue, to be improved, without describing it other than as San Diego avenue, and without any reference to Washington Square."

In addition to these findings relied upon by appellant is another as follows:

> "That no resolution has ever been passed or adopted by the legislative body of said city, accepting, naming, or defining the boundaries of said Taylor street, or the portions of said San Diego avenue (excepting said ordinance No. 7563), directed to be improved by said resolution of intention; but said streets are shown upon said Pascoe map of Old San Diego, but no definite or certain boundary line is shown upon said map for a portion of said San Diego avenue, which portion of said avenue was included by said resolution of intention No. 24453 among those to be improved thereunder."

The charter of the city of San Diego which was in force at the time the rights of the parties to this proceeding accrued and subsequent thereto contained the following provisions:

> "All parks, places and squares now open and dedicated to the public use, or which may hereafter be opened or dedicated to the public use, shall be under the exclusive control and management of the said board of park commissioners, with power to lay out, regulate and improve the same."

Appellant attacks the proceeding upon numerous grounds, but on account of the views hereinafter expressed a single fundamental proposition involved renders it necessary to reverse the judgment and order from which appeal is taken.

If for any reason the proceeding was invalid as to the taking of a portion of Washington Square for street purposes, and if this invalidity was of such character that it cannot be remedied by the curative clause of the act of 1917, then the entire assessment was void, and the appellant must prevail. City of Moline v. Greene, 252 Ill. 475, 96 N. E. 911, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 104; City of Chicago v. Hill, 251 Ill. 502, 96 N. E. 223:

> "The 17-foot 'parkway' here in question is as much a part of the improvement as any other part of the land to be taken. The striking from the ordinance and petition of the description of this 17-foot 'parkway' would make the improvement remaining in the ordinance another and different improvement from that originally provided for therein."

[1] We think it is clear that the city council of San Diego was utterly without jurisdiction to take over 60 per cent. of Washington Square, a public park, and make of it a highway, thus entirely withdrawing that portion of it from the purposes of its original dedication. Numerous authorities sustain the proposition that when land is once dedicated for park purposes it is beyond the authority of a city, or even the Legislature, to withdraw it therefrom.

[2] The city council could not devote property purchased for a park to the improvement of a public street, and the assessment of such property for street improvements would be invalid. Powell v. Walla Walla, 64 Wash. 532, 117 Pac. 389.

Warren v. Lyons City, 22 Iowa, 351, is in point. There the state Legislature enacted a statute "to enable incorporated towns and cities to acquire, hold, improve and dispose of land for public squares, parks, commons and cemeteries," and provided that—

> "Incorporated towns and cities within or without whose limits lands have been or may be dedicated to the public for the uses mentioned in the preceding section of this act, shall have the entire control of the same, and shall have power in case such lands are deemed insufficient or unsuitable for the purpose for which they originally or may hereafter be granted, to dispose of and convey the same; and conveyances executed in accordance with this act shall be held to extinguish all rights and claims of any such town or city to such land, existing prior to such conveyance."

An ordinance of Lyons City, adopted in pursuance of such statute, was under consideration by the Supreme Court, which held:

> "It must be, that if the right vested in the city for a particular purpose, the Legislature cannot vest it for another; that, when the dedicator declared his purpose by the plat, the land cannot be sold or used for another and different one; that while the corporation took the premises as trustee, it took them with the obligations attached as well as the rights conferred; that while the Legislature might give the control and management of these squares and parks to the several municipal corporations, it cannot authorize their sale and use for a purpose foreign to the object of the grant. Without quoting, we cite the following cases: Trustees of Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 2 Stra. 1004; Commonwealth v. Alberger, 1 Whart. 469; Pomeroy v. Mills, 3 Vt. 279; Abbott v. A. 259; Sturmer v. Randolph County Court, 42 W. Va. 724, 26 S. E. 532, 36 L. R. A. 300.

We are not unmindful of the rule that, if the area of a park is used for buildings or activities of any character incidental to its enjoyment as a park, such use will be upheld by law, but we know of no authority which has held that the taking of any portion of the space of a park and devoting it to strictly highway purposes can be regarded as consistent with the original dedication. On the contrary, the following cases hold that such action is inconsistent with the use of land for park purposes, and is therefore void: Mulvey v. Wangenheim, 23 Cal. App. 268, 137 Pac. 1106; City of Moline v. Greene, 252 Ill. 475, 96 N. E. 911, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 104; Price v. Thompson, 48 Mo. 361; Henderson v. Morrison, 18 U. C. C. P. 221. As was well said in City of Moline v. Greene, supra:

> "The case must be controlled by legal principles and not by considering the practical effect of allowing the taking of the land in this particular case. If it is held appellant has authority to take part of the property, it would necessarily require holding that all of the property could be taken by virtue of the same authority, if that were sought to be done."

See, also, Riverside v. MacLain, 210 Ill. 308, 71 N. E. 408, 66 L. R. A. 288, 102 Am. St. Rep. 164, Spires v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 Pac. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465. In the instant case the findings indicate that more then 60 per cent. of the area of Washington Park is included by the ordinances in question for proposed street purposes.

It has been said by text-writers, and held by the courts of last resort, that a distinction is to be made between cases where a public square is dedicated without restriction and cases where the dedication is restricted to a particular purpose; that in the former case any reasonable public use may be made of the park, but that in the latter it must be devoted to the particular purpose indicated by the dedicator.

[3] As to what constitutes dedication: It is well settled that, if an owner of land has it surveyed and platted with the intended public use clearly indicated, allowing the public to so treat it, the offer to dedicate is sufficient (Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 3 Cal. Unrep. 783, 32 Pac. 240; City of Los Angeles v. McCollum, 156 Cal. 148, 103 Pac. 914, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 378; San Francisco v. Burr, 4 Cal. Unrep. 634, 36 Pac. 771); and that no formal acceptance is necessary to complete the dedication of the property represented (San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 175, 13 Pac. 405); but use of the land by the public for the purposes to which it was so dedicated is sufficient to show an acceptance (People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 Pac. 538; People v. O'Keefe, 79 Cal. 171, 21 Pac. 539; Hall v. Kauffman, 106 Cal. 451, 39 Pac. 756; Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591).

Under these and many other authorities which it is unnecessary to accumulate, the uses to which Washington Square has so long been devoted would seem to establish its character as a pleasure ground, beyond question, as the purpose for which it was dedicated; and this would be so under any form of dedication, and leaving out of consideration the fact that the park had been officially and formally dedicated.

In Spires v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 Pac. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465, the trial court found that the land there in question had been set apart and dedicated by the city authorities of Los Angeles for the use of the public as a public park, that for many years it had been maintained and used by the people of the city exclusively as a park. An injunction was granted by the superior court restraining the construction of a library thereon, and in reversing the judgment and order the Supreme Court unanimously held:

"The corporation is in the position of a trustee, and the question is whether in building a museum and library it is improperly executing a trust. The primary object of the trust is to provide a place of enjoyment and recreation; nothing is improper which conduces to that object, and we ought not to quarrel with anything which the corporation, in a reasonable exercise of their discretion, consider conducive to it. * * * It appears from the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions accompanying this appeal that it is the purpose of the city to provide rooms therein as a meeting place for the board of library directors of such city, and that application has been made to such board of directors to provide rooms therein for the board of education. As far as the board of directors is concerned, this would seem permissible on account of their control of the library. But as to the board of education this cannot be done. The library building can be used for strictly library purposes only, and cannot be devoted to the establishment of municipal offices therein or used for municipal administration purposes other than as indicated relative to the board of library directors.

"If any part of such building could be used for one administration purpose, it might gradually be devoted to another. If one municipal board or municipal officer of the city having no direct relation to the library can be located therein, so may another, and so the building which the city has a right to erect as a library building solely in aid of the public enjoyment of the park may be gradually invaded for administration purposes and ultimately devoted to those purposes."

It is too obvious for argument that, if the council was totally without jurisdiction to thus change the character of Washington Square, the curative act to which reference is made can have no application. It does not purport to apply to such instances. If the ordinance of the city council, purporting to dedicate as streets portions of the park formerly dedicated to park purposes only, was void, the spaces sought to be used for street purposes are still parts of Washington Square.

[4] It may be said that the board of park commissioners is intrusted by the city charter with the "management and control" of the park property, and that it appears from the findings that this board requested the city council to adopt the ordinance. However, this charter provision confers no authority upon the board of park commissioners to destroy the subject of its trust, or to devote it to uses other than that of enjoyment and recreation. Its authority is merely that of a trustee, invested with limited jurisdiction, having imposed upon it the duty to protect parks within its management and control, which should at the same time compel such board to protest, rather than instigate, usurpation of authority over parks of the city by another body, or pass its trust property, into the street department. In M. E. Church v. Mayor, etc., 33 N. J. Law, 13, 97 Am. Dec. 696, 700, it was said:

"The power of the local corporate authorities is vested in them only as the representatives of the public, and for the protection and regulation of the public use. They cannot sell the lands so dedicated, nor release or extinguish the uses for which they were dedicated, nor employ them in any way variant from the purposes for which they were designed. But within the limits of the purposes and uses for which the dedication is made to regulate the use, the authority of the local corporate authorities is unlimited, against which no mere private right can be set up. Commonwealth v. Alburger, 1 Whart. 469, 485; Ring v. Shoneberger, 2 Watts, 23, 25, 26 Am. Dec. 95; Commonwealth v. Borman, 3 Pa. St. 203; Commonwealth v. Bush, 14 Pa. St. 186; Langley v. Gallipolis, 2 Ohio St. 107; Washburn on Easements, 155, 156; 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 232, 241, 242; Still v. Trustees of Lansingburg, 16 Barb. 107; Alves v. Town of Henderson, 16 B. Mon. 169."

The powers of the board of park commissioners of San Diego extend only to the "exclusive control and management" of parks, places, and squares, "with power to lay out, regulate and improve the same," and this express authority could by no stretching of the rules of construction be held to include a complete annihilation of the trust property with the regulation and improvement of which they are charged.

We now proceed to a consideration of appellant's points numbered in his brief 2 to 7 inclusive, a ruling upon which is rendered necessary because a defect in the proceeding of such a nature as to deprive the property owner of his property rights without due process of law would so nullify the assessment as to place it beyond the power of the curative provision of the statute to validate and thus permit a reassessment to be made.

[5] It is insisted that the streets ordered improved had not been officially accepted or named at the time of the passage of the resolution of intention. As has already been pointed out, a technical formal offer and acceptance is not requisite to dedication of a public street. The findings of the trial court show that these streets were named and shown on the Pascoe map of old San Diego, filed in the San Diego city engineer's office, long before and at the time of the institution of the proceedings in question, and on the map of Middleton, filed in the San Diego county clerk's office in 1874, reference to which maps was made in the assessment and diagram, and in the bonds issued pursuant thereto. We think that these circumstances, in addition to the fact that the streets apparently existed regardless of the names applied to them, were sufficient to warrant the conclusion that they had become dedicated and accepted as public highways so as to give the city jurisdiction to treat them as such and improve them.

[6, 7] The remaining defects in the improvement proceedings assigned in appellant's points numbered 3 to 7 inclusive, revolve around the fact that the grades had not been officially established at the time of adopting the resolution of intention, and it is argued that, since the resolution did not in this respect describe the work contemplated, the property owners affected did not receive the statutory notice, and were deprived of the guaranties afforded by "due process." The city council adopted the grade ordinance on April 14th thereafter, on April 21st it passed the resolution of intention; on April 24th the mayor approved the grade ordinance; and the work was ordered in June. No case cited by appellant requires more than a substantial compliance with the constitutional due-process provisions. A failure to follow technically the procedure outlined by the statute in each detail is not fatal to the proceeding, if steps calculated to protect the property owners against deprivation of their property without due process have been taken. The purpose of the resolution of intention is to initiate the proceeding and be the basis of notice to the property owners of the improvements about to be made. Such notice results, not from the mere passage of the resolution of intention, but from the publication and posting of it. It appears that at the time of the first publication and before posting of the notice an official grade had been legally fixed. The grade ordinance had passed a reading before the resolution of intention was introduced; it was passed and became effective before the work was ordered. Under these circumstances no substantial right of the property owner was violated. Those interested were given ample information concerning the general character of the improvement, and the particular kind of improvement, which is the purpose for which a resolution of intention is contemplated by statute. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81. For the purposes of this appeal it is not necessary that we pass upon the issue argued at considerable length in the briefs as to whether or not the establishment of grades is sufficient to comply with the statute if the grade ordinance be introduced before the passage of the resolution of intention and be passed and become effective before the work is ordered. While this is the situation presented in the case at bar, we need only hold, as we do, that under such circumstances the procedure has not been so defective as to be without "due process." Upon this assumption we have no difficulty in agreeing with the trial court that the curative clause in the act remedied such defects in the proceeding as are claimed by appellant to exist as a result of the fact that the grades had not been officially established when the resolution of intention was adopted.

Fair v. Buss, 117 Iowa, 164, 90 N. W. 527, involved public highways constructed by a board of supervisors without giving any notice to resident landowners as required by the statute. The plaintiff there questioned both the constitutionality of a curative act and the legality of a notice published pursuant thereto. The Supreme Court of Iowa said:

> "It is conceded that the Legislature may legalize any act which it might lawfully have made the law in the first instance, but it is said that it could not provide for such a notice to nonresidents as was published in this case, and that it cannot legalize a void act. That it may legalize a void act has been repeatedly held by this court. Richman v. Supervisors, 77 Iowa, 513, 42 N. W. 422, 4 L. R. A. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 308; Tuttle v. Polk, 84 Iowa, 12, 50 N. W. 38; City of Clinton v. Walliker, 98 Iowa, 655, 68 N. W. 431. It may be conceded that some notice in cases of this kind is required under the Constitution, even if not provided for by statute, but it is the general holding that the notice is sufficient if it describes the location of the road and indicates the nature of the proceedings and states the time when and place where the interested persons must appear to protect their rights, even if the owner's name is not given in the notice. 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. (2d Ed.) § 367, and cases cited in note 27; McIntire v. Mamie, 93 Ind. 193; Gravel Road Co. v. State, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316. And see Wilson v. Hathaway, 42 Iowa, 173. If this is true, it follows that just such a notice as was given might have originally been prescribed by the Legislature, and that the legalizing act in question is valid so far as this question is concerned, and the owner of the land cannot complain that his property has been taken without due process of law."

[8] There is no contention in the case now before us that the grade was not subsequently established and the streets completed. The curative act of 1921 requires a reassessment in all cases where the original assessment was void or unenforceable because of irregularities or illegalities in the proceedings, and "the true intent and meaning of this section is to make the cost and expense of work or improvement made through an attempted compliance with this act, payable by the real estate benefited by such work or improvement by making a reassessment therefor." Manifestly in the enactment of the Vrooman Act the Legislature had authority to permit the fixing of a grade after adoption of the resolution of intention, and it therefore follows that it may by subsequent legislation legalize a procedure which it had the power to originally direct. Appellant quotes extensively from the opinion of the Supreme Court in denying a rehearing in Beck v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 674, 184 Pac. 431. In that case it was held that uniformity in the administration of justice is a substantial right, and that failure to furnish the information required by statute in a resolution of intention, or in the summons in an action at law, affords no notice, and consequently confers no jurisdiction. It is there said:

> "The requirement of the statute is as positive in regard to the reference to the map as that of section 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the summons must contain a notice that unless the defendant appears the plaintiff will take judgment or apply to the court for other relief demanded in the complaint. These requirements are mandatory and jurisdictional in the one case as in the other."

Quotation from the opinion in that case effectively answers appellant's argument, for, while it affirms the authority of the Legislature to prescribe a formal mode of procedure, it does not purport to hold that such jurisdictional steps would be necessary had the Legislature otherwise provided; and the inevitable conclusion therefore is that the Legislature may lawfully ordain retrospectively that other or more or less information shall appear in a resolution of intention.

> Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 457, states concisely the rule on this subject, thus: 'If the thing wanted or failed to be done, and which constitutes the defect in the proceedings, is some thing the necessity for which the Legislature might have dispensed with by prior statute, then it is not beyond the power of the Legislature to dispense with it by subsequent statutes; and if the irregularity consists in doing some act, or in the manner or mode of doing some act, and which the Legislature might have made immaterial by prior law, it is equally competent to make the same immaterial by a subsequent law.'" Gordon v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 522, 36 Pac. 18, 40 Am. St. Rep. 73.

See, also, to the same effect, 17 Corpus Juris, at page 402; Thomson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 327, 331, 18 L. Ed. 177, 178; Madison v. Commissioners, 34 Me. 592; State v. Bruggerman, 31 Minn. 493, 18 N. W. 454; Parker v. Van Houten, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 145; L. H. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky. 35, 46 S. W. 207.

Appellant expressly bases his exceptions to the resolution of intention and other alleged irregularities upon the ground that they were "defects in the proceedings," and, the operation of the statutory provisions herein quoted being directed at irregularities and illegalities in the proceedings, they were thereby cured.

Respondent contends that this court should direct a reassessment of such of the lots as were subject to assessment, because abutting owners benefited by the improvement, and should pay therefor. When the appeal was last before us for consideration, our attention was called to section 12¼ of the Vrooman Act, Statutes of 1921, at page 563, from which respondent quoted in part in support of his position as follows:

> "Third—Whenever any court of competent jurisdiction in any suit to set aside the lien of any assessment or of any bond representing any assessment or in any suit to quiet title against the lien of any such assessment, or bond shall in its judgment decree such assessments or bonds to be void, or unenforceable, then it shall in and by its decree direct the making of a reassessment to cover the assessments involved in such suit."

In 1923 this section was amended so that in lieu of the words "for want of sufficient authority for its issuance or from irregularities, or illegalities in the proceedings," the words "for any cause" were substituted, so that a reassessment is required by the statute when the original assessment shall have been found to be void "for any cause." It is apparent that upon the issue as to whether or not a reassessment should be directed what was said in our former opinion has the same application to the provision under consideration since the amendment of 1923 as to that of 1921.

[9] This action was instituted May 10, 1920, to set aside an assessment dated and recorded March 25, 1920, but respondent argues that the amendment is retroactive, and that it is the duty of this court, should it reverse the judgment by holding the assessment void, to order the making of a reassessment to cover the expense of building the streets. We have held that, inasmuch as the strip carved from the park should not be devoted to street purposes, it still constituted a portion of the park property, and it is therefore obvious that none of the work performed or expense incurred upon that particular part of the improvement can be said to have benefited any of the lots abutting thereon.

[10] However, appellant has insisted that, if a reassessment be made, it should be made pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 845), and not that of 1921 or 1923, it being claimed that the latter cannot be applied retroactively. We believe that a reassessment is necessary, and that the act of 1923, and not that of 1913, must be followed in levying it. The provisions of the statute of 1923 above quoted are sufficient authority for the conclusion that a reassessment should be made, unless that law cannot be given a retrospective application.

[11, 12] The Supreme Court in Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352, held that the rule that a statute should not be construed to operate retroactively, unless the legislative intention that it should so operate is clearly apparent, cannot apply where it is essentially a curative act intended to give effect to past transactions which are ineffectual because of neglect to comply with some requirement of law. Hence, inasmuch as the provision here involved is essentially of a curative character, it must be held to operate upon assessments begun before as well as those commenced after its enactment. That this was the intention of the Legislature is clearly indicated by the terms of the statute itself. The opening provision of the section of the statute of 1921, a portion of which is quoted above, reads as follows:

> "Sec. 12¼. Whenever any assessment heretofore issued or which may be hereafter issued is or shall be void, or unenforceable, for want of sufficient authority for its issuance or from irregularities, or illegalities in the proceedings, or if bonds shall have been, or shall be issued to represent any assessments and such issuance shall not have been, or shall not be effective through the curative provisions thereof to make them valid and enforceable, then, in any of such events a reassessment therefor shall be issued." (Italics ours.)

This language does not admit of doubt as to the intent of the Legislature. That such a provision is valid is not seriously contested by respondent, and the proposition has been decided affirmatively by well-considered cases in other jurisdictions. Among these are Protestant Foster Home of Newark v. Mayor, etc., 52 N. J. Law, 138, 18 Atl. 572; Brown v. City of Silverton, 97 Or. 441, 190 Pac. 971; Conde v. Schenectady, 164 N. Y. 258, 58 N. E. 130; Frederick v. Seattle, 13 Wash. 428, 43 Pac. 364.

Appellant cites Chapman v. Jocelyn, 182 Cal. 294, 297, 187 Pac. 962, to sustain the claim that all such legislation is retroactive, and argues that any reassessment here should be made under the statute of 1913. That case, while construing provisions of the Vrooman Act, is not one involving reassessment. It decides that a street assessment is a contract, and that the provisions of the statute in force when it was made must be followed in so far as they prescribe the manner of enforcement of the contract; also that to hold otherwise would amount to an impairment of contract. In the instant case the street assessment contract is void, but under the curative provisions of the law a new one is to be made. In creating this enactment the Legislature has legalized transactions which were ineffective on account of noncompliance with the law, and in doing so it had full authority to provide conditions on which the invalid acts should become valid, and to give such provision a retrospective effect, or even to make it retroactive.

Argument of appellant upon the rehearing is based wholly upon that portion of the former opinion providing for a reassessment under the act of 1921, appellant contending that the right to reassessment was a vested right incidental to the ownership of street bonds, and that the rights of all parties were definitely fixed by the law existing at the time the original bond or assessment was issued. It is said that the amendment of 1923 is not a reassessment statute but a "mere subterfuge" to avoid constitutional limitations; that the act of 1913 provided for a totally new assessment, and that the latest act seeks merely to cure defects in the original assessment and to validate it as of its original date. Appellant therefore asserts that, notwithstanding the plain legislative intention to make the amendment retroactive, it should be declared unconstitutional in so far as bonds or assessments in existence before its passage are concerned, and therefore void and inapplicable as to the street bonds in question.

Respondent concedes that a rehearing is essential, since through inadvertence the subsequent amendment of April 30, 1923 (Stats. 1293, p. 110), was overlooked, and asserts that it is controlling as to the assessment ordered herein. To determine the question thus presented it is necessary that certain points raised by appellant in attacking the constitutionality of the amendment of 1923 be passed upon, since, if his contention is correct, the reassessment cannot be made under this statute.

As we have observed, section 12¼ of the act of 1921 provides for reassessment whenever an assessment theretofore or thereafter issued for street work shall be "void, or enforceable, for want of sufficient authority for its issuance or from irregularities, or illegalities in the proceedings," whereas in said section, as amended by the act of 1923, a reassessment is directed to be made whenever any such assessment "is or shall be void, or unenforceable, for any cause." (Italics ours.) All other language of the two enactments of section 12¼ is the same, so that, if appellant's argument that the amendment of 1921 was unconstitutional be tenable, that of 1923 is subject to the same criticism.

[13] Appellant's argument wholly fails to recognize the express language of the amendment, which provides, not for the validation of the original assessment, but for a reassessment when for the reasons therein specified the assessment first levied shall be held void or unenforceable. We held in the first instance that, since the taking of a portion of Washington Square rendered the proceeding invalid in that respect, the entire assessment was therefore void, and it requires no citation of authority that a void assessment is ineffective for any purpose. The curative statute ratifies the proceedings authorizing improvements which rendered an assessment necessary, and directed a reassessment of properties benefited thereby for the amount of indebtedness incurred, with "interest thereon for thirty days after the date of recording the original assessment at the rate of seven per cent. (7%) per annum," or from the date when payment became due. The Legislature cannot legalize a street assessment which is void for failure to comply with the jurisdictional requirements made necessary by the state or federal Constitution (Kelly v. Luning, 76 Cal. 309, 18 Pac. 335; Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 395, 29 Pac. 58; Haaren v. High, 97 Cal. 445, 32 Pac. 518; Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920), and a reading of the act does not permit us to assume that it attempted to do so. We previously held herein, upon abundance of authority, that a curative act may dispense with the steps which were not taken in such a proceeding if they were such that the Legislature could in the original act have dispensed with them, or it may ratify acts done which were not embraced therein if it had authority to require that they be performed. It has repeatedly been held that such legislation is constitutional.

[14, 15] A vigorous attack is launched against the provision that interest shall be computed from the original date, it being contended that "such a construction shocks all sense of justice," but the reply to this argument is that "it is in the plain wording of this act." It is not denied that properties which were benefited by the improvement began to enjoy that benefit when the work was completed, nor could it successfully be argued that compensation therefor was not due when the original assessment was recorded. That assessment being void, the initial mode of collection was rendered ineffectual, but substantive rights vested in the lien and not in the method of procedure; the latter was properly subject to legislative modification. Teralta Land Co. v. Shaffer, 116 Cal. 523, 48 Pac. 613, 58 Am. St. Rep. 194. The original act provided for interest upon unpaid assessments for street work, and since interest therefor was running at the time the amendment was enacted, no more onerous burden was created thereby; and no logical reason is advanced for deducting accrued interest from the amount concededly due under such circumstances. It was within the power of the Legislature to require that interest be paid from the date when the original assessment was recorded, and the fact that the amendments in question do in plain language so require leaves no room for construction.

[16, 17] The amendment of 1923 was in effect at the time the judgment of the trial court was reversed and a reassessment ordered (December 7, 1923, 42 Cal. App. Dec. 668), and it has not since been modified or repealed. When such amendment became effective, the mode of procedure and any right to remedies in pre-existing statutes ceased, unless such mode or right was expressly reserved by the amendment, or had been perfected by steps taken under the former act. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Hayes, 56 Cal. 297; Estate of Wixom, 35 Cal. 320; Tuttle v. Block, 104 Cal. 443, 38 Pac. 109. Proceedings subsequent to reversal upon appeal must conform to pertinent amendatory legislation now in effect (Vanderbilt v. All Persons, etc., 163 Cal. 507, 126 Pac. 158), and it is therefore ordered that the reassessment be made under the provisions of the statute of 1923.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to amend its conclusions of law and enter a judgment to conform with the principles of law as announced in this opinion.

In re BABCOCK'S ESTATE. (Civ. 4597.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 16, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 14, 1924.)

1. Wills 🔑384—Order directing jury to find mental capacity held equivalent to granting motion for nonsuit.

On appeal, on opposition to probate on ground of lack of testamentary capacity, from an order directing jury to return verdict that testatrix was not of unsound mind, such order is to be considered as if judge had granted motion for nonsuit.

2. Wills 🔑327—Direction to find testamentary capacity erroneous if evidence would support contrary finding.

A direction to find that testamentary capacity existed is erroneous where the evidence would support a finding to the contrary.

3. Wills 🔑324(2)—Whether testatrix was of unsound mind held for jury.

Whether testatrix was of unsound mind held for jury under the evidence including testimony of intimate acquaintances within Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, and evidence that during last few months of her life she was insane in full sense of word.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

The superior court made an order admitting the will of Mary C. Babcock, deceased, to probate, and contestants appeal from that order. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; SEAWELL, J., and STURTEVANT, Justice pro tem, dissenting.

Marshall Stimson and Noel C. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dailey S. Stafford, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order admitting the will of Mary Catherine Babcock, executed September 28, 1917, to probate. Appellants, contestants in the trial court, opposed the probate of the will on the ground that the testatrix was not of sound mind at the time the instrument was executed. The contest was tried before a jury, but at the conclusion of the testimony on behalf of both the contestants and the proponent of the will the trial judge directed the jury to return a verdict that the testatrix was not of unsound mind. Verdict was rendered accordingly, and the order from which the appeal is taken was thereupon entered.

[1, 2] Appellants make the contention that the court erred in directing the verdict which was returned. There is thus presented the question whether the record contains evidence of a substantial character tending to show that the deceased had not testamentary capacity at the time the will was made, for the rule is that such a direction is to be considered as if the judge had granted a motion for a nonsuit. Stated in other terms, the rule is that if the evidence introduced is such that it would support a finding by the jury of lack of testamentary capacity, the direction to find that testamentary capacity existed is erroneous. This rule is so firmly established that no citation of authority to support or illustrate it is necessary. A consideration of the question presented demands that we shall marshal the evidence upon the question of capacity which is most favorable to the contest, and upon that labor we shall now embark.

[3] Mrs. Babcock was twice married, her second nuptial venture being with W. W. Babcock. This union occurred in 1899. Mrs. Babcock had no children by either marriage, but her second husband had a son, Eli Babcock, as the result of an earlier matrimonial alliance. At the time of her marriage with Babcock, the decedent owned a ten-acre orange grove near Pomona, in which town she and her husband resided until his death, which occurred in May, 1917, and in which she continued to live until in January, 1922, when she was removed from her home for reasons below to be stated. The orange grove will be mentioned frequently in this opinion as the ranch. Mrs. Babcock conveyed this property to her husband in 1901. He conveyed to her a life estate in it in 1909 and the fee to an undivided half interest in it in 1915. The decedent made a will on September 15, 1911, which she never destroyed, although it was abrogated by the will of 1917, granting for the moment that the latter made valid testamentary disposition of her estate. The will of 1911 was found in Mrs. Babcock's Bible after her decease. The instrument recited the testator's age to be 65, but the will of 1917 recited her age as 69, thus showing a discrepancy of two years. She died on March 15, 1922, at the age, as stated in respondent's brief, of 76. It is to be observed, as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other facts shown by the record, that the statement in the brief is probably in accord with the recital in the will of 1911, while it surely disagrees with that in the will of 1917, the assertion first made being somewhat affected by the question whether Mrs. Babcock's birthday occurred between September and March or between March and September.

The testimony concerning the mental condition of the testatrix relates to a period commencing as early as 1914 and extending to the day of her death. In relating the story told by the evidence which is favorable to contestants we shall be able, in some measure, to divide it under separate heads or subjects, observing, however, that some of it is not susceptible of that mode of treatment, while it will be noted, also, that in some instances the subjects overlap or merge into each other. In the fall of 1914, while visiting at the home of a nephew and his wife, Mrs. Babcock lay upon a couch next the wall and tore off pieces of the wall paper. It was testified that she was "quite erratic" from 1915 forward. In 1916 she became unreasonably angry with her husband over small matters. One witness, a niece of decedent, relating occurrences between May and September, 1917, during which period she resided with decedent, said that she (the witness) would sometimes "get up in the middle of the night and I would find her [the testatrix] sitting in the front room, and I would say, 'Aunt Mary, what are you doing?' She would say, 'I am waiting for your Uncle Will to come home' [referring to her husband, who, it will be remembered, died in May, 1917]. I would say, 'Why, Uncle Will is dead.' She would say, 'No, he has gone to lodge.'" Speaking of occurrences at meal times and testifying as to the period mentioned, the same witness said:

> "Sometimes I would come in, and she would have an extra plate set, and I would ask what it was for, and she would say, 'Your Uncle Will is coming in for supper.'"

Mrs. Babcock visited at the home of a nephew in August, 1917. The nephew testified:

> "I went downtown, and when I came back she asked me if I saw Uncle Bill downtown; and I laughed at her, and thought she was just making a foolish remark, and * * * I says, 'Aunt Mary, Uncle Will is dead.' 'Well,' she says, 'he is not dead.' And I changed the subject onto something else."

The effect of the testimony of several witnesses is that Mrs. Babcock never went out alone after the death of her husband, as she was confused as to direction and location and lost herself. On one occasion in August, 1917, she went to the home of a grandniece, distant over 40 miles from her own home, upon a visit which was to have been of a week's duration. She was driven to her destination by the husband of the grandniece. He testified:

> "On the next morning, when I got up, she was getting ready, dressing. I says, 'Where are you going, Aunt Mary?' * * * She says, 'I am going home.' I says, 'You promised me to stay a week.' 'No,' she says, 'I am going home, because I have got some chickens there.' 'Well,' I says, 'I am not going to take you home to-day, because I am tired.' 'Well,' she says, 'I am going to walk if you don't, because it will not take me long.' So * * * after dinner I took the machine and took her home."

In response to a question by the court the witness said further:

> "She said she had a party there in charge of her chickens; * * * and I told her, I says, 'He is a good responsible man.' She says she was afraid he would steal her eggs."

On an occasion in the summer of 1917 Mrs. Babcock, in company with the grandniece above mentioned, took a pair of shoes to a shoemaker to be mended and told him to deliver them to her home. The grandniece testified that she and the testatrix made three trips downtown on that same day "to tell the man about sending them up. * * * He told her he would send them up next day, but that didn't satisfy her. I had to go back with her about three different times to the same store." A witness testified that in October, 1917, Mrs. Babcock wound her clock three times in one day. When this action was called to her attention, she said she did it because she did not want the timepiece to run down and that "she would wind her clock when she wanted to." A greatnephew of testatrix visited her for three days in the latter part of 1919 or early in 1920. One evening she invited him to go to a theater, saying that she had procured tickets for the performance. He accepted the invitation, but on reaching the theater found that she had no tickets and purchased tickets himself so that they might witness the performance. This same witness testified concerning another matter which occurred during his visit with Mrs. Babcock:

> "We came home, and then after that she had a chicken for dinner, and the chicken, somehow or other she would cook just a little piece at a time, and never would put it on the table all at once; that is, we didn't have no chicken to amount to anything, you know. Q. How long did that take place? A. That took place the three days I was there. Q. You mean she was cooking the same chicken all the time? A. The same chicken all the time; yes, sir."

He also testified that at about 8 or 9 o'clock of a morning during his visit Mrs. Babcock said she must clip the wings of her chickens to prevent them getting over the fence and away. He said the fence was so high that the chickens couldn't have gotten out, but she insisted on clipping their wings, and that he held them while she did so. Later in the day she cut the wings of some of the chickens again, although he told her they had been cut already.

There is much testimony in the record as to the ability of the testatrix to recognize her relatives and other people and to keep them in mind. Early in 1915 a niece whom she had known intimately for many years made her a small present at Compton, Cal. Later in the same year Mrs. Babcock exhibited the present to the niece and stated that it had been sent to her from the East by a certain named person. In 1915, also the testatrix mistook the husband of this niece, whom she had known well for several years, for a strange man. The pair were visiting the testatrix at the time. The niece testified:

> "We went up on Saturday; she invited us to go to Riverside, and on Sunday my husband was filling the radiator in her back yard, and she says: 'There is a strange man filling the radiator out of my faucet. I wish you would have him go downtown and fill his radiator, because I am on a meter.'"

Another niece testified that in 1917 relatives and friends "would come there and she didn't know them," and she said, more specifically, that in October of that year the male relative just mentioned in connection with the radiator incident of 1915 "came up, and she wanted to know what man that was." The husband of one of Mrs. Babcock's grandnieces testified thus of the testatrix in 1917:

> "Q. Were you present on the occasions when she failed to recognize your boys? A. Yes, sir; * * * she would ask my wife whose boys they were; and when she come down to the house, she would ask us the same question. * * * Q. How many times do you suppose she saw those boys? A. Well, * * * once every month or so. Q. And how soon would it be after you had told her who the boys were before she would forget who they were? A. Why, it would not be very long. Sometimes she would get one mixed up with the other; and sometimes she would want to know where the boys came from. * * * Would not recognize them. * * * I saw it happen the same day. They would go out and come back in and she * * * could not tell one from the other. Q. Although you had told her who they were the very same day? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, would it happen that she would not know that they were your boys * * * after you had told her they were the same day? A. Yes. Q. That happened frequently? A. Yes."

The niece who resided with Mrs. Babcock from May to September, 1917, as already stated, was a grandmother, and Mrs. Babcock had great difficulty in remembering and recognizing her grandchildren. The niece testified:

> "She would never know them. * * * About every three weeks, while I stayed with my aunt, my son-in-law and my daughter would come up with the boys and spend the day with me; about every three weeks they made me a visit. * * * She would not recognize the boys; she would always ask who they were all the time."

The niece who was the wife of the man of the radiator incident testified that in May, 1917, at or near the time of Babcock's death, "I went to her [Mrs. Babcock's] home, and she said, 'Where are you going to get your dinner?' I said, 'I am going to have dinner with you.' She said, 'I am not feeding strangers.'" One of the witnesses, the wife of a grandnephew of Mrs. Babcock, whose first name was Arthur, had seen the testatrix two or three times a year for a dozen years prior to her death. Shortly after Babcock's death, on seeing the witness, the testatrix asked who she was. Upon being told that she was Arthur's wife, she asked, "Who is Arthur?" In 1918 Mrs. Babcock asked one of her nephews to pay her a visit. Three weeks or a month later he went to her house to accept the invitation. He testified:

> "She did not recognize me when I first went there. * * * I told her who I was, and told her she asked me to come up, and I promised her I would."

A greatniece of Mrs. Babcock was married October 15, 1919, at the home of one of her greatnephews. The testatrix was present at the wedding and remained overnight at the house in which it occurred. On the morning after the wedding the bride came into the room where the testatrix and others were seated and gave a morning greeting. Mrs. Babcock, according to the bride, "turned and looked at me and says, 'Why, who are you?' Q. Did you tell her who you were? A. I did. Q. What did she say then? A. She didn't seem to say anything. She went on talking to my mother." There is other testimony in the record touching upon the conduct of the testatrix at the time of this wedding. The wife of the greatnephew at whose home the ceremony occurred testified:

> "My husband got his aunt, Mrs. Babcock, to come to the wedding. He went after her in a machine, he and his mother. * * * And when she came she did not seem to know who I was, and asked me the question and I told her. And so she asked his mother also who I was, and how many children she had, * * * Mrs. Babcock, my mother-in-law. And she told her. And the next morning, when she came downstairs, she asked again who I was, and I told her. And sitting at the breakfast table that morning she asked my husband's mother how many children she had again, and she repeated that again at least three times that morning to my remembrance. And then I took her home * * * in the machine and my mother-in-law went with me."

When the witness and her mother-in-law started to return to the home of the former, the following occurred, according to the testimony of the witness:

> "She [the testatrix] says, 'Well, how are you going to get home?' I said, 'The same way we got out here.' 'Well,' she says, 'who is going to drive your machine?' I says, 'I am.' 'Well,' she says, 'you did not drive it out here.' And she sat in the front seat with me going out. So she did not seem to remember that I had drove the machine; she didn't seem to know that."

The record also includes testimony relating to what may be termed Mrs. Babcock's sense of property at different periods, and relating to her familiarity with business and business methods. It is to be observed also, in passing, that some of the testimony already noted bears upon the question of her financial and property sense, although perhaps but slightly. The niece already mentioned as residing at Compton testified that Mrs. Babcock and her husband visited her in September, 1914. One night Babcock came to the room of the witness and rapped on her door. The witness followed him to the room occupied by himself and his wife. We now quote from the testimony:

> "Q. What was she [the testatrix] doing? A. She was lying on the floor. * * * She said they were trying to get her property away from her. * * * I coaxed her to go back to bed. I told her they wasn't trying to get her property away from her at all. * * * She said her husband was trying to influence her, to get the property away from him for his son. Q. Did she finally go to bed. A. She did."

The niece who resided at Mrs. Babcock's home from May to September, 1917, testified to various occurrences of that period:

> "All times of the night I would wake up, and she would be at the dresser drawer, and she would pack and unpack * * * all the time, and go to her trunk and pack and unpack; and at other times I would find her in the bedroom and I would say, 'What are you doing?' She would say, 'I want something to eat.' And I would say, 'We don't keep the things in the bedroom.' * * * Q. Packed and unpacked what? A. Well, she would take things out of her dresser drawers, and she would take hairpins and she would tie them up with fine strings, and tie up little wads with threads. * * * She would place it back in the drawer; and then she would take out her clothes and put them back, and then she would go to her trunk and unpack."

In the next house to that of Mrs. Babcock resided a worthy neighbor named Avery. During 1917 she said to various of her relatives including the niece last mentioned, at different times, that this neighbor had stolen her husband's tools and that he continually knocked on the wall of her house. The niece testified:

> "At any time if there was a little noise at night she would say, 'Well, there is old man Avery around.'"

One of the greatnephews of the testatrix, already mentioned, testified:

> "I had been out in the yard with her and she would say—the old man would be on the other side of the fence; she would say: 'Look at that old thief; he is trying to come over and get some more tools.'"

The wife of the witness last mentioned testified:

> "She would tell me about him [Avery] knocking on the wall at night. * * * Q. What did she say about the tools. A. That Mr. Avery had stolen her things, her tools."

The niece who was with Mrs. Babcock in 1917 testified that in that year and also in 1919 "she would shut off the gas on me when I was cooking meals. In 1917 my sister's folks came up for dinner, and I was getting the dinner, and I went in for something and came back, and she had all my fires shut off." This niece testified that—

> During 1917, "when they conserved sugar, I would go down and buy sugar, and she would hide it and I never would find it. * * * She would hide soap and food. * * * Sometimes she would hide them in the bedroom, sometimes under the dresser, and in between her bandboxes. * * * Q. What else would she hide besides sugar? A. Cinnamon and lard. You would find a can of lard hid in the closet. Q. When did you find a can of lard hid in the closet? A. In 1917, two or three times."

In October, 1917, Mrs. Babcock told a witness, "I think that Mr. Steadman is cheating me out of money." Mr. Steadman was a banker who will be mentioned below. The niece who was with the testatrix in 1917 was also with her for several months in 1919. She testified:

> "Q. Did anything unusual happen in the nighttime during this visit? A. Yes, one time I got angry about the packing and unpacking, and I told her if she didn't quit it I would go home, and she got up and laid on the floor for a couple of hours. Q. Did she have anything over her? A. No. Q. Did you try to make her go back in bed? A. Yes, but she would not for a long time."

We have already related certain occurrences in connection with a wedding which took place on October 15, 1919, and have mentioned the fact that Mrs. Babcock was driven home the next day after the event. The witness who drove the car testified:

> "On the way she said, 'I am going to give you some eggs when I get home.' And so when we got there I said, 'Aunt Mary are you going to give me those eggs?' And she said, 'Yes.' And she had a big market basket that would hold at least a peck of lovely big eggs, and she went over to a small dish, where there wasn't eggs any larger than a bird's egg, almost, and she picked out five or six and put them in a great big bag, and she gave them to me. 'Here,' she says, 'are your eggs.' * * * And also at the house the following morning at the wedding on the 16th, she says, 'I am going to give Mamie a nice wedding present.' And she got her purse and she took out a roll of bills; I should think there was nearly $200 in the roll; and she sat down in the kitchen at the table and counted the bills out; and I thought my sister was going to get quite a royal present; and she counted them all out asked my mother-in-law for a rubber band to put around those bills; and she stuck them back in her purse."

The proponent of the will introduced in evidence a large number of checks which had been signed by Mrs. Babcock. Steadman, the banker, already mentioned, testified that each of these checks was in his handwriting, except the signature. The banker also testified from the books of his bank that from May 23, 1917, to the time of the death of the testatrix the smallest balance she had on deposit in the institution was $1,231.67, that having been the balance on the first-mentioned date. The largest balance during the period in question was $3,296.83 on January 29, 1918. Other balances on dates not far from the execution of the will were: July 12, 1917, $1,761; September 17, 1917, $2,105.79; October 30, 1917, $1,930.15; December 19, 1917, $2,800; December 22, 1917, $1,800. Steadman testified that these balances did not draw interest, as the account was simply a commercial account. He then testified further:

> "Q. Do you know why she kept so large a balance in cash that was not bearing interest. A. No; I have spoken to her at various times that she could cut down a little closer on the checking account if she wished, but she said it was always her wish to carry this much money on deposit, and I never questioned her further."

Considering a special matter indicating the nature of Mrs. Babcock's property sense, it will be remembered that as the result of conveyances mentioned early in this opinion she was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the ranch and the owner of a life estate in the remaining half. She had a conversation with Eli Babcock a few days after her husband's death, in May, 1917, and she seems to have had a fairly correct understanding of the nature of her interest in the ranch at that time. Her stepson testified that she then said to him, "I think everything is mine as long as I live." He remarked further that "she said she thought Father's part was left to her as long as she lived." There is evidence in the record, however, which tends to show that the same understanding was not present with the testatrix at the time she executed the will, on September 28, 1917. The will was prepared by a lawyer and he talked with Mrs. Babcock about her property a few days before the instrument was drawn and executed. His testimony was:

> "Q. She told you what property she owned did she not? A. Yes, sir. Q. She told you that she owned the ranch? A. Yes. I asked her—I think my language was: 'What does your property consist of?' And she answered that question. Q. She said it consisted of the ranch and the home. A. Yes, sir; and the furniture and something in the bank in some form."

A witness with whom Mrs. Babcock frequently advised concerning her affairs testified that she consulted him "late in 1917 or early in 1918" about a contract she was contemplating "with some young man in regard to taking the ranch." The young man was also present at the time. The witness further testified:

> "The proposition between the two was that he was to take the property—she was to sell the property to him and he was to pay for it out of the crops, care for it and pay for it out of the crops. And, after conferring, one with the other, they were not able to come to any definite agreement."

In the latter part of January, 1918, the testatrix had a conversation with this same witness in which she told him that she owned the ranch in its entirety, showing him at the time her deeds from Babcock. The witness examined the deeds and explained to her the true state of her title in the property.

There are certain considerations concerning the two wills which, in connection with the other matters contained in the record, cast some light upon the question of Mrs. Babcock's mental condition at the time the second will was executed. We have already adverted to the apparent error made by the testatrix in the statement of her age in the second will and to the fact that the will of 1911 was preserved by her and was found in her Bible after her death, despite the fact that the later will had been executed. Further, in "the first part of October," 1917, and therefore but a few days after the will of that year was made, Mrs. Babcock had a conversation with one of her nephews, during which she exhibited to him the will of 1911 and called it a valuable paper. How this circumstance occurred is shown by the testimony of the nephew:

> "She made the remark that she was losing quite a little bit of stuff from the house; that somebody was stealing, and so forth; and I asked her if she had any valuables lying around; and she says, 'I have got a few papers and some other little trinkets.'"

It was at this juncture that the testatrix produced the 1911 will as a valuable paper. The will of 1917 was drawn by Mrs. Babcock's counsel with the beginning, "I, Mary Catherine Babcock," etc., but she signed it "Mary Cathrin Babccock." The signature to the will of 1911 was perfect in form. In addition to her husband, who was living at the time the will of 1911 was executed, Mrs. Babcock named in that instrument 25 persons as beneficiaries. In the will of 1917 she named as beneficiaries Eli Babcock and five other pesons, L. S. Wilson, Myrtle Carrigan, Jessie Newmark, Henderson Heath, and Laura Matney. There are several peculiar circumstances connected with these changes in the second will as compared with the first. By the 1911 will a one-twelfth part of the testatrix's estate was bequeathed to her husband, together with her household goods and chattels, while by the later instrument a one-fourth part of the estate went to Eli Babcock, her stepson. This apparent discrepancy might be explained by the fact that Mrs. Babcock had in the meantime acquired some estate from her husband, were it not that one witness testified that the testatrix said after Babcock's death that he left no estate. This statement, it is to be observed, accords strictly with her belief, above mentioned, that she owned the ranch in its entirety, as there is no showing in the record that Babcock possessed anything except his interest in that property. Other matters in connection with the 1917 will are worthy of note: Myrtle Carrigan was not mentioned in the instrument of 1911, the Jesse F. Newmark of that document becomes the Jessie Newmark of the later one, and the Henderson G. Heath of the first becomes the Henderson Heath of the second.

Several persons, "intimate acquaintances" of Mrs. Babcock as that term is used in subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, were allowed by the trial court to testify as to her "mental sanity," to employ the language of section 1870, or competency, or soundness of mind, at or near the time of the execution of the will of 1917; some expressing the opinion that she was competent, others that she was not. Upon the present appeal we are of course interested only in the testimony to the effect that she was incompetent. The niece who lived with Mrs. Babcock from May to September, 1917, after stating the testimony which we have above ascribed to that witness, said that in August of that year the testatrix offered to give her the home in Pomona if she would continue to live with her. The niece refused the offer "because I didn't think she was competent to give it to me." She said further:

> "If she had been competent, I would have accepted it; but I didn't think she was competent to make any paper."

The offer was again made a few weeks later, but was again refused for the same reason, as the witness testified. The husband of the grandniece to whom Mrs. Babcock had gone for a visit of a week, the visit being cut to one day, testified as to her condition in 1917:

> "My opinion would be that she was not capable of doing any business—any legal business. And her actions were—just like that time she come down, for instance to stay a week; she was going to start and walk home the next morning, 40 some odd miles, and I had an awful time to get her to stay."

One of the nephews of the testatrix testified that in 1917 she offered to give him and his brother her home if they "would go up there and take care of her," but that the offer was refused because "we did not think her competent to make any such contract." The witness testified further that he partially based his opinion as to her "unsoundness of mind" upon arguments she had with her husband before he passed away. He said, "they were unfounded; she had no right to make any argument with him whatever." He also said:

"I was with her quite a bit, and I would not consider a person, the way she acted, as of sound mind."

He testified further that—

"In the latter part of 1917, after she become so totally deranged—that is, in my opinion, she used to telephone to my sister-in-law quite frequently to come after her, and she would not let her go back by herself; she would want to do it, and we were afraid that she would get killed. She would get lost, in fact."

This same nephew testified that he saw Mrs. Babcock at his brother's home in September, October, or November, 1919, that her clothing was then filthy, and that he regarded her as totally insane.

It is certain that during the last few months of her life Mrs. Babcock was insane in the fullest sense of the word. In January, 1922, she was taken to the psychopathic ward of the county hospital where, after examination by a judge of the superior court, she was placed in the care of a psychopathic officer. This officer testified that she was then "disoriented and confused, and flighty, and sometimes quite disturbed"; that—

"She did not know whether she was in Los Angeles, or whether she was in Pomona, or where she was. Sometimes she thought she was in Pomona, and sometimes she thought she was in Los Angeles; she could not tell. * * * She talked in a rambling and incoherent way about her people and her relatives and her circumstances, and her condition, but she did not say anything that I took seriously at all. Q. Her condition at that time—did you consider her incompetent? A. Oh, yes."

Upon the arrival of Mrs. Babcock at the psychopathic ward, she was examined by a specialist in nervous and mental diseases. He testified that—

The testatrix then "showed evidence of marked mental deterioration, and also physical. * * * She was disoriented and confused, and didn't know where she was. She thought she was in Pomona, and would think that various people in the hospital were from Pomona. She would constantly ask the same old questions over and over again, and then seemed to forget that she had just been answered. She didn't even know her way very well about the wards. To my best recollection, she would not know her own room. * * * Q. Did you make a diagnosis of her trouble? A. Yes. Q. Did you form an opinion as to the mental condition of this woman apart from the result of the laboratory tests? A. Yes, sir. Q. Eliminate the matter of the laboratory test. A. It is more confirmatory. It was not the basis for the diagnosis. It simply assisted in making the final diagnosis, that is all. Q. Will you state your diagnosis, Doctor? A. General paresis. * * * Q. And what in your opinion was the progress of the disease at the time you observed her? A. She was in an advanced stage of mental deterioration. There was no question as to the insanity of the patient. There might have been some question as to the diagnosis, as to whether it was general paresis or senile dementia. That is the only question that could arise, without the aid of the laboratory tests, if I may be permitted to mention that again. She, as I stated before, showed marked mental deterioration. That was evident by the symptoms that I have mentioned herebefore. She did not know where she was; she did not know but that she was in Pomona; she made mistakes of identity; and I think she had some delusions of persecution. * * * Q. Doctor, what is the type of disease known as general paresis? A. Softening of the brain. Q. And is it a progressive disease? A. Oh, yes, it is a chronic, progressive disease; it is characterized by mental and physical deterioration. * * * Q. You would differentiate general paresis from other forms of insanity? In other words, this is not something that would come on suddenly? A. No. Q. What is the effect of general paresis or senile dementia upon the business ability of the person so afflicted? A. Why, it is—inasmuch as the judgment is disordered, necessarily they are incompetent to carry out a business transaction. * * *

"The Court: Doctor, limiting yourself to the information that you got by the observation and examination by yourself of the patient at the county hospital in 1922, * * * are you able at this time to express an opinion as to her mental competency in September of 1917? * * * A. * * * Well, in view of the fact that there was a very marked mental deterioration, I am of the opinion that it had taken a long time, years, for it to have progressed to the degree that it was in when I saw the patient; a number of years. * * * How many, of course, I am unable to say. * * *

"The Court: I will ask you the question whether you are able to express an opinion from the examination and observation that you made in 1922 * * * as to whether or not she was competent in September, 1917? A My opinion is that she was not."

From the psychopathic ward Mrs. Babcock was sent to a home for the treatment of insane persons, where she died March 15, 1922.

The rules of law governing the settlement of such questions as the one here presented are well established by a number of cases, among which are Estate of Huston, 163 Cal. 166, 124 Pac. 852; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 Pac. 1110; Estate of Allen, 177 Cal. 668, 171 Pac. 686; and Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 192 Pac. 35. We need not pause to quote from the opinions rendered in those cases, but we have endeavored, in our full and circumstantial statement of the evidence which is favorable to the claim of appellants, to so segregate the evidence as to lay ground for the ready application of the different principles of law enunciated by them. The testimony of two experts, one a psychopathic officer, so called, and the other a skilled specialist in mental diseases, given pursuant to an examination of the patient and not upon hypothetical questions, shows that she was insane in January, 1922. The specialist testified, again not in answer to a hypothetical question, but upon a personal examination followed by a laboratory test, that the testatrix was suffering at that time from the progressive mental disease known as general paresis. There being evidence in the record upon these points the contest resolves itself into a question whether the disease had so fastened itself upon Mrs. Babcock in September, 1917, four years and five months before she was confined in the psychopathic ward, hopelessly insane, that she was then incompetent to make a will. Upon this exact question the specialist, again basing his answer upon a personal examination and a laboratory test and not upon a hypothetical question, expressed the opinion that the testatrix was incompetent at the time she put her hand to the contested will. Upon this exact question there is also the mass of evidence, some parts of it weak, some parts of it relatively strong, which we have set forth above at such length. Upon the whole record, we are satisfied that there was substantial evidence to support the contest, that the trial judge erred in directing a verdict as he did, and that the question of Mrs. Babcock's competency should have gone to the jury.

Order reversed.

WATSON v. GREELY, County Auditor.
(Civ. 2816.)

1. Counties 🔑1—Are governmental agencies.

Counties as political entities are governmental agencies, all powers of which have a direct and exclusive reference to state's general policy, and are but a branch of general administration of that policy, and state may through its Legislature and exercise of its sovereign power apportion and delegate to counties any of the functions which belong to it, and may take back and resume exercise of functions which it had delegated to such local agencies.

2. Highways 🔑99 — State may declare any county road a state highway and take supervisory control over it.

Under Const. art. 4, § 36, Legislature is empowered through appropriate branch of its administrative machinery to declare any county road a state highway, and to take sole supervisory control over it; it being the sole judge whether a county road shall be made a state highway, and its conclusion cannot be successfully challenged.

3. Highways 🔑99—Legislature may authorize counties contiguously situated to jointly build highway.

Legislature may authorize two or more counties contiguously situated to each other to jointly build and maintain highways through their respective counties and may authorize one county to extend, when public convenience demands it, and at its own expense, any of its own county roads into limited portions of an adjoining county, and thus connect with a road in that county.

4. Statutes 🔑89—Statute held not invalid as conflicting with Constitution requiring Legislature to establish system of county governments "uniform throughout the state."

Const. art. 11, § 4, requiring Legislature to establish a system of county governments which shall be "uniform throughout the state," which last clause means "an organized plan in keeping with which constituent parts are rendered similar," does not designate quantum of governmental powers which shall be delegated to counties, nor does it declare what particular functions or policies included within state sovereign powers shall be conferred upon counties, and Pol. Code, § 2639, subd. 12, is not invalid as conflicting therewith.

5. Statutes 🔑67, 105(2)—Mandatory section of Constitution must be followed with substantial strictness.

Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring every act to embrace but one subject, expressed in its title, and article 1, § 11, requiring all laws of general nature to have uniform operation, are mandatory, and must be followed with substantial strictness, in view of article 1, § 22.

6. Statutes 🔑123(4) — Statute held not to treat of any subject not germane to general subject expressed in title.

Pol. Code, § 2639, subd. 12, declaring its general subject to be "the powers and duties of boards of supervisors over roads and highways of the county," is not in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 24, in that subjects are treated in the act which are not germane to its general subject, since every provision therein relates solely to county roads or highways and powers which may be exercised over them by boards of supervisors.

7. Statutes 🔑73(2)—Statute applying to every county in state without discrimination held not in conflict with Constitution.

Pol. Code, § 2693, relating to county roads or highways and powers which may be exercised over them by county supervisors, is not in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 11, since it applies without discrimination to every county in the state.

8. Statutes 🔑73(2)—Statute not rendered less "uniform" in operation because some counties might never apply it to their purposes.

That some counties may never apply Pol. Code, § 2693, subd. 12, to their own purposes, does not render such statute less uniform in operation, under Const. art. 1, § 11; requirement of uniformity being satisfied if statute applies to all of a class alike, the class being a legally proper one, for the word "uniform" does not mean universal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Uniform.]

9. Highways 🔑97¾, New, vol. 16A Key-No. Series—Statute relating to county roads and highways held not in conflict with other statutes.

There is no incongruity between Pol. Code, § 2693, subd. 12, and those sections of the county government act defining powers of supervisors with respect to maintenance of roads and bridges within their counties, nor with certain sections of the Political Code relating to the same subject.

Application for a writ of mandate by Thomas D. Watson against F. H. Greely, Auditor of the County of Yuba. Issues of fact referred to Superior Court of Yuba County for determination.

T. H. Christiansen, of Sacramento, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for petitioner.

Ray Manwell, of Marysville, and McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner, a freeholder and taxpayer in and a resident of the county of Yuba, presents to this court this petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as auditor of said county, to draw and issue his warrant in favor of petitioner, on the treasurer of Yuba county, for the sum of $75 as in payment for certain alleged services performed by petitioner for said county.

The services for which petitioner by this proceeding is seeking to secure payment are alleged to have been performd by him under a contract with the county of Yuba arising under the authority alleged to be vested in said county by two certain ordinances, one adopted by the county of Yuba and the other by the county of Sutter, which ordinances are alleged to be authorized by subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code. Said subdivision of said section reads as follows:

"The boards of supervisors of any county in the state may, by and through an ordinance duly passed, permit the use of any of its public highways connecting with any main public highway of an adjoining county by the board of supervisors or highway commissioners of such adjoining county, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining thereon a highway or boulevard serving the needs of residents of both counties; and the board of supervisors of any such adjoining county, if it accepts the provisions of the ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors of the county granting the use, shall have the power to construct and maintain any such highway or boulevard, or to construct or maintain such bridge or bridges on such highway or boulevard as it may deem necessary, or to macadamize, pave, curb or gutter such highway or boulevard in such manner as it may determine, and the cost or expense thereof shall be paid out of the general fund of the county treasury, or such other fund as the board of supervisors may designate, or which shall otherwise be provided, of the county to which the use is granted. The board of supervisors of any counties proceeding under the provisions of this act may acquire real property adjacent to such public highway in an adjoining county for county purposes, and may expend thereon such funds as said board of supervisors shall deem necessary for county purposes. The board of supervisors of any counties proceeding under the provisions of this act may by mutual consent, expressed through ordinances of the respective boards, retransfer the use, control, maintenance and jurisdiction of any highway or boulevard constructed under the provisions hereof to the county originally granting the use."

The facts as stated in the petition are as follows: That Bear river, a torrential stream, at all times in every year carrying water, and having its source on the northerly slope of the Sierra Nevadas, flows in a general westerly direction down to a certain point in the county of Sutter, where it empties into the Feather river; that, until approximately 20 years ago, the filum or center thread of said river constituted and was the boundary line between the county of Yuba and "that portion of said county of Sutter lying and being easterly from said Feather river"; that during approximately all that time a public road or highway was maintained by the county of Yuba from the city of Marysville, the county seat of said county, down to said Bear river, where it then formed said county line, and by the county of Sutter southerly therefrom down to the county of Sacramento; that a bridge across said river, forming a part of said public road or highway, was constructed, "and during said time was maintained jointly by the joint efforts and the joint expense of said counties." The petition proceeds:

"On or about 20 years prior to the date of the commencement of this action, the exact date whereof petitioner cannot state, said Bear river, due to large deposits of detritus, sand, and other material in its channel carried there from the operation of hydraulic mines near the headwaters of said stream, changed its course, and wandered from its original channel, which formed said boundary line of said two counties, southerly, and formed a new channel in said county of Sutter approximately one mile south of said former channel, and said boundary line, and which said new channel said river has ever since followed and now does follow, excepting only that said new channel aforesaid did return to the old site of the old channel a comparatively short distance east of the easterly bank of said Feather river.

"That said change of channel by said Bear river ever since its change has interfered with and still does interfere with convenient and proper communication by and between the residents and inhabitants of said county of Yuba and said county of Sutter, and for that matter of all persons seeking to traverse the territory lying in said county of Sutter south of said old channel of said Bear river and rendering the joint bridge heretofore referred to as utterly useless.

"That for a period of more than one year prior, and up to the date of the commencement of this action there has existed and still does exist in said county of Sutter a certain road or highway which is particularly described and referred to in the resolution of the board of supervisors of the respective counties of Yuba and Sutter hereinafter in this petition set forth, which said highway crosses the said changed channel of said Bear river in paragraph 4 of this petition set forth and referred to, and which said highway not only extends in a southerly direction south from said changed channel of said Bear river down through said county of Sacramento and on into the city of Sacramento, but it also extends northerly from where it crosses said changed channel of said Bear river to the dividing line btween said counties of Yuba and Sutter and in its course northerly from said changed channel of said Bear river during all of said times said highway did and still does connect with a main public highway of said county of Yuba.

"That in order to cause said highway extending across said changed channel of said Bear river aforesaid to be and remain passable and of use to the traveling public, including the residents of said counties of Yuba and Sutter, it is necessary that said highway be placed and maintained in good repair, and that a good and sufficient bridge be constructed and maintained as a part of said highway across said changed channel of said Bear river."

On the 5th day of November, 1923, the board of supervisors of Sutter county, at a regular meeting thereof, passed and adopted an ordinance granting to the board of supervisors of the county of Yuba permission to use a certain described portion of said public highway in the said county of Sutter, connecting with a main public highway of the county of Yuba, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining thereon a highway or boulevard or both, "serving the needs of the residents of both the counties of Yuba and Sutter," upon the following conditions:

"(a) That all bridges that are constructed upon said highway be constructed jointly by said two counties in the manner prescribed by law for the construction of joint bridges across streams and rivers upon the boundary line between counties, and that the cost thereof be borne equally by said counties.

"(b) That notwithstanding anything in this ordinance contained, the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter may enter and do any work upon said highway for the maintenance or construction thereof, so long as such work does not interfere or conflict with any work then being done or contracted to be done by the board of supervisors of the said county of Yuba; and, also, that the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter in case of mutual agreement with the said board of supervisors of the county of Yuba, may join with said board of supervisors of the county of Yuba, in the doing of any maintenance or construction work upon said highway."

The ordinance further provides that the permission therein and thereby granted is upon the express condition that the board of supervisors of the county of Yuba shall accept the provisions of said ordinance within a reasonable time, otherwise said ordinance shall cease to be effective, etc.

On the 11th day of December, 1923, the board of supervisors of Yuba county, at a regular meeting of said board, duly passed and adopted a resolution embodying the above-mentioned ordinance passed and adopted by the board of supervisors of Sutter county, and thereby accepted said ordinance, "and all and singular the terms, conditions, and provisions thereof."

Proceeding thereafter to carry out the provisions of the said resolution of the board of supervisors of Yuba county, the said board, on the 17th day of December, 1923, having employed him for that purpose, authorized and directed the petitioner "to go upon and clear from brush and material deposited thereon a portion of said highway in said resolution described, and thereupon petitioner did proceed and did perform said work and labor in accordance with said order or resolution of said board of supervisors aforesaid, and did, in connection therewith, perform labor of the reasonable value of $70."

It is further alleged in the petition that the petitioner regularly and according to law presented his claim for said work to the board of supervisors, and that the same was subsequently duly approved and allowed by said board, but that, on his presentation of said claim to the respondent, as auditor of the county of Yuba, on the 8th day of January, 1924, accompanied by a demand that said respondent, as such auditor, draw his warrant for the amount thereof on the treasurer of said county in favor of petitioner, said respondent, as such, refused, has at all times refused, and "still does refuse to draw his warrant for said claim upon said treasurer in favor of petitioner" for said sum of $70.

The respondent has filed herein a motion to strike from the petition certain specified portions of its averments, a demurrer to the petition on the general and certain special grounds, and an answer denying certain of the allegations of the petition.

By the answer certain material issues of fact are tendered, but the parties at the hearing of the arguments herein stipulated that the questions of law might first be determined, and, if in favor of the petitioner, then the issues of fact should be referred to the superior court of Yuba county for trial and determination.

The petition contains no averment of fact which is not essential to a statement of a case for the relief herein demanded. And the facts therein stated are well pleaded, if the law under which the proceedings had by the respective boards of supervisors of Yuba and Sutter counties involves a valid legislative enactment. This is the important question raised by the motion to strike. The same question is presented by the demurrer to the petition.

The respondent contends that section 2639 of the Political Code, in so far as is concerned subdivision 12 thereof, is unconstitutional, in that it is in conflict with so much of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution as reads as follows:

> "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title."

It is further likewise contended that subdivision 12 of section 2639 is void, because it is violative of article 1, § 11, and article 11, § 4, of the Contitution. The first named section provides:

> "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation."

The last-named section reads as follows:

> "The Legislature shall establish a system of county governments, which shall be uniform throughout the state; and by general laws shall provide for township organizations, under which any county may organize whenever a majority of the qualified electors of such county, voting at a general election, shall so determine; and whenever a county shall adopt township organization, the assessment and collection of the revenue shall be made, and the business of such county and the local affairs of the several townships therein shall be managed and transacted, in the manner prescribed by such general laws."

[1] Before proceeding to the consideration of the specific points urged by the respondent involving a challenge of the constitutional validity of subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code, it is deemed proper to have before us the legal status of county government organizations and their legal relation to the state government, and, as to this, these propositions may be set down as fundamental or at least so thoroughly established as to be entirely removed from the field of speculation or the realms of legitimate disputation: (1) That counties, as political entities or subdivisions of the state, are governmental agencies, all the powers and functions of which "have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are, in fact, but a branch of the general administration of that policy." 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporasions (5th Ed.) § 35; County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 146, 164 Pac. 613; County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 636, 63 Pac. 78, 621; Reclamation Dist. No. 1500 v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 679, 154 Pac. 845; Dillwood v. Riecks, 42 Cal. App. 602, 607, 184 Pac. 35. (2) That, as a corollary of the foregoing proposition, "the state may, through its Legislature, and in the exercise of its sovereign power and will, in all cases where the people themselves have not restricted or qualified such exercise of that power, apportion and delegate to the counties any of the functions which belong to it," and, "on the other hand, the state may take back and itself resume the exercise of certain functions which it had delegated to those local agencies." County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 149, 164 Pac. 613.

We know of no reason, constitutional or otherwise, why the state and the counties may not act jointly in carrying out certain of the policies of the former. There are several instances in which this has been done and is now being done. Formerly the counties were required to assess all taxable property within their respective territorial limits for state purposes and to collect and pay the same into the treasury of the state. At the present time the state and the counties have the joint control, support, and care of indigent persons afflicted with tuberculosis, who are without relatives from whom they may legally require support and care. Stats. 1915, p. 1530; County of Sacramento v. Chambers, supra; Matter of Controversy between City and County of San Francisco and County of Alameda, on the one part, and Thomas F. Boyle, Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, on the other part (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 549. There are, of course, many matters or subjects of governmental concern of which the state itself must maintain the power of sole and exclusive administration, and which, by the mandatory terms of the Constitution, cannot, and, indeed, by the very nature and logic of the situation, should not be transferred or delegated to the governmental cognizance of any of its political subdivisions; but, as to all of that great variety of matters or subjects which may be committed to the governmental jurisdiction of counties, the state, in its discretion, may delegate the same to counties, or having already delegated them to counties, withdraw them from their further cognizance.

There is nothing in the Constitution which would prevent the state itself from taking over the exclusive control of the matter of the construction and maintenance of all public highways in the state, whether they be trunk or main highways or so-called county roads. The power and corresponding right to do so have always resided in the state through its Legislature. But to leave free from all possible doubt the right of the state to control the construction of main or trunk highways therein, the people in the year 1902 added to article 4 of the Constitution, section 36, which reads as follows:

> "The Legislature shall have power to establish a system of state highways or to declare any road a state highway, and to pass all laws necessary or proper to construct and maintain the same, and to extend aid for the construction and maintenance in whole or in part of any county highway."

[2] Under that section the Legislature is empowered, through the appropriate branch of its administrative machinery, to declare any county road a state highway, and thus take sole supervisory control over it. No exception is made as to the character of the county road which the state may translate into a state highway; it may be a road connecting with a main line road through the state or it may be a lateral leading to some point on a trunk road to another point in the county. The state is itself the sole judge of whether a certain county road should be made a state highway or a part of the state highway system, and its conclusion as to that matter could not be successfully challenged.

[3, 4] Nor is there any provision of the Constitution which prohibits the Legislature from authorizing two or more counties, contiguously situated to each other, to jointly build and maintain highways through their respective counties, or, indeed, from authorizing one county to extend, when public convenience demanded it, and at its own expense, any of its own county roads into and over certain limited portions of an adjoining county and thus connect with a road in the latter county. Obviously, such authority, as a matter of fairness, should be conferred and made exercisable, as the statute in question provides, only upon the condition that the county into which such road is to be extended consents to such extension and upon such terms as shall be fair and just, according to the judgment of the Legislature. There is to be found in section 4 of article 11 of the Constitution hereinabove reproduced, no implied, much less an express, inhibition against legislation authorizing such an arrangement between two counties. That section is, of course, mandatory in its terms, and the Legislature is thereby imperatively required to establish, as an essential part of the machinery of the state government and as in aid of the administration thereof, a system of county governments, which shall be uniform throughout the state, which last clause means "an organized plan or scheme in keeping with which the constituent parts thereof are rendered similar and are connected and combined into one complete, harmonious whole, and it necessarily imports both a unity of purpose and entirety of operation." Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 192, 201 Pac. 120; Board v. State, 26 Okl. 366, 109 Pac. 563; State v. Riordan, 24 Wis. 484. This is all that is required of the Legislature by that section of the Constitution in the organization of county governments, but, of course, from the uniformity thus required no departure is permitted, except in such cases only as such departure is specifically authorized by the Constitution itself. Coulter v. Pool, supra. There is nothing in said section which limits or restricts the Legislature in the matter of committing to counties the power to administer such of its own functions and policies as it has the right to delegate or which it is not forbidden so to delegate by some other mandate of the organic law. In other words, said section of the Constitution does not pretend to designate or specify the quantum of the governmental powers of the state which shall be delegated to counties, nor does it point out or purport to declare what particular functions or policies included within the sovereign powers of the state government shall be conferred upon counties. All this is left to the sole discretion and judgment of the state, acting through its lawmaking department, except in so far as the Legislature may be required by other provisions of the Constitution, mandatory in their terms, to invest counties with certain specific powers which otherwise would belong to the sovereignty of the state subject to be conferred upon or withheld from the counties by the Legislature.

It is not necessary to present herein illustrations of the many conceivable instances in which the scheme authorized by subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code would not only be of immeasurable benefit to the county desiring to extend one of its roads into an adjoining county so as to connect with a road in the latter county, but would be necessary in order to secure that convenient connection with other parts of the state so essential to the full development and maintenance of prosperous business conditions. A road in a particular county with its terminus at a distance of several miles from a line dividing such county from another may serve in full measure all the purposes of the county in which it is situated, and, therefore, there might not exist in such case any reason or motive or desire in the latter county to extend the road to the county line so that it would connect with a road in the adjoining county. What good reason may be suggested why the Legislature should not authorize the one county, with the consent of the other, to extend, at its own expense, one of its roads so as to connect with the road in the adjoining county at the terminus of the latter's road? But, as stated, it is needless to introduce further illustration of the fairness, reasonableness, and the efficacy of such a plan as is contemplated by subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code. It is sufficient to know that the Legislature has the power to establish such a scheme, that it has done so, and that it appears to involve a reasonable exercise of such power.

[5] We now approach the consideration of the specific points upon which respondent contends this court must rest the conclusion that subdivision 12 of the section under consideration is in conflict with the terms of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution and of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution. The contention that said subdivision is in conflict with section 4 of article 11 of the Constitution has already been sufficiently considered. The provisions of the Constitution with which it is claimed the act in question is in conflict are mandatory, and must be followed with substantial strictness. Section 22, art. 1, Const.; Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251; Law v. S. F. et al., 144 Cal. 384, 77 Pac. 1014. Both sections, however, have often been considered and their meaning and scope construed by the Supreme and Appellate courts of this state. Their meaning and scope have thus been made perfectly clear, and the only difficulty, if difficulty there be, which can present itself in any case where it is charged that the Legislature, in the enactment of some statute, has failed to observe the mandates thereof, is in determining whether the charge may or may not be sustained. There is perhaps no other case, among the many, where the question of the validity of a statute was made determinable by the test prescribed by section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, in which the purpose, the meaning, and the scope of said section were expounded in language of greater perspicacity than in that of Ex parte Liddell, supra. In that case the title of the act assailed read: "An act to establish a state reform school for juvenile offenders, and to make an appropriation therefor." The act provided, among other things, that any boy or girl between the ages of 10 and 16 years, who has been convicted of an offense, the penalty for which was imprisonment in the county jail or the state penitentiary, may be committed to the state reform school for a term of not less than 1 nor more than 5 years; "provided, however, that if the crime be one punishable by imprisonment in the county jail, the court may, in its discretion, commit the offender to the county jail for the time authorized by law," in such a case. The claim was, as is in reality the same here, that the act embraced more than one subject, but that the title of the act failed fully to express its subject-matter. The court held that the title of said act was not subject to the criticism thus made against it, and gave the following construction of section 24 of article 4:

> "The object of the provision is to prevent legislative abuse—to prevent the passage of acts bearing deceitful and misleading titles. It is intended to protect the members of the Legislature, as well as the public, against fraud; to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which give no intimation to the members of the Legislature or to the people of the matters contained therein. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (6th Ed.) 169. * * *
> "In Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 229, we held it was not necessary that the title of the act should embrace an abstract of its contents. The cases cited therein show that such is the view taken by the courts of other states; and, on reflection, it must appear that this conclusion is based upon the soundest principles of constitutional construction. It certainly was not intended that the title should be a repetition of the provisions found in the body of the bill; the object was to prevent deception by the inclusion of matters incongruous with the subject specified in the title. If the title contains a reasonable intimation of the matters under legislative consideration, the public cannot complain. It has always been the custom to state the subject of a bill in general terms and with the fewest words, and the framers of the Constitution doubtless intended the Legislature to conform to that custom. Mills v. Carleton, 29 Wis. 409; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 226; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 494. * * * So an act to incorporate a fireman's benevolent association may include provisions for levying a tax upon the income of a foreign insurance company for the benefit of the corporation (Fireman's Benevolent Ass'n v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511, 74 Am. Dec. 115); and it is held in many cases that an act entitled in general terms an act to incorporate a certain town may lawfully provide all means necessary for the government of the town, including taxation, courts, definition of misdemeanors, punishment of offenders, municipal improvements, etc. State v. Town of Union, 33 N. J. Law, 350; Cooley's Constitutional Limitation, 172, note 1."

In the case of Law v. San Francisco, supra, the Supreme Court quoted approvingly the following cogently expressed views of a constitutional provision of another state precisely the same as section 24 of article 4 of our Constitution by the United States Circuit Court in Geer v. Commissioners of Ouray County, 97 Fed. 435, 38 C. C. A. 250:

> "The object of this constitutional provision was twofold. It was to prevent surreptitious legislation, the insertion of enactments in bills which were not indicated by their titles, and to forbid the treatment of incongruous subjects in the same act. It never was intended to prevent the Legislature from treating all the various branches of the same general subject in one law, or from inserting in a single act all the legislation germane to its principal subject."

Many other cases to the same effect as the above might be cited, but it is not necessary to do so here.

[6] Tested by the principles enunciated in the cases referred to above, it cannot justly be said that the act in question involves legislation upon any subject not indicated by its title or the "treatment of incongruous subjects." It is clear that there is no subject treated in the act which is not germane to its general subject, to wit: "The powers and duties of boards of supervisors over the roads and highways of the county." Every provision in the act—every subject thereof—relates solely to county roads or highways and the powers which may be exercised over them by the boards of supervisors in the several counties throughout the state. It follows, therefore, that there is nothing deceptive in the title, or, in other words, there is no subject treated in the act which is not reasonably and fairly indicated by the title thereof.

But it is argued that the title, to the average mind, would indicate that the phrase, "roads and highways of the county," has reference to roads and highways wholly situated and maintained within the territorial limits of each of the counties of the state. The title does not expressly so declare, nor, in view of the constitutional provision expressly authorizing the state, through the board or body to which it has committed such duties to establish a system of "state highways," may it reasonably be held that it so implies. If the title had thus been made to declare, "* * * relating to the powers and duties of boards of supervisors over the roads and highways in (or within) the counties," the argument might then have some foundation for its support. We are authorized to assume, from the phraseology of the title and the provisions of subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code, between which there appears perfect agreement, that the words "roads and highways of the county" were designedly employed so as to make it clear that the powers of the boards of supervisors were to be limited in their application to county roads and highways as distinguished from state roads and highways over which the state has sole and exclusive jurisdiction. Moreover, it being true, as has herein been shown, that the Legislature may rightfully establish such a scheme or plan as is provided for by said subdivision 12, and the state having done so, that portion of the road in a county constituting the extension by the adjoining county, such extension having been effected in conformity with the requirements of said subdivision, would, in law, be a road "or highway of the county" making the extension, although such portion of said road is not physically located in such county.

[7, 8] Subdivision 12 of section 2639 of the Political Code does not offend section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution. Said subdivision applies without discrimination in any respect to each and every county of the state. Any county, when the public convenience or the exigencies of the situation may justify or demand it, may invoke and act upon the provision of said subdivision. The fact, should it be a fact, there there may be many or some of the counties which may never find occasion to apply the provisions of said subdivision to their own purposes does not render it any the less uniform in its operation, within the meaning or intent of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution. What is meant by that mandate of the Constitution is that any law of a general nature shall not discriminate as between persons who or things which stand in the same relation to such law "in respect to the privileges and immunities conferred upon it or the acts which it prohibits." The word "uniform" in the section does not mean universal, and, even where a general law applies to all of a class, the classification being a legally proper one, the requirement of uniformity is in such case satisfied if it applies to all of such class alike. 5 Cal. Jur. 818, 819; People ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 17 Cal. 547, 555; Ex parte Smith & Keating, 38 Cal. 702; Selowsky v. Superior Court, etc., 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652, and the numerous other cases cited in 5 Cal. Jur. pp. 818 et seq.

It is clear that, as to "uniformity of operation," subdivision 12 of section 2639 fully squares with the requirement of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution as that mandate of our organic law has been uniformly construed by the cases.

[9] There is not, as counsel for the respondent claim is true, any incongruity between said subdivision 12 and those sections of the county government act defining the powers and duties of boards of supervisors with respect to the maintenance of roads and bridges "within their respective counties," nor with certain sections of the Political Code relating to the same subjects. Subdivision 12 of section 2639 merely invests such boards with more extensive powers with respect to the construction and maintenance of county roads and highways than they possessed prior to the passage of the act in question.

It follows from the foregoing views that the motion to strike from the petition certain averments must be denied and the demurrer to the petition overruled, and such is the order. As stated at the outset of this opinion, however, the facts as stated in the petition are controverted by the answer, and by the stipulation of the parties those questions of fact are to be submitted to the determination of the superior court of Yuba county, until which determination and the report of the court of its findings no conclusion upon the question whether the writ shall or shall not issue from this court can be announced.

Accordingly it is ordered that the issues of fact raised by the answer to the petition herein be referred to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Yuba, for trial, and said court is hereby directed to hear and determine the same, and to report and return to this court its findings thereon within 60 days after the date of the filing of this opinion.

BISSETT v. SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO BELT RY. CO. (Civ. 4775.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 17, 1924.)

Railroads ⚷327(1)—Truck driver backing without looking held negligent.

Deceased struck by a train while backing his truck out of a private road onto the railroad track without looking for an oncoming train, it being possible for him to have driven in forward position, and he having unobstructed view of track for a mile, held guilty of negligence constituting proximate cause of his death as matter of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by Eda Bissett against the South San Francisco Belt Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reisner & Honey and Leigh S. Deming, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

McKinstry, Haber & Firebaugh, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered against her after the court had granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the conclusion of the evidence offered by the plaintiff. This motion was granted upon the ground that the evidence showed contributory negligence as a matter of law on the part of Ulster Bissett, deceased, the son of the plaintiff, for whose death damages were sought by his mother upon the ground that her son's death was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The Growers Rice Milling Company, hereinafter referred to as the Milling Company, occupied four acres of land at South San Francisco, San Mateo county, California. On the north line of the premises and extending in an easterly and westerly direction about 400 to 500 feet is a picket fence ten feet high. Near the center of the fence is a gate 12 feet wide used for ingress to and egress from the premises. Through this gate extends a dirt road, leading from the inclosure over a railroad track (hereinafter described) and extending to Swift avenue, which is a public thoroughfare. This dirt road is a private road used only for the business of the Milling Company. In front and north of the inclosure is a railroad track owned and operated by the defendant, the south rail of which is 6 feet 2 inches from the fence and the opening of the gate therein. This track crosses the private dirt road of the Milling Company and runs from the Southern Pacific depot to the premises of the Western Meat Company which is located about a quarter of a mile further east than the Milling Company. The railroad had been operating over this track for many years prior to the accident herein discussed, and deceased was familiar with the physical conditions and the operation of the railroad, for it appears that he had been delivering material to the Milling Company for several years, driving into its premises sometimes as often as a dozen times a day.

The railroad track runs in an easterly and westerly direction and from the gate referred to toward the west (the direction from which the train came which is involved here) the track is a perfectly straight one for a distance of a mile. The atmosphere was clear on the afternoon of the accident; and from the gate, the track could be seen, perfectly, for a distance of a mile.

Inside of the picket fence and within the inclosure of the Milling Company, south of said picket fence and west of the dirt road, is an incinerator about 40 feet high with a smokestack about 60 feet high. The north side of the incinerator is about 6 feet south of the fence, and the east side is about 30 feet from the west side of the road. This incinerator is so situated that from a point inside the Milling Company's property one's vision in a northwesterly direction through the openings between the pickets of the fence is obstructed. An object coming from the west along the railroad track could not be seen for a brief period when the incinerator was between it and a person within the inclosure.

Upon the day of the accident the deceased drove an automobile truck from Swift avenue over the dirt road, through the gate and into the premises of the Milling Company, stopping about 45 feet south of the gate. At this point he unloaded his truck, and then, without stopping or looking for a train approaching along the railroad track, he straightened out his truck and backed it in a northerly direction along this private road through the gate and on to the railroad track. When the back of his truck was upon the track the engine of the defendant coming from the west was within a few feet of it and deceased jumped from the truck into the picket fence and died as the result of the injuries which he received in so doing. The engine struck the truck and damaged it. The evidence appears in the record uncontradicted that deceased backed north out of the gate while he was facing south with his hands upon the steering wheel and without stopping and looking for an approaching train, which might have been seen from the gateway.

Fifteen or 20 feet beyond the place where his truck was stopped and just off and to the west of the dirt road is a garage shed 25 or 30 feet wide, open on the east side. The depth of this shed from east to west plus the width of the dirt road is about 60 feet. At the time deceased backed his truck out of the gate the garage shed was empty, and he might have run south from the point where he unloaded and turned westerly into the garage shed and then proceeded out of the shed driving forward. Had he done so the accident, most probably, would not have happened, because deceased would have seen the train when he reached the gate, and there were 6 feet between the gate and the nearest rail of the track. It also appears that after unloading his truck deceased could have proceeded 200 feet south and turned his car without reversing his engine and then proceeded out of the gate driving forward.

Under the conditions above narrated the deceased, thoroughly familiar with the physical conditions, backed out of this private road onto a railroad track without making any observations for an oncoming train. The length of the truck was about 16 feet, and the evidence discloses that driving backward, as deceased was doing, seated about 10 feet from the rear of his truck, the truck was upon the railroad track before deceased had reached the gate where a view of the track could be obtained.

It seems that a mere statement of the facts of the case concludes the appellant. Whether or not the defendant company rang a bell or was bound to ring a bell upon crossing this private road becomes immaterial. Herbert v. Southern Pac. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 232, 53 Pac. 651; Pepper v. Southern Pac. Co., 105 Cal. 389, 38 Pac. 974. The only possible conclusion from the evidence is that the negligence of deceased proximately caused his death; that being so, it presented a question of law and the judgment of nonsuit was proper. Murray v. Southern Pac. Co., 177 Cal. 1, 169 Pac. 675.

The judgment is affirmed.

SIDNEY v. WILSON et al. (Civ. 4022.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Court findings construed to support judgment where possible.

Where possible, court findings should be construed to support the judgment.

2. Replevin 🔑8(3)—Plaintiff must show right to possession.

To sustain an action in claim and delivery, plaintiff must show, not only possession of the property, but right to possession.

3. Replevin 🔑8(3)—Facts held to show sufficient possession, and right to possession, to maintain claim and delivery action.

Where plaintiff's husband, who purchased automobile with her money, with understanding that it should be her separate property, without her knowledge registered it in his own name under Motor Vehicle Act, and kept it in their garage at home, and later absconded, held that plaintiff had sufficient possession and right to possession to maintain an action in claim and delivery against husband's attaching creditor and sheriff.

4. Replevin 🔑72—Findings held to sustain judgment in claim and delivery action.

In an action of claim and delivery for an automobile against the attaching sheriff, court's findings, though not showing right to possession on date of attachment, held to support the judgment.

5. Husband and wife 🔑129(3)—Wife held estopped from recovering automobile from attaching creditor of husband.

Under Civ. Code, § 3543, where plaintiff's husband purchased an automobile with her money, and registered it under Motor Vehicle Act in his own name, which plaintiff discovered without protesting, plaintiff was estopped from recovering the car from an attaching creditor of the husband, who extended credit in reliance on the certificate of registration without knowledge of plaintiff's claim.

John A. Hadaller and Byron Waters, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Claim and delivery. Briefly stated, the facts are that plaintiff had intrusted the sum of $600 of her separate property to her husband, E. J. Sidney, for the purpose of having him purchase for plaintiff an automobile, with the understanding between them that the automobile was to remain at all times the separate property of plaintiff, and that in the event of a sale of the automobile the money received therefrom was to be paid to plaintiff as her separate property. The husband bought the automobile, paid the wife's money for it, and attended to the registration of the same under the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California, but in so doing, without the wife's knowledge or consent at that time, the husband registered the automobile in his own name and wrote his own name on the registration card as the owner thereof. The automobile was kept in a garage at the home occupied by plaintiff and her husband. Some time after the purchase of the automobile, plaintiff's said husband purchased a diamond from the defendant Wilson, for which part cash was paid and credit was given for the balance of the purchase price. In extending credit to the said husband of plaintiff, defendant Wilson relied not only upon statements and representations made to him by the said husband of plaintiff to the effect that he was the owner of the automobile in question and that he had the sum of $1,500 on deposit in the First National Bank of San Bernardino, but as well upon recommendations of the said husband of plaintiff made by other persons. Shortly after the diamond had been purchased, plaintiff's husband absconded, and defendant Wilson brought an action against him to recover the balance due on the diamond, in which action he caused defendant Shay, as sheriff, to attach the said automobile. Thereafter plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of the automobile. She recovered judgment, and defendants appeal therefrom on the ground that the findings are insufficient to sustain the judgment.

Appellants specifically contend that there is no finding by the court with respect to the ultimate fact either of ownership or of right of possession by the plaintiff at the time the action was commenced; and it is admitted by respondent that, in the absence of either of such findings, in substance or in effect, whether directly stated or to be inferred from the express findings of the court, a reversal of the judgment must follow. In connection with the fact of plaintiff's ownership, or her right to possession of the automobile at the time the action was commenced, the findings contain the following:

> "That the said sum of $600 was the separate property of the plaintiff which she herself had earned in the state of California through her labor during a period of desertion by her said husband; * * * that, prior to the purchase of the said automobile by plaintiff, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and her husband that plaintiff's separate funds be invested in the said automobile, that the automobile at all times remain her separate property, and that, in the event of a sale of the said automobile by the said husband or either of them, the entire sum so received from the sale should be paid to the plaintiff as her separate property; * * * that the said automobile was taken out of her (plaintiff's) custody on the 30th day of November, 1921, plaintiff's husband having deserted plaintiff on or about October 28, 1921, and absconded from the state of California, by defendant W. A. Shay, as sheriff, who acted at the instance and request of defendant R. B. Wilson, and that such taking * * * was wrongful and without right."

It will thus be seen that there is no direct finding, either of ownership or of right of possession in plaintiff at the time the action was commenced—the only finding in regard to ownership being that the automobile was purchased on September 19, 1921, and that it remained in the custody of plaintiff until November 30, 1921, when it was taken from plaintiff by the sheriff under the writ of attachment. It sufficiently appears that plaintiff was in the actual physical possession of the automobile at the time it was so taken.

[1] It is the rule that where possible the findings of the court should receive a construction which will support the judgment rather than defeat it. It is said in the case of Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257, that:

> "The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon, and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and, upon an appeal from that judgment, this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment."

And see, also, Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 286; McCarthy v. Brown, 113 Cal. 17, 45 Pac. 14; Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532, 147 Pac. 585; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659; Pacific States Corporation v. Arnold, 23 Cal. App. 672, 139 Pac. 239; Ballou v. Sunflower Gold Min. Co., 165 Cal. 557, 132 Pac. 1036.

[2] But, notwithstanding the fact that actual physical possession is thus satisfactorily shown to have been in plaintiff at the time the auto was taken from her custody by the sheriff, and notwithstanding plaintiff's equitable ownership thereof, it is contended by appellants that, in addition thereto, plaintiff must show that she had the legal right to possession.

Section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1917, p. 391, as amended, Stats. 1919, p. 199) sets forth the necessary procedure on a transfer of title of an automobile, and, among other things, provides that—

> "Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose."

[3] Because the record herein does not show that plaintiff was the registered owner of said automobile at the time the action was commenced, it is urged by appellants that under the provisions of said Motor Vehicle Act, as just quoted, plaintiff had not the right to possession of the automobile, and hence was not entitled to maintain an action in claim and delivery. As set forth in the case of Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532, 147 Pac. 585, where many authorities are cited, mere possession of the subject-matter of a claim and delivery action will not suffice. In order that an action of such character may be sustained, it is necessary, not only that plaintiff show possession of the property, but as well that he is entitled to such possession. The facts of the instant case, as disclosed by the transcript, showing that plaintiff was the equitable owner of the car, coupled with her physical possession thereof at the time it was taken from her custody by defendant Shay, as sheriff, are a sufficient compliance with the rule requiring not merely possession, but a right to possession, in order that the action in claim and delivery may be maintained. In the case of Moody v. Goodwin, 53 Cal. App. 693, 200 Pac. 733, the legal principle is announced (syllabus) that—

> "A person in the actual and rightful possession of an automobile is entitled to maintain an action in replevin or for conversion thereof, even though upon a transfer to him there was a failure to comply with section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1917, p. 391)."

To the same effect, see Goodman v. Anglo-California Trust Co. (Cal. App) 217 Pac. 1078; also, Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 Pac. 848; Davis v. Cline, 184 Cal. 548, 195 Pac. 42.

[4] With reference to the requirement of right of possession of the automobile at the time the action in claim and delivery was commenced by plaintiff, the findings show that plaintiff gave $600 of her separate property to her husband to purchase the automobile for her, as her separate property; that on September 19, 1921, plaintiff's husband did purchase the automobile as requested, but registered it in his own name, of which fact plaintiff at the time was ignorant, and that she "did not know that her rights to the automobile were in any wise affected thereby"; that on October 28, 1921, plaintiff's husband left the home of plaintiff and absconded from the state of California, leaving said automobile on the premises then and theretofore occupied by plaintiff and her said husband; that the automobile was kept at the home of plaintiff and her husband from the time it was purchased on September 19, 1921, until the 30th day of November, 1921, when defendant Shay, as sheriff, under a writ of attachment, took the automobile from plaintiff's custody. According to the findings, the 30th day of November, 1921, is the last day that plaintiff had possession of the automobile. The action was tried on the allegations contained in an amended complaint and the answer thereto. The transcript of the record does not contain a copy of the original complaint; hence this court is unable to determine the exact date of the commencement of the action. However, the amended complaint contained an allegation "that before the commencement of this action plaintiff, on the 14th day of December, 1921, at the place aforesaid, demanded the possession of the said property of the defendants," from which it may be inferred that the action was not commenced before December 14, 1921. Allowing as a correct conclusion that the findings show that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the automobile on November 30, 1921, still there is no direct finding that at any time thereafter, and especially at the time the action was commenced, such was the case. Between the 30th day of November and the 14th day of December is a space of time for which no accounting is made. For aught that appears by the findings, both the ownership and the right to the possession of the automobile may have been transferred by plaintiff to some other person during such interval; and, if so, under the well-settled rule, ordinarily plaintiff could not maintain the action. In the case of Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 648, 60 Pac. 434, it was alleged in the complaint, which was filed on July 15th, that on the 14th day of July preceding, the plaintiff was in the possession and entitled to the possession of the property; and it was held that, had not the affirmative allegations of the answer cured the defect in the complaint, no cause of action would have been stated. To the same effect is Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750, where a period of two days existed between the date when right of possession was alleged in plaintiff and the date of the commencement of the action. On the other hand, it is held in the case of Harris v. Smith, 132 Cal. 316, 64 Pac. 409, that (syllabus)—

> "A complaint in an action of claim and delivery, alleging that on a day named before the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, and was then in possession thereof, and that the defendant then, without plaintiff's consent, and against his will, wrongfully, unlawfully, and by force came into possession thereof, states, in effect, that it was thus taken from his possession, and states a cause of action arising on the day named, which continues until affirmatively shown to be extinguished."

It may be said that in each of the foregoing cases the question before the court was one solely of the sufficiency of the pleadings, and that in the instant case no such question is before the court.

In the case last cited, in referring to a line of cases holding that either ownership or right of possession must be alleged as of the date of the commencement of the action, it is said:

> "The complaint, it is contended, fails to allege ownership or right of possession at the time of the commencement of the action, and hence, under the decisions in this state, is insufficient [citing cases]. In the cases cited, the only allegations of the complaint were, in each case, that at a day named prior to the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property sued for, and that the defendant now wrongfully detains the same, etc. In this case the complaint alleged not only that on the day named the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, but also that he was in possession of it, and that the defendants, on that day, without the plaintiff's consent, and against his will, wrongfully and unlawfully and by force came into possession of said personal property, and, in effect, that it was thus taken from his possession. The difference is that, in the cases cited, no cause of action is alleged as existing either at the time of the commencement of the suit or at any other time. But in the case at bar a complete cause of action is alleged as arising on the day named; and it may be contended that the obligation of restoration, having been created by the wrongful act of the defendant, it continues—with the action founded on it—until it is affirmatively shown to have been extinguished."

The allegations of the amended complaint herein with reference to the ownership and possession of the automobile are that—

> "Since the date of the purchase of the said automobile, to wit, September 19, 1921, plaintiff was, continued to be and now is the owner of the said automobile; that on November 30, 1921, plaintiff was in the exclusive possession of the said automobile, has ever since been entitled to the exclusive possession of the same, and is now entitled to the exclusive possession thereof."

The allegations of the amended complaint are not criticized; but it is a rule (with but few exceptions, none of which is applicable here) that the findings must cover the material issues. The right of possession of plaintiff in the automobile at the time of the commencement of the action was a material issue upon which there should have been a finding by the court. In the case of Cooke v. Aguirre, 86 Cal. 479, 25 Pac. 5, it is said:

> "The questions whether the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property, and whether he was damaged by the taking, were put in issue by the pleadings. Both of these were material issues. One of them, at least, must have been found in favor of the plaintiff, to entitle him to recover. There was no finding as to his right to the possession. For this reason, the judgment is not supported by the findings."

See, also, Banning v. Marleau, 133 Cal. 485; Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 573; Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532.

Such ruling would seem to settle the question here involved, were it not for the intimation contained in the case of Harris v. Smith, 132 Cal. 316, to which attention has been heretofore directed, and which is to the effect that where right of possession is shown in the plaintiff on a certain day, and on which day the plaintiff was wrongfully dispossessed by the defendant, a cause of action is stated "arising on the day named, which continues until it is affirmatively shown to have been extinguished."

In the instant case no question arises as to the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint. The findings, after showing plaintiff's equitable ownership and her actual physical possession of the auto, are:

> "That the said automobile was taken out of her custody on the 30th day of November, 1921, plaintiff's husband having deserted plaintiff on or about October 28, 1921, and absconded from the state of California, by defendant W. A. Shay, as sheriff, who acted at the instance and request of defendant R. B. Wilson, and that such taking of the said automobile from the custody of plaintiff was wrongful and without right."

Following the rule, as laid down in Harris v. Smith, supra, it would therefore appear that the findings with respect to plaintiff's right of possession of the automobile support the judgment.

[5] Appellants also urge the defense of estoppel. The court found that defendant Wilson relied upon the appearance of ownership of the automobile in plaintiff's said husband, which was created by virtue of the registration of the automobile and the registration certificate in the name of plaintiff's husband (which registration certificate was exhibited to defendant Wilson), coupled with the additional fact that plaintiff's husband apparently had the use and control of the automobile, and that in consequence thereof defendant Wilson sold the diamond to plaintiff's husband and extended credit to him without any information or knowledge that plaintiff claimed to have or had any interest whatsoever in the automobile. The court further found "that the said plaintiff knew that said automobile was registered in the name of her said husband, E. J. Sidney, and made no protest thereto, and at no time made any effort to secure the registration thereof in her own name," although she had no knowledge regarding the sale of the diamond to her husband by defendant Wilson, nor ever in any manner ratified or approved the purchase thereof.

It is a maxim of jurisprudence that, if one of two innocent persons must necessarily be damaged because of the act of some third person, if it also appear that one of such innocent persons was blamable in that he placed the power in the hands of the third person to commit the wrong through which such injury was suffered, such innocent person must bear the loss. Section 3543, Civ. Code. The facts of this case as heretofore outlined clearly present a basis for the application of the rule announced in the case of McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341, that—

> "Where the true owner holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of, or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against them the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the conveyance."

In volume 10, p. 641, of California Jurisprudence, the foregoing rule is restated and accompanied by a large list of California cases affirming the doctrine. That the doctrine of estoppel may be invoked where a wife knowingly permits her husband to deal with her personal property as his own, and will prevent her from asserting her ownership therein, as against persons who have extended credit to her husband in reliance upon his apparent ownership of the property, see 21 Corpus Juris, 1179, where, in support of the rule, the following cases, among others, are cited: Norris v. McCanna (C. C.) 29 Fed. 757; Locklin v. Davis, 71 Vt. 321, 45 Atl. 224; Boise Butcher Co. v. Anixdale, 26 Idaho, 480, 144 Pac. 337; Brashear v. Crews, 131 Ark. 593, 199 S. W. 386; McClain v. Abshire, 63 Mo. App. 333; Miller, Watt & Co. v. Mercer, 70 Iowa, 166, 150 N. W. 694; Hamlen v. Bennett, 52 N. J. Eq. 70, 27 Atl. 651; Leete v. State Bank, 115 Mo. 184, 21 S. W. 788. It would, therefore appear from a consideration of the foregoing statement of facts and law that appellants' contention as to the estoppel of plaintiff herein should be sustained.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered. It is further ordered that on the findings the superior court order judgment to be entered in favor of defendants.

ARNHEIM v. FIREMEN'S INS. CO. OF NEWARK, N. J. (Civ. 2748, Sac. 3701.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—No inference can prevail over express findings of trial court.

In appeal on judgment roll alone every intendment is in favor of judgment or order appealed from, and if error does not affirmatively appear it will be sustained if there is any possible ground on which to do so, and hence no inference that insurer did not consent to transfer of interest by insured's cotenant by indorsement of fire policy could arise from fact that copy of policy attached to complaint did not contain such indorsement, where court expressly found that allegations of insurer's answer were untrue.

2. Trial 🔑395(1)—Finding, though not commended, held sufficient.

Finding that all affirmative allegations in answer were untrue except as they are shown by complaint and as specifically found, though not commended, held sufficient under facts of case.

On Rehearing.

3. Appeal and error 🔑533(1)—Trial court's opinion is not part of record on appeal.

On appeal on judgment roll alone, trial court's opinion is no part of record and appellate court must look to judgment roll alone to ascertain facts.

On Petition for Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Presumed findings of fact sustained by evidence in absence of bill of exceptions or transcript.

In absence of bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript, Supreme Court must presume findings of fact were sustained by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Felice C. Arnheim against the Firemen's Insurance Company of Newark, N. J. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward Myers, of San Francisco, and Duard F. Geis, of Willows, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that at all times therein mentioned the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in a certain building; that on the 11th day of October, 1920, Carrie L. Kahn was the owner of the other half interest; that on that day the defendant "executed and delivered to plaintiff and said Carrie L. Kahn, its certain policy of fire insurance * * * by which said defendant did insure plaintiff and said Carrie L. Kahn for the term of one year from the 1st day of November, 1920, to the 1st day of November, 1921, against all loss or damage by fire, except as in said policy provided, to an amount not exceeding $3,000 on the property" aforesaid; that "on the 11th day of June, 1921, the property * * * was damaged by fire to the extent and amount of $7,987.72"; that "on or about the 18th day of April, 1921, the said Carrie L. Kahn, * * * without the knowledge of plaintiff, sold and conveyed her said one-half interest" in the property. It is then alleged that due proofs of loss were made to the satisfaction of defendant, but that defendant failed and refused to pay the same, and that the proportion of plaintiff's loss for which defendant is liable to her, by reason of her ownership of a half interest in the property, is the sum of $1,196.80, the property having been insured in another company as well as defendant. A copy of the insurance policy was attached to the complaint. The policy contained the following provision:

> "Unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto this company shall not be liable for loss or damage occurring * * * while the interest in, title to or possession of the subject of insurance is changed excepting: (1) By the death of the insured; (2) a change of occupancy of building without material increase of hazard; and (3) transfer by one or more several copartners or co-owners to others."

In addition to the denial of certain allegations of the complaint, the answer sets up several provisions of the policy, including that above quoted, and alleges that Carrie L. Kahn conveyed her half interest in the property to some one other than plaintiff; "that no agreement or consent of defendant to the foregoing was indorsed upon or added to said policy and that the same thereby became void;" that "defendant at all times after the occurrence of said loss claimed that no liability as to said insured or either of them under said policy existed." There were other affirmative allegations contained in the answer, but they are not material to the determination of this appeal.

The cause came on regularly for trial, but no one appeared for defendant. Evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, and findings were filed and judgment entered in her favor as prayed for in the complaint. The defendant prosecutes this appeal on the judgment roll alone.

In so far as material here, the court found as follows: "I. That all the allegations and averments of the plaintiff's complaint herein are true. II. That all the denials of the defendant in its answer to the complaint herein are untrue. III. That all the affirmative allegations set forth and contained in said answer of the defendant are untrue, except as the same appear by and are shown in the complaint herein; and except that it is true that the defendant at all times after the occurrence of the loss referred to in said complaint claimed that no liability as to the insured, or either of them, under the policy set forth in the complaint existed."

It is admitted by the pleadings, being alleged by both parties, that Carrie L. Kahn had parted with her interest in the property insured before the damage thereto by fire. The complaint is silent as to whether the defendant consented to such transfer and the answer affirmatively alleges "that no agreement or consent of defendant" to the transfer "was indorsed upon or added to said policy." The burden of proving this affirmative allegation was on defendant. 19 Cyc. 936; McEwen v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 172 Cal. 6, 155 Pac. 86; Rossini v. Saint Paul Fire, etc., Ins. Co., 182 Cal. 415, 188 Pac. 564; Atlas Fire Ins. Co. v. Malone, 99 Ark. 428, 138 S. W. 962, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 210, and note, p. 212.

[1] The court found that all the affirmative allegations of the answer, with certain exceptions of which this is not one, are untrue. Appellant contends that it sufficiently appears "that the insurance company did not consent to such transfer by indorsement on the policy, since the copy of the policy attached to the complaint did not contain such an indorsement." This might be true in the absence of a finding to the contrary, but no such inference can prevail over the express finding that defendant's allegation is untrue. The complaint does not allege that the copy of the policy attached thereto contains the indorsements thereon.

> "In an appeal on the judgment roll alone every intendment possible is in favor of the judgment or order appealed from, and if error does not affirmatively appear, it will be sustained, if there is any possible ground on which it can be sustained." Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 560, 174 Pac. 903, 906.

The foregoing rule is specially applicable to this case because of defendant's failure to appear at the trial or offer any proof of the facts alleged in its answer.

[2] It is contended that the omnibus finding, "that all the affirmative allegations set forth and contained in said answer of the defendant are untrue, except as the same appear by, and are shown in the complaint herein," and except as specifically found, is insufficient to support the judgment. In support of this contention appellant cites Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125; Pinheiro v. Bettencourt, 17 Cal. App. 111, 118 Pac. 941; Hall v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. App. 743, 211 Pac. 853; Imperial Water Co. No. 1 v. Imperial Irr. Dist. (Cal. App.) 217 Pac. 88; Stampfli v. Stampfli, 53 Cal. App. 126, 199 Pac. 829; McAuliffe v. McAuliffe, 53 Cal. App. 352, and Turner v. Turner, 187 Cal. 632, 203 Pac. 109. Of the findings condemned in the foregoing cases, that in Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co. is most nearly like the one here under consideration. It was as follows:

> "That all the allegations of defendant's answer in said action, so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of said complaint, are not true."

To determine whether one allegation is inconsistent with another may be a difficult problem, involving questions both of law and of fact upon which reasonable men may differ, and therefore it cannot be known what allegations of the answer the trial judge may have considered inconsistent with those of the complaint. The same difficulty is not encountered in determining what allegations of the answer "appear by and are shown in the complaint." The question is easily determined in this case. The only affirmative allegations of the answer which appear in the complaint are of certain provisions of the policy, which is set forth in full by the complaint, and that Carrie L. Kahn had conveyed her interest in the property prior to the fire, which fact is expressly alleged in the complaint. The terms of the policy and the fact of such transfer being admitted by the pleadings, no finding thereon was necessary. From what has been said, it clearly appears that the objection to the sufficiency of the findings is purely technical. While the finding is far from being a model, and is not to be commended, yet, under the particular facts of this case, there is no uncertainty as to the meaning thereof, and it would be unjust to put plaintiff to the expense of a second trial by reason of a technical defect not affecting the substantial rights of the defendant, after it has failed to avail itself of the opportunity to present any defense it may have at the first trial. What has been said applies with equal force to all the affirmative allegations of the answer, which are not contained in the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: PLUMMER, J.; HART, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [3] In appellant's petition for a rehearing it is said that—

> "The case was * * * submitted in the court below upon the admitted facts shown by the plaintiffs and a stipulation of facts."

The opinion of the trial court is appended to the petition. The following language appears in the opinion:

> "In due course a trial was had in which the plaintiff introduced certain evidence, and thereafter a continuance was had and a stipulation filed of record in this case, and the matter submitted to the court for decision. * * * The court * * * has read with marked interest the very voluminous and able briefs filed by counsel upon each side."

The opinion of the trial court is no part of the record on appeal, and this court must look to the judgment roll alone to ascertain the facts. The judgment, which was signed by the trial judge, recites:

> "This cause came on regularly for trial on the 29th day of January, 1922, Duard F. Geis, Esq., appearing as counsel for plaintiff, and no counsel appearing for the defendant. * * * Evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, and the evidence being closed, the cause was submitted to the court for consideration and decision."

There is nothing in the record to show that the defendant appeared at the trial or that the case was submitted upon stipulated facts. It is not important here, however, whether the defendant appeared at the trial, or whether the facts were stipulated, since the stipulation, if any, is not in the record, because the findings are such as to entitle plaintiff to the judgment rendered.

It is conceded in the petition that the burden was on defendant to show a breach of the condition against a transfer of title, but it is contended that, a transfer of the cotenant's title being admitted, the burden was on plaintiff to show that defendant consented to such transfer. The condition, however, was not that no transfer of title should be made, but that no such transfer should be made without defendant's consent indorsed upon or added to the policy. Mere proof of a transfer of title does not establish a breach, but it must further appear that the defendant did not consent thereto in the manner provided in the policy. This question of burden of proof, like that first considered, is of no practical importance, because the defendant alleged that it did not so consent and the court found that such allegation is untrue. The appeal being upon the judgment roll alone, it must be presumed that there was evidence to support the findings.

The petition is denied.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a transfer and hearing by this court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District, is denied.

[4] We neither approve nor disapprove the statement in the opinion to the effect that the burden of proof was on the defendant to prove that no agreement or consent of defendant to the transfer of interest was indorsed upon or added to the policy. That statement is unnecessary to the decision, for the reason that, in the absence of a bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript, we must presume that the findings of fact were sustained by the evidence.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward Myers, of San Francisco, and Duard F. Geis, of Willows, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff was given judgment, on an insurance policy issued by defendant, for damage by fire to the building insured. The facts, except as to parties and amounts recovered, are identical with those involved in Arnheim v. Firemen's Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., 227 Pac. 676. The appeal was submitted on the briefs in that case.

For the reasons stated in the opinion in that case the judgment herein is affirmed.

HOLLENBECK v. LUNDERVILLE et al. (Civ. 2723.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, July 17, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Findings of trial court supported by evidence not disturbed because of evidence supporting contrary finding.

Where the findings of the trial court are supported by evidence, the appellate court cannot disturb them merely because of the existence of evidence to sustain a contrary finding.

2. Sales 🔑28—Writing held to constitute binding contract, notwithstanding omission to have notes for deferred payments executed as provided in writing.

Writing containing complete description of property, terms of payment, warranty by seller, and covenants as to what was to be done by respective parties, signed and executed by them, held binding contract of sale, notwithstanding failure of seller to require of buyer execution of notes, for deferred payments in consonance with clause to that effect in writing; giving of such notes merely being additional evidence of an existing obligation.

3. New trial 🔑104(1)—Denial of motion, based on newly discovered evidence merely cumulative, held not prejudicial error.

Denial of motion for new trial, based upon newly discovered evidence, held not prejudicial error, where affidavits adduced in support of motion showed merely cumulative evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by G. J. Hollenbeck against W. H. Lunderville and others. From a judgment against him, named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below against the defendant Lunderville, and from this judgment said defendant appeals.

The action instituted and prosecuted by the plaintiff is based upon a certain contract entered into between the defendants and the Holt Manufacturing Company of the city of Stockton, for the purchase of a certain caterpillar tractor, and assigned to the plaintiff, which contract is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Deliveries are subject to the acts or the demands of the government of the United States of America.

"Caterpillar.
"Reg. Trade-Mark U. S.
"Pat. Off.

"Territory: Block 9.

"Shipped Oct. 22, 1919, traction engine No. 20839, order No. G-41421

"Car No W.P.2050 $5,375.00.

"Forty-Five.

"The Holt Manufacturing Company, a corporation, Stockton, California: Manufacture and ship to the undersigned one 'Caterpillar' standard gasoline traction engine motor forty-five H. P. Four cylinders 6x7. Width tract 28.

"Equipped with canopy top and side curtains two speeds forward. Stationary attachment. Lighting system.

"Consign to Johnson Bros. & Lunderville. To be shipped by S. P. to Sacramento station, on or about Oct. 23, 1919, free on board cars or boat at Stockton, California, U. S. A., for which the undersigned agrees to pay fifty-three hundred seventy-five and no/100 dollars as follows: One thousand two hundred fifty and 00/100 dollars * * * with the order; one thousand two hundred fifty and 00/100 dollars * * * 1 month after date of shipment; six hundred and 00/100 dollars 3 months after date of shipment; six hundred and 00/100 dollars 6 months after date of shipment; six hundred and 00/100 dollars 9 months after date of shipment; balance 12 months after date of shipment—with interest from one month after date of shipment until paid, at the rate of eight (8) per cent. per annum.

"Subject to a discount of five (5) per cent. for all cash date of shipment.

"All payments to be made in gold coin, San Francisco or New York exchange, to the Holt Manufacturing Company (a corporation), at its office, Stockton, California.

"Deferred payments as above recited to be evidenced by notes and lease made, executed, and delivered to the Holt Manufacturing Company in the form required by said company on arrival or delivery of said 'Caterpillar' traction engine at destination designated above, but no such note or lease shall be deemed as in payment until the same shall have been actually paid in lawful money.

"Warranty: The 'Caterpillar' traction engine hereinabove specified is warranted to deliver 45 brake horse power, and do the work of 22 average horses under reasonable conditions, at sea level. If inside of six days from date of unloading at destination the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine should prove incapable of meeting this warranty, the undersigned shall give notice, by registered letter or telegram, to the Holt Manufacturing Company at Stockton, California, U. S. A., stating wherein the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine fails, and shall allow a reasonable time for the company to send a man to remedy the cause, if any, the undersigned rendering necessary and friendly assistance. If the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine cannot then be made to meet, substantially, the above warranty, the undersigned shall return the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine f. o. b. cars or boat at shipping point where received, and the Holt Manufacturing Company shall return all notes or money given in payment except freight charges one way, which, when done, shall be a complete settlement of the entire transaction. Failure to give notice as above, or the continued possession or operation of the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine beyond the period of six days, above mentioned, shall be conclusive evidence that the said 'Caterpillar' traction engine fills the warranty.

"Should any parts prove defective within six months from date of delivery, through defective material or inferior workmanship, replacements shall be made by the Holt Manufacturing Company, f. o. b. cars or boat at Stockton, California, U. S. A. The parts claimed to be defective are to be returned prepaid to the Holt Manufacturing Company at its factory in Stockton, California, U. S. A., for inspection, and if found defective as claimed, the charge if made for the new parts shall be remitted.

"It is hereby expressly understood and agreed that the Holt Manufacturing Company shall not in any case or under any circumstances be held liable or responsible for any damages or personal injuries suffered or sustained in the use, operation, or handling of said 'Caterpillar' traction engine or otherwise, no matter how caused or occasioned; nor for any implied warranties; nor for any loss of profits, expenses, or damages resulting to the undersigned by reason of any delays or nonperformance of said 'Caterpillar' traction engine, or from any other causes whatsoever; that all such claims are hereby specifically waived; and that the liability of the Holt Manufacturing Company shall be limited to the warranty as to horse power and to the replacements of such parts shown to be defective under the warranty as above made, and then only in the manner and to the extent hereinabove specified.

"And it is hereby expressly understood and agreed that until the Holt Manufacturing Company does part with the title thereto, as herein provided, the undersigned will keep said 'Caterpillar' traction engine in first class condition, good order, and repair, and will not remove, transport, ship, drive, or take said 'Caterpillar' traction engine or cause or suffer the same to be removed, transported, shipped, driven, or taken from the state to which the same is originally shipped by the Holt Manufacturing Company, without the consent of the Holt Manufacturing Company first had and obtained in writing.

"And it is understood and agreed that the Holt Manufacturing Company does not part with the title to said 'Caterpillar' traction engine, but retains and holds the title and ownership thereof absolutely, until all said deferred payments or notes are fully paid; that time is of the essence of this agreement, and, it being expressly understood that any default in any of the deferred payments or notes, or any of the terms or conditions hereof, shall, at the option of the Holt Manufacturing Company, cause and render all payments or notes to become immediately due and payable; that should the undersigned make default in any of said payments, terms, or conditions, then the Holt Manufacturing Company may at their option, and without notice, terminate this agreement, and with or without legal process take and retain said 'Caterpillar' traction engine wherever it may be situated, and all moneys, paid by the undersigned prior to such default shall be retained by the Holt Manufacturing Company as compensation for the privilege of using said 'Caterpillar' traction engine by the undersigned prior to such default; and should the Holt Manufacturing Company by reason of such default incur any expense, the undersigned agrees to reimburse them the sum total of all such expenses, including reasonable counsel fees.

"The undersigned agrees to pay and discharge all city, county, and state taxes that may be assessed against said 'Caterpillar' traction engine, and also all statutory liens upon said 'Caterpillar' traction engine.

"And it is further understood that no representative or agent has any power to make any additions to or vary the terms and conditions hereof. This offer shall not be binding until it is submitted to and duly accepted by the Holt Manufacturing Company at its office in Stockton, California, U. S. A.; and that when so accepted it shall become a California contract and construed in accordance with the laws of the state of California.

"I herewith declare that I have carefully read the foregoing instrument, and am acquainted with its contents, which I hereby accept.

"The Holt Manufacturing Company, Inc.,
"By [Signed] ———, Treasurer."

It appears from the testimony that Walter J. Talbot was the district agent for the Holt Manufacturing Company for the Sacramento district, and that the plaintiff was the special agent acting with him in the selling of tractors. It appears from the transcript that prior to any negotiations concerning the tractor in question, the plaintiff had rented from the Johnson estate 160 acres of land situated in what is known as the by-pass district; that this land was unbroken and was then covered by tules; that at the time the negotiations were first taken up the defendant Lunderville did not have a sufficient acreage of land to justify the purchase of the tractor in question; and that the plaintiff proposed leasing the 160 acres just referred to. On the part of the appellant it is contended that the plaintiff proposed to lease him the 160 acres of land and to sell him a tractor of the kind and capacity mentioned in the agreement set out herein, that he (the plaintiff) would purchase the tractor from the Holt Manufacturing Company, and that the defendant Lunderville was to pay for the tractor out of the proceeds of the crops to be raised upon the premises leased by him from the plaintiff. This contention of appellant is controverted by the plaintiff. The appellant, to support his contention, introduced evidence to the effect that the plaintiff came to his residence near Courtland in the county of Sacramento and there agreed to lease the premises to him upon the terms set out in the transcript and also to make sale of the tractor as above stated, and further testified that at that time the plaintiff produced a blank contract for the purchase of the tractor from the Holt Manufacturing Company and asked the appellant to sign the same, stating that, if the purchase were made in the name of the appellant, the plaintiff would be enabled to obtain a commission for the sale. On the part of the plaintiff there is testimony to the effect that the contract set out herein was signed in the city of Sacramento, was all written by Walter J. Talbot, the district agent of the Holt Manufacturing Company and was signed by the appellant and the defendants, J. C. Johnson and H. C. Johnson, in the presence of said Walter J Talbot; that the plaintiff was not there at the time and was not present during any of the time when the contract was prepared by Talbot, read over to the defendants, and signed by them. Upon the question as to whether Lunderville was acting as the agent of the plaintiff in making purchase of the tractor and whether there was any such agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant Lunderville, as alleged by the defendant, the testimony is in very sharp conflict. The finding of the court is to the effect that no such agreement was ever had. It is further contended by the respondent in this action that testimony as to whether there was or was not such an agreement is not admissible to vary the terms of the written contract. On the part of the appellant it is urged that such testimony went only to the consideration and is admissible under the rule announced and followed in the cases of Tidewater Southern Railway Co. v. Harney, 32 Cal. App. 253, 162 Pac. 664, Robson v. O'Toole, 60 Cal. App. 711, 214 Pac. 278, and Fuller v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 Pac. 1027. The trial court, upon conflicting testimony, having decided that there was no such an agreement, it becomes wholly immaterial as to whether the testimony relating thereto was or was not admissible. The finding of the trial court on this question is in these words:

> "* * * The only understanding or contract or agreement between the parties was and is evidenced by the written contract referred to in plaintiff's complaint. Said tractor when delivered was not delivered to defendant Lunderville or the other defendants as the property of plaintiff or for plaintiff's use or benefit subject to the alleged contract set forth in defendant's answer or otherwise; that said tractor was delivered under the terms and conditions of said contract referred to in plaintiff's complaint."

[1, 2] It is further found that the defendant Lunderville was not, nor were either of the defendants, acting as the representatives or agents of the plaintiff. This disposes of the question as to the agreement alleged by the appellant to have been orally entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant Lunderville concerning the terms and conditions of the purchase of the tractor in question. While the testimony on this subject is all set out in the respective briefs of the parties, and much argument based thereon, this court is bound by the findings of the trial court so long as there appears to be sufficient testimony supporting the findings. There is sufficient testimony in the transcript to have supported a finding to the contrary; yet if the trial court believed the testimony of the plaintiff and of his witnesses, the findings entered by the trial court are sufficiently supported, and we are not at liberty to disturb them simply because there is testimony which would have supported a contrary conclusion. The main argument of appellant is founded upon the theory that the writing executed by the defendants and the Holt Manufacturing Company did not constitute a contract and was only a preliminary offer, in that certain additional papers were provided for and never executed, to wit, notes evidencing deferred payments and a lease. The writing set out herein contains the following paragraph:

> "Deferred payments as above recited to be evidenced by notes and lease made, executed, and delivered to the Holt Manufacturing Company in the form required by said company on arrival or delivery of said 'Caterpillar' traction engine at destination designated above, but no such note or lease shall be deemed as in payment until the same shall have been actually paid in lawful money."

No notes evidencing the deferred payments were ever made, nor was any lease executed or delivered. It is the theory of the appellant that, by reason of the omission to have notes executed evidencing the deferred payments and a lease signed by the defendants, the instrument heretofore set out never became a binding contract.

An examination of the instrument shows that, in and of itself, it contained a full and complete description of the property, the terms of payment, and warranty by the seller, a reservation of title in the seller until payment should have been fully made and completed, a statement of all of the rights of the respective parties and covenants as to what was to be performed by the respective parties, properly signed and executed by the respective parties, as fully and completely fixing their legal rights as though the notes and lease referred to had been executed and delivered. Nothing additional was to be done by the Holt Manufacturing Company, and no additional rights were to be given or acquired by the defendants. The property was fully described, the terms of payment were fixed, each party could ascertain from the instrument signed by them all of these facts. The paragraph which we have quoted simply provided for giving to the Holt Manufacturing Company additional evidence of the amount of the purchase price and of the title or property interest conveyed to the purchaser and retained by the seller. Under such circumstances, we do not see very well how it can be held that the instrument in question did not become a valid, binding and subsisting contract the very moment it was accepted by the Holt Manufacturing Company. The minds of the parties had met as to the property in question and all the terms and conditions in relation thereto; the fact that the Holt Manufacturing Company, or seller, was entitled to demand some additional evidence of the contract did not in any wise change the character of the contract or prevent the minds of the parties meeting as to its terms and conditions. The property was delivered and at the time of the delivery, according to the contract, the Holt Manufacturing Company might, if it so elected, have demanded additional evidence. This it appears it did not do. This evidence would simply have been supplemental, and we do not see how in any particular it was intended to change any of the terms of the contract which we have set forth herein. This being the case, we think the argument of the appellant based thereon faulty in its premises. We have no quarrel with any of the authorities cited by the appellant, but all those cases have to do with mere proposals or circumstances where an instrument has been orally agreed to be executed or the instrument signed is incomplete and shows a manifest intention of the parties that the minds of the purchaser and seller had not yet met in agreement. The paper signed by the defendant before it had been signed by the Holt Manufacturing Company was not a mere offer. It contained a full statement of all the terms and conditions of the proposed purchase and sale, and also contained a stipulation that upon acceptance by the Holt Manufacturing Company it should become a valid contract. The language thereof is as follows:

> "This offer shall not be binding until it is submitted to and duly accepted by the Holt Manufacturing Company at its office in Stockton, California, U S. A.; and that when so accepted it shall become a California contract and constructed (construed) in accordance with the laws of the state of California."

[3] There is no intimation anywhere that a more formal contract is to be executed. It appears clear that the instrument which we have set out is the contract and the only contract within the contemplation of the parties; that the payments provided for should be evidenced also by promissory notes could in no wise change or alter the terms or conditions of the contract. This is true of any lease that might have been executed. It has been frequently held that, where parties make an agreement which they intend shall be binding from the time it is made, effect will be given to it from that time, though they also intend that it shall be superseded by a more formal written agreement. 2 Wharton on Contracts, 645; Blaney v. Hoke, 14 Ohio St. 292; Long v. Needham, 37 Mont. 408, 96 Pac. 731. The courts uniformly hold that the cause of action on a note for a debt does not discharge the debt unless it is expressly so agreed. In the instrument in question, the contrary is expressly provided for. The authorities are so numerous that we need cite but one which states the general principle. Brewster v. Bours, 8 Cal. 501. The debt was created when the contract was accepted and the tractor delivered, and the giving of a note thereafter would simply be evidencing an obligation already existing. The affidavits presented to the trial court upon the defendant's motion for a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence set forth only that which was cumulative, and we do not think the trial court committed any prejudicial error in denying the defendant's motion based thereon.

The findings of the trial court being supported by the testimony, as we have hereinbefore stated, and viewing the contract as we do, it follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

MARKART v. ZEIMER et al. (Civ. 2679.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1924.)

1. Trial 🔑252(8)—Instructions in action for malpractice without evidence held erroneous.

In an action against surgeons for malpractice, instructions submitting issues as to whether defendants in operating for hernia closed inguinal canal so tightly that it interfered with action of nerves or stopped flow of blood to testicle and whether when wound commenced healing, inner walls grew fast to bowels, held error, where there was no evidence that either of such conditions had resulted from operation.

2. Trial 🔑251(8)—Submission of issue of negligence in performing operation held error where complaint charged trespass.

In an action against surgeons for malpractice, where complaint charged defendants with a trespass in removing plaintiff's testicle, submission of the issue of degree of skill and care exercised by defendants in performing operation was error.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑14(4)—Degree of skill and care required.

All that is required of a physician in performing an operation is that he have degree of skill ordinarily possessed by reputable physicians or surgeons practicing in his locality.

4. Physicians and surgeons 🔑24(2)—Complaint held to state cause of action for removal of testicle.

In an action against surgeons for malpractice, complaint held to state a cause of action for removal of plaintiff's testicle without his consent.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Verdict based on proper and improper issues, in which it cannot be told to what degree they figured in finding, cannot stand.

A verdict cannot be permitted to stand, where a case is submitted on proper and improper issues, and it cannot be told upon which issue verdict was based, or as to what degree they both figure in finding.

6. Physicians and surgeons 🔑15—Physician's admission of "misoperation" and "wrong operation" held not negligence.

Admissions of physicians performing an operation upon patient that operation was a "misoperation" and a "wrong operation" held not to show that operation was not performed with reasonable care, or that physicians did not possess and use that reasonable degree of learning and skill ordinarily possessed by their profession in good standing, practicing in their vicinity.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Joseph Markart against Irving S. Zeimer and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

George F. McNoble, of Stockton, and Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sawyer & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for malpractice growing out of the employment of defendants by the plaintiff to perform a surgical operation on him for the cure or removal of a hernia in the region of the right groin.

The complaint was in two counts. The first count charges negligence in these particulars:

> "That the said defendants then and there so negligently, carelessly and unskillfully performed said operation in and upon plaintiff in this, that after they had made an incision, cut into and opened the body of plaintiff that they closed the inguinal canal through which the cord containing the blood vessels and nerves passed connecting the right testicle with the rest of the body so tight and close that it interfered with and stopped the circulation of the blood and the action of the nerves between the said right testicle and other portions of the body, and that they so further performed said operation in such a negligent, careless and unskillful manner that when the wound caused by said incision and operation commenced healing and did heal, the inner walls adhered and grew fast to the bowels of said plaintiff, and the said defendants further so negligently and carelessly handled and controlled the instrument with which they made said incision, and performed said operation, that an incision was made in the right testicle of plaintiff with a sharp instrument, thereby seriously and dangerously wounding and injuring him."

The second count exactly recharged these acts of negligence, and in addition charged that, at a later operation undertaken to relieve plaintiff, the defendants without plaintiff's consent and against his expressed wish and will removed plaintiff's right testicle. The verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff, and from the resulting judgment this appeal is taken. At the trial no evidence was offered tending in any substantial way to show that defendants in performing their surgical operation closed the inguinal canal so tightly that it interfered with the action of nerves or stopped the flow of blood to plaintiff's right testicle, nor was any such evidence offered or given showing that defendants so performed the operation that when the wound commenced healing "the inner walls adhered and grew fast to the bowels of" plaintiff.

[1, 2] Yet these issues were definitely submitted to the jury by the court in giving its instructions. By instruction "H" the jury was told that "if you find from all the evidence that the defendants or either of them, in operating upon the plaintiff for hernia * * * closed the inguinal canal in the plaintiff so tight and close that the natural circulation of blood or the natural action of the nerves were stopped or interfered with, between plaintiff's right testicle and the rest of his body," then that their verdict should be for the plaintiff. By instruction "I" the jury was told that if they found "from all the evidence and as instructed, that the defendants or either of them in operating upon plaintiff for hernia" from lack of skill and care did so in such a way that "the inner walls of plaintiff's abdomen adhered and grew fast to the bowels of said plaintiff" then that they must find for plaintiff. As stated there was no evidence of either of these conditions or of their having resulted from defendants' work in performing the operation. The submission of these issues to the jury without evidence to support them was error. By instruction "D" the question of the degree of skill and care exercised by defendants in removing plaintiff's testicle was submitted to the jury. This was without the issues. The complaint charged the defendants with a trespass in removing the testicle without his consent and against his expressed direction. No charge was made that the work of removing it was carelessly or unskillfully done. To submit this question to the jury was error.

[3] The instruction that a "physician is responsible for an injury done to a patient through the want of proper skill and care of his assistant, if any," is also incorrect in requiring of a surgeon "proper" skill and care in the performance of an operation. All that is required of him is that he have the degree of skill ordinarily possessed by reputable physicians or surgeons practicing in his locality. Hesler v. Cal. Hospital Company, 178 Cal. 764, 174 Pac. 654.

[4] The contention is made by appellants that the second count of the complaint states no cause of action for the removal of plaintiff's testicle without his consent.

[5] We think that it does and that if this issue alone had been submitted to the jury a finding upon it in favor of plaintiff might have been sustained. But it was submitted in connection with other issues which should not have been submitted. As therefore it cannot be told upon which issue the verdict was based or as to what degree they both figure in the finding, the verdict cannot be permitted to stand. These errors will necessitate a retrial of the case.

Other questions presented by the record may be briefly discussed in so far as they may arise when the case is again tried.

The complaint charged, in addition to the matters about which no evidence was offered, that the defendants in performing the operation on plaintiff did so so negligently "that an incision was made in the right testicle of plaintiff with a sharp instrument, thereby seriously and dangerously wounding and injuring him." Little was made of this specific charge and the only evidence in relation to it was that plaintiff had felt it, and that one of the defendants had admitted the cutting.

The great bulk of plaintiff's testimony was that in performing the first operation the defendants operated so unskillfully and negligently that they cut the spermatic cord or artery which nourished and which supplied circulation to plaintiff's right testicle, by reason of whch it died and had to be removed. This does not appear to be within the issues. Plaintiff contends that the testicle and the cord or artery which connects it with the body are but parts of one physical process and that under the charge that the testicle was wounded he could properly prove that the cord was cut. Any question on this point can so easily be removed by an amendment to the complaint that we need not further discuss it.

The evidence which plaintiff offered upon this point tended to show that plaintiff was afflicted with a hernia on the right side in the region of the groin; that it had existed for about two years; that it was not bothering him any at the time of the operation; and that it had never given him any trouble. After the operation plaintiff's right spermatic artery or spermatic cord was found to be severed, under conditions from which it might properly have been inferred that it had been cut by defendants, while performing the operation. Plaintiff's case is founded upon the claim that the operation was negligently performed. This negligence must be made to appear from the evidence in the case. The facts must establish such a condition as would warrant the jury in saying that as a matter of common knowledge the cutting of the cord complained of was an act of negligence, or it must be shown by expert testimony that this act resulted from the failure of the defendants to possess and use that degree of care and skill ordinarily possessed and used by physicians and surgeons in good standing practicing in the same locality. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 Pac. 642; Hesler v. Cal. Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 Pac. 654; Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 Pac. 128; Ewing v. Goode (C. C.) 78 Fed. 442; Loudon v. Scott, 58 Mont. 645, 194 Pac. 488, 12 A. L. R. 1487, and note.

Expert evidence is almost universally required in such cases as this. See cases above, also Carson v. Jackson, 281 Fed. 411, 52 App. D. C. 51. But none was offered at the trial. Plaintiff insists that the jury had a right to find without expert testimony that for a surgeon, employed to operate upon what appeared to be a simple hernia, to cut the spermatic cord or artery was so palpably inexcusable as to disclose negligence in itself; that the injury was so unrelated to the operation and so outside of the thing the surgeons were employed to do, that, as a matter of common knowledge, the jury might find that the cutting was unskillful and negligent. Without citing these cases he invokes the principle announced in Miles v. Hoffman (Wash.) 221 Pac. 316; Cornwell v. Sleicher, 119 Wash. 573, 205 Pac. 1059; Hickerson v. Neely (Ky.) 54 S. W. 842; Evans v. Roberts, 172 Iowa, 653, 154 N. W. 923; Benson v. Dean, 232 N. Y. 52, 133 N. E. 125; Evans v. Munro (R. I.) 83 Atl. 82.

As to whether or not this case comes within the rule of these cases, or as to whether or not the plaintiff's contention in this particular is sound, we make no decision, as on another trial the evidence may be different, or the plaintiff may see fit to put the matter beyond question by producing expert evidence. It might be observed in passing that by his instructions plaintiff did not ask to have his case submitted to the jury on this theory.

[6] Plaintiff's chief contention, however, is that the absence of expert testimony in this case is supplied by evidence of admissions of the defendant given at the trial. The testimony as to what these admissions were, can be briefly stated without omitting any of their substance. The plaintiff testified to a conversation had with defendant Dr. Heppner after the operation in which Dr. Heppner "said to me they had a little trouble by the operation, and injured the cord, but heal all right. If you lose a testicle, one testicle just as good as two." He said that he referred to the spermatic cord. Again the doctor said: "Yes; we had cut or injured the testicle; it heals; it will not hurt me further and will heal up." Continuing, the plaintiff testified that he did not ask them whether they had injured the cord or not. "No; they said it freely, they injured the cord." Question; "Both doctors said that they injured the cord? A. Yes." Again he repeated: "They just said, 'We had a little trouble and injured the cord.'" Asked who said that, he answered: "Dr. Heppner and Dr. Zeimer said, 'We injured the cord, that is we put the injured part back, injured the cord.'" There was other evidence in relation to the tying of the ends of the cord with catgut before returning them to the body and of some matters of detail and apparent aggravation, but not within the pleadings nor of consequence as admissions of lack of skill or care.

A Mrs. Wilkie, a friend of plaintiff, testified to a conversation she had with Dr. Heppner after the operation. To her he said, "Mr. Markart was getting along fine; and further he said that it was a kind of a difficult operation; he said they had some trouble in dissecting, and they injured a cord, he said it would heal up, it would not be of any consequence." This statement was repeated to the witness. "He said again that they injured the cord, and it would heal up."

Another witness, Frank Philippi, testified as to a conversation he had had with Dr. Heppner in which he advised him not to be operated on by any Stockton doctor, and that then, in speaking of the operation on plaintiff, he said: "We made a wrong operation on him." Dr. Heppner said that because of that operation Markart, the plaintiff, had lost his testicle. Continuing he said: "He did not make any statements at all as to why it was removed; he said it was a misoperation, you know."

Giving these statements as testified to by plaintiff and Mrs. Wilkie an implication and a meaning most favorable to the plaintiff, they constituted an admission by the defendants that in performing the operation for hernia, which they were employed to do, the defendants had cut and severed the spermatic cord or artery.

But this adds nothing to plaintiff's case. He had already testified to that fact himself or given evidence from which it might be inferred. What we want to know is whether or not such a mischance is one of the hazards of an operation for hernia such as plaintiff's was, and whether or not, in the exercise of reasonable skill and care as such is ordinarily possessed and exercised by surgeons practicing their profession in the city of Stockton and vicinity, such a cutting or severance would ever occur. The admissions do not go this far.

The admissions testified to by the witness Philippi were likewise insufficient. They related only to Dr. Heppner, and were to the effect that the operation on plaintiff was a "wrong operation." Dr. Heppner "said it was a misoperation, you know." This is not an admission that the operation was carelessly or negligently performed. It is at most an admission that he did not have sufficient skill to perform the operation properly. But it clearly was not an admission that he did not have the degree of skill, care, and learning possessed and used by other surgeons practicing their profession in his locality, and that was all the skill and learning he was called upon to possess. On the contrary, Dr. Heppner impliedly contended that the "wrong operation" was up to the standard of physicians located in his neighborhood, for as part of the very admission testified to by Philippi he advised him "not to be operated on by any Stockton doctor," placing them all in a class with himself and Dr. Zeimer so far as surgical operations were concerned. Dr. Heppner's statement that it was a "misoperation" and a "wrong operation" amounts to no more than an admission that the operation was not properly done, and that is not sufficient to render him liable. Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 Pac. 654. An admission to be sufficient must be an admission of negligence or lack of the skill ordinarily required for the performance of the work undertaken. This "wrong operation" may have been deemed right at the time it was performed. If it was so mistakenly performed as the result of a bona fide judgment by a qualified surgeon, he will not be held liable for the unfortunate results of his mistake. Loudon v. Scott, 58 Mont. 645, 194 Pac. 488, 12 A. L. R. 1487, and note; Carson v. Jackson, 281 Fed. 411, 52 App. D. C. 51; Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 Pac. 654; Staloch v. Holm, 100 Minn. 276, 111 N. W. 264, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 712; Dye v. Corbin, 59 W. Va. 266, 53 S. E. 147; Wells v. Ferry Baker Lumber Co., 57 Wash. 658, 107 Pac. 869, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 426; Coffey v. Tiffany, 192 Mo. App. 455, 182 S. W. 495. For example, an admission by a surgeon that the death of a patient was caused by an anesthetic which he had given him, and that he knew when he administered it that in the weakened condition of the patient it was dangerous to do so, was held insufficient to support a judgment against the physician in Loudon v. Scott, 58 Mont. 645, 194 Pac. 488; see note to this case as reported in 12 A. L. R. 1487. These admissions, therefore, are not admissions that the operation complained of was not performed with reasonable care, or that the defendants did not possess and use that reasonable degree of learning and skill which was ordinarily possessed by the members of their profession in good standing practicing in their vicinity.

As a consequence, while they were competent as evidence of such facts as they admitted, they did not supply the absence of expert testimony in such particulars as expert testimony was otherwise required.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the lower court to permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint in the particulars herein referred to if he should so desire.

Wrongful solicitation of business from employer's customers by employee after termination of employment can be accomplished without express verbal or written request therefor.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Judgment properly affirmed, where contrary finding not compelled by evidence.

Where finding contrary to that made the basis of the trial court's judgment would not have been without support in the evidence, but such contrary finding was not compelled by the evidence, judgment was properly affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action for injunction by the San Francisco Laundry Association against Roland L. Ragon, also known as Roy Ragon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas J. Ledwich, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment denying its application for an injunction to restrain the defendant from soliciting laundry work from plaintiff's customers, who were formerly served by the defendant while he was in the plaintiff's employ as a driver of one of its laundry wagons.

The trial court found that defendant had not at any time solicited any laundry work from any persons who were former customers of plaintiff, and that said defendant did not ask nor request any of the former customers of plaintiff to give their laundry work to him or to any competitor of plaintiff; but that, on the contrary, each and every one of said persons who was a former customer of said plaintiff, and who since the termination of said defendant's employment with plaintiff had been giving her laundry work to defendant, had done so at her own instance and request, and freely and voluntarily on her part, without any solicitation, inducement, or request whatever directly or indirectly by the defendant, or any of his servants, agents, employees, or any person whatever acting in aid of or in concert with him.

The plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, and he testified that he had never in any manner solicited business from the former customers of plaintiff, and, upon being questioned, in detail, about specific customers, he explained in each instance the circumstances under which he had been requested by such customer to call for her laundry work. The plaintiff then called about 20 of its former customers and questioned them as to the circumstances under which each of them had determined to give her laundry work to defendant rather than to plaintiff after defendant had ceased to be in the employ of defendant. Every one of these witnesses testified, emphatically, that the defendant had not asked for the business or made any advances in the matter, but that in each instance the customer had either met defendant on the street or had telephoned to him or had come in contact with him through some unrelated business or social connection, and had freely and voluntarily decided to give him her laundry work, and in each instance the witness testified that she did not desire to do business with the plaintiff, but wished to give her work to the defendant, either because she had known the defendant for a long time or because she was dissatisfied with the service of the plaintiff.

The defendant offered no testimony in the trial court—and there was no need for him to do so—because every particle of testimony offered by the plaintiff supports the findings of the court to the effect that the defendant had not solicited in any manner, nor interfered with, the business of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] We do not agree with the statement that "every particle of testimony offered by the plaintiff supports the findings * * * that the defendant had not solicited * * * the business of the plaintiff." The wrongful solicitation of business can be accomplished without any express verbal or written request therefor. If the trial court had found that such solicitation was made in this case, the finding would not have been without support in the evidence, but such a finding was not compelled by the evidence herein, and the judgment was therefore properly affirmed. The petition for a transfer and hearing by this court is denied.

GOEHRING v. ROGERS et al. (Civ. 4777, S. F. 10734.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—Grant of new trial reversed only for gross abuse of trial court's discretion.

Grant of new trial for insufficiency of evidence will be reversed only for gross abuse of trial court's discretion.

2. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction as to negligence of driver in failing to decrease speed held to encroach on function of jury.

In action for injuries to automobile passenger from collision at street intersection, instruction that, if a careful and prudent driver would have decreased speed prior to entering street intersection, jury should find passenger's driver negligent held to encroach on function of jury, in view of evidence that driver had decreased speed.

3. Trial 🔑191(7)—Instruction as to negligence of automobile driver at street intersection held erroneous as assuming facts in dispute.

Instruction that driver of automobile in which plaintiff was passenger could not excuse excessive speed just prior to collision at street intersection merely because he thought he could thereby avoid accident held erroneous as assuming facts in dispute.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Negligence 🔑140—Instruction on liability of automobile drivers for injuries to passenger of one held correct.

Instruction that, if defendant driving automobile in which plaintiff was passenger was negligent in increasing speed after he saw automobile of codefendant S. approaching street intersection, and such action was sole proximate cause of injury, S. was not liable, even if negligent, if his negligence was not proximate cause of collision, held correct.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑705(11)—Automobile driver liable, if negligence is proximate cause of accident.

That automobile was being driven on left side of road would not of itself make driver liable, unless his negligence was proximate cause of accident, irrespective of whether such proximate cause was direct or indirect.

6. Negligence 🔑61(2)—Automobile driver liable for own negligence as to passenger.

Automobile driver's liability for injuries to passenger from collision depends solely on his own negligence proximately causing or contributing to accident, regardless of whether driver of other automobile was also negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Anna Goehring against J. Blaine Rogers and another. Verdict against defendant Rogers and in favor of the other defendant, and from order granting defendant Rogers a new trial plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

M. F. McCormick and C. M. Ozias, both of Fresno, for appellant Goehring.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and S. P. Coy, all of Fresno, for appellant Stjepovich.

Lindsay & Conley and Arthur Allyn, all of Fresno, for respondent Rogers.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action against the two defendants, charging them with joint negligence in the operation of their respective automobiles resulting in serious injuries to the plaintiff, who at the time was a passenger in the machine driven by the defendant Rogers. The cause was tried before a jury, and the plaintiff had a verdict against the defendant Rogers for $13,250. At the same time the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the other defendant, Frank Stjepovich. The defendant Rogers then moved for a new trial on all the legal grounds, including insufficiency of the evidence, and plaintiff moved for a new trial as to the defendant Stjepovich on errors of law alone. Both motions were granted. The plaintiff then appealed from the order granting a new trial as to the defendant Rogers, and the defendant Stjepovich appealed from the order granting plaintiff a new trial as to him. Both appeals were taken under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by stipulation are presented upon the same record. At this time we will consider the appeal of the plaintiff from the order granting a new trial to Rogers, but will necessarily refer to the other appeal from time to time. To avoid confusion we will refer to the parties before this court as they appeared as plaintiff and defendants in the trial.

A brief statement of the facts will suffice. The plaintiff was riding in an automobile driven by the defendant Rogers, traveling in an easterly direction along Tulare avenue in the city of Fresno at about midnight of the 30th of October, 1921. He was proceeding at a speed under 30 miles an hour. As he approached the intersection of Tulare avenue and Chestnut avenue he noticed the lights of a machine driven by defendant Stjepovich coming southerly on Chestnut avenue. At the time that he first noticed these lights he was about one-eighth of a mile from the point of intersection, and the Stjepovich car was about the same distance north on Chestnut avenue. He testified that when he came to the intersection he first put on his brakes and then speeded up in order to pass the defendant. He turned off to his right as far as he could and put on his brakes. The defendant Stjepovich's car, which was traveling on the left-hand side of the highway, struck the left rear wheel of Rogers' car, turning it completely over and throwing it into the field alongside of the road. There is no evidence that the defendant Rogers, after he reached the intersection, slackened his speed until just about the moment when he was struck, and then he was close to the southeasterly curb, the collision having taken place in the southeastern corner of the intersection.

The motion for a new trial on the part of the defendant Rogers was based upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence as well as errors at law. The order of the trial court granting the motion was based upon both these grounds. The plaintiff on these appeals takes the position that the court erred in granting the defendant Rogers a new trial, but insists that, if that order is to be affirmed, she should be entitled to again put the defendant Stjepovich to his defense because of the errors which resulted in his favor.

[1] Appellate courts are loath to reverse an order of a trial court granting a new trial after a verdict by the jury when one of the grounds stated is the insufficiency of the evidence. It is only in cases where the discretion of the trial court in this respect has been grossly abused that the appellate courts will set aside the order. We are not called upon to make an extended review of the evidence for this purpose because we are satisfied that the errors of law occurring during the trial require an affirmance of both orders of the trial court.

[2] The plaintiff practically concedes the correctness of the order owing to the errors in instructions given by the trial court at the request of the defendant Stjepovich. On behalf of the defendant Rogers, in discussing this appeal, it is urged that, although he could not complain of errors favorable to his joint tort-feasor, he nevertheless is entitled to take advantage of errors in instructions of the court which amount to an instruction for a verdict against him. Scarborough v. Urgo (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 584. Following this view it is argued that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant Rogers when it instructed the jury, in effect, that, if it should find that a careful and prudent driver would have decreased the speed of his automobile prior to entering the intersection of the streets, then it should find the defendant Rogers guilty of negligence. There was some evidence on the part of the defendant Rogers that he did decrease the speed before entering the intersection, and that he increased it when he passed into the intersection and endeavored to get ahead of the other car. The truth of this testimony was a matter for the determination of the jury, and this instruction of the trial court encroached upon that function.

[3] Objection is also made to instruction No. 20 wherein the trial court, at the request of the defendant Stjepovich, instructed the jury that Rogers could not excuse his driving at "an excessive rate of speed just prior to the time of the collision" merely because he thought he could in that way avoid an accident. Here again the court assumed to pass upon the facts which were in dispute.

Particular stress is laid upon the claimed error in instruction No. 26, which reads as follows:

> "You are further instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the defendant Rogers was negligent in the operation of his car after he had seen the car of defendant Stjepovich approaching the intersection of Chestnut street and Tulare avenue, by increasing the speed of his car, and such action of defendant Rogers was the sole proximate cause of the injury, your verdict should be in favor of defendant Stjepovich, even if you should find from the evidence that defendant Stjepovich was negligent, if you find that such negligence of defendant Stjepovich was not the proximate cause of the collision."

The vice of this instruction is that it assumes to be true facts which were in dispute. Each defendant was insisting that he was free of negligence, and that, if any negligence occurred, it was the result of the carelessness of the other. By the instruction under consideration the burden was placed upon the plaintiff and the defendant Rogers to show that the negligence of said defendant in increasing the speed of his car after he had seen the car of the defendant Stjepovich was not the sole proximate cause of the injury, and the jury was instructed that they should find in favor of the defendant Stjepovich, even if they should find that he was negligent, but should find also that his negligence was not the proximate cause of the collision. The plaintiff was proceeding upon the theory that both defendants were negligent. Thus the question of the speed of both cars, the manner of their operation at the intersection, which one had the right of way, and which one had the last clear chance to avoid the collision were all before the jury as bearing upon this question of joint negligence. It was not necessary to find that one defendant was guilty of negligence and the other free from negligence. It was possible under the circumstances for the jury to have found that both defendants were guilty of negligence. But this instruction eliminated that question from the consideration of the jury.

Instruction No. 28 is of similar import, but was far more favorable to the defendant Stjepovich. In this the jury was instructed that, if they found that the defendant Stjepovich was driving his car on the left-hand side of the road, that fact would not in itself be sufficient to hold him liable, but it would be necessary for the jury to further find that such act was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, that the jury must affirmatively find that, "if Mr. Stjepovich had been driving on the right-hand side of the center of the road, the collision would not in fact have occurred." Even if the negligence of defendant Stjepovich had not been the sole proximate cause of the injury, he might still be liable as a joint tort-feasor. In any event, the jury was entitled to draw its own inferences from the facts which were in evidence, and this it was not permitted to do by the instruction under consideration.

Order affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4-6] The application for a hearing and determination by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. We do not, however, approve what is said in the opinion of that court in the discussion of instructions numbered 26 and 28. Neither of those instructions assumed the existence of any facts which were in dispute. Both instructions gave to the jury the rules of law to be applied to the facts as they should be determined by the jury. Instruction No. 26 is a correct statement of the law. It did not place the burden of proof or burden of showing upon the defendant Rogers, and it did not eliminate the question of the negligence of both defendants from the consideration of the jury. Instruction No. 28 is incorrect only to the extent that it requires the jury to find that the negligence of the defendant Stjepovich was "the direct and proximate cause of the injury" in order to return a verdict against the latter. The law does not require that a defendant's negligence be both a direct and proximate cause of the injury in order to render him liable. It is sufficient if such negligence be a proximate cause of the injury, and a proximate cause may be either a direct or an indirect cause. However, even if both of these instructions had been erroneous, in that they were unduly favorable to the defendant Stjepovich, this would not justify the granting of a new trial upon the motion of defendant Rogers. His liability depended solely upon the questions whether he was negligent, and whether or not such negligence, if any, proximately caused or contributed to the injuries complained of. These questions were wholly independent of the question whether or not his codefendant Stjepovich was also liable. We agree with the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal as to the first two instructions discussed in its opinion and that the errors therein justified the granting of the new trial as to the defendant Rogers.

against defendant Rogers and in favor of defendant Stjepovich, and from order granting plaintiff a new trial as to defendant Stjepovich he appeals. Order affirmed.

M. F. McCormick and C. M. Ozias, both of Fresno, for appellant Goehring.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, of Fresno, for appellant Stjepovich.

Lindsay & Conley and Arthur Allyn, all of Fresno, for respondent Rogers.

NOURSE, J. In the appeal No. 4777, Goehring v. Rogers, 227 Pac. 687, this day decided, we gave a statement of the facts of the case upon which this appeal, brought by the defendant Stjepovich from the order granting the plaintiff a new trial, is based. Reference is hereby made to the opinion filed in that case both for the statement of facts and the errors at law, which apply equally to the present appeal. The instructions considered therein were particularly prejudicial to the defendant Rogers as placing too great a burden upon him as against his joint tortfeasor. The objection to instruction No. 13 which is herein considered was not available to him on that appeal, as he had requested an instruction of similar import.

[1] It is sufficient to add to the errors already noted in the opinion in case No. 4777 that the plaintiff was prejudiced by instruction No. 13, which was given at the request of both defendants separately, and which, in effect, advised the jury that, where the plaintiff called the defendants for examination under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure as an adverse party, all testimony adduced upon such examination was binding only upon that defendant then under examination, and that all such testimony should be wholly disregarded and not taken into consideration as to the other defendant. Putting it in another way, the jury was instructed that the testimony of Rogers while under examination in accordance with the Code section should not be considered as against Stjepovich, and that the testimony of Stjepovich under the same circumstances should not be used against the defendant Rogers.

The essential facts covering the accident were brought before the jury through the testimony of these two defendants called by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff consequently relied upon this testimony to prove the important issues in her complaint. In instruction No. 13 the trial court put an unreasonable limitation upon the effect of this testimony. There is nothing new in the Code section except that it provides that a party calling an adverse party as a witness shall not be bound by his testimony and that he may rebut by other evidence the testimony given under such examination. It does not pretend to relieve the party so called from the effect of his testimony. The privileges of the section are limited to the calling of an adverse party, but there is nothing in the section to indicate an intention of the Legislature to limit his testimony to his own case. Thus, where one of two or more joint defendants is called under the section, his testimony, if material to the issues involved, is evidence for all purposes of the case, and is binding upon him as well as upon his codefendants. Figari v. Olcese, 184 Cal. 775, 782, 195 Pac. 425, 15 A. L. R. 192. The error of this instruction was a sufficient ground for the order granting plaintiff a new trial.

Order affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The application for a transfer and determination by this court after decision of the District Court of Appeal is denied. Inasmuch as there is to be a retrial of this case, it should be pointed out that the trial court erred in refusing to permit each of the defendants to cross-examine his codefendant when the latter had been called and examined by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The testimony of each defendant so elicited was substantive evidence in the case for all purposes to which it was relevant, and the codefendant should have been accorded the right of cross-examination thereon.

PEOPLE v. STEFFNER. (Cr. 723.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 29, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 29, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ⟹1134(8)—Failure to appeal from order denying motion for new trial held not to preclude review of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

Where accused complied with Pen. Code, § 1247, relative to grounds of appeal and points upon which he relies, his failure to appeal from order denying motion for new trial held not to preclude a review of the sufficiency of the evidence to support verdict.

2. Criminal law ⟹1 12(5)—False pretenses is continuing offense, and may be committed in more than one county.

The crime of obtaining money by false pretenses is a continuing one, and may be committed in more than one county.

3. Criminal law 🔑112(5) — False pretenses 🔑12—Deposit of check in bank to accused's credit was equivalent to obtaining money in county where deposited as to venue.

The depositing of a check in a bank to accused's credit was equivalent to securing the money, so that venue was properly laid in county where such credit was made, under Pen. Code, § 781.

4. False pretenses 🔑39—Prosecution held to make prima facie case, and duty devolved on accused to overcome it.

Where the cashed check, on which was based a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, bore a general indorsement, and there was nothing in the record inconsistent with the fact that it was paid in due course, the prosecution made a prima facie case, and if it was not paid the burden was on accused to show that fact, failing which he could not complain.

5. False pretenses 🔑49(5)—Not essential to conviction that person defrauded testify.

It is not essential to a conviction that the person to whom the false pretenses were made shall have expressly testified that it was by reason of such misrepresentations that he was induced to part with his property, nor is it necessary that he testify, since the jury may base their conclusions on the testimony of others and from all the circumstances in the case.

6. False pretenses 🔑9—False representation, materially influencing owner to part with property, held sufficient.

In order to sustain a conviction, it is not necessary that the false pretenses be the sole inducing cause of the owner to part with his money or property; it being sufficient if such false representation had a material influence, though the owner was also induced by other causes.

7. False pretenses 🔑49(5)—Evidence held to sustain implied finding false representation materially induced corporation defrauded to part with its property.

Evidence held to justify jury's conclusion, that accused's false representation to a corporation, consisting of his warranty and representations in an assignment to the corporation of a conditional sale contract of an automobile to B., rather than accused's guaranty, materially influenced the corporation in parting with its money, notwithstanding that in the assignment accused warranted full performance of all conditions of the contract between him and B.

8. Criminal law 🔑567 — Corporate existence of party defrauded held inferable from evidence in case.

In prosecution for obtaining money from a corporation by false pretenses, de facto corporate existence of the corporation as the party defrauded, within Pen. Code, § 532, held inferable from the evidence in the case.

9. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal to give requested instructions covered by instructions given held not error.

Refusal to give requested instructions was not error, where the matter embracing those instructions was substantially covered by the instructions given.

10. Witnesses 🔑363(1)—Objection to question whether witness refused to discuss case with counsel for accused held properly sustained.

A witness had the right to refuse to discuss the case with the attorneys for either side, or to have exhibited to them contracts which he was required by a subpœna to produce in court, so that, where he was asked by counsel for defense whether he refused to discuss case, etc., such question being asked to show animus, an objection thereto was properly sustained, since an affirmative answer would have disclosed no prejudice against accused.

11. Criminal law 🔑656(3)—Remarks of court in sustaining objection held not prejudicial.

As to court's remark in sustaining objection, "You [counsel for defense] haven't any right to argue that question; there is a way to get at that, and you probably understand how to do it," held not prejudicial.

12. Criminal law 🔑1144(12)—Facts held to justify assumption accused was satisfied with ruling made.

After a ruling adverse to defendant, with reference to which he was given the privilege of reopening the question, if the matter was not again brought to the attention of the court, it must be assumed accused was satisfied with the correctness of the ruling.

13. Criminal law 🔑351(1)—Subsequent acts of accused relative to contracts, other than one on which prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses was based, held not admissible.

Where prosecution for obtaining money from a corporation by false pretenses was based on an assignment of a certain contract to the corporation, the subsequent acts of accused in relation to other similar contracts assigned to the corporation held not admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

E. W. Steffner was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles C. Holl, Grover C. Julian, of Susanville, and R. L. Waggoner, of Cedarville (Archibald M. Johnson and A. A. De Ligne, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

GLENN, Justice pro tem. [1] Defendant was convicted in the superior court of the county of Lassen of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. Motion for new trial was made and denied; whereupon judgment was pronounced against defendant. The appeal is from the judgment only. No attack is made upon the sufficiency of the amended information under which the conviction was had. We will dispose, preliminarily, of two points. At the time of the filing of respondent's brief herein, the record did not disclose the fact that appellant had filed with the clerk and presented an application to the trial court stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which appellant relied, as required by section 1247 of the Penal Code. The record has since been amended, showing compliance with that section. Respondent contends, in a supplemental brief, that, as there was no appeal from the order denying motion for new trial, the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict cannot be reviewed. The identical point thus raised was carefully considered, and decided by this court adversely to respondent's contention, in the case of People v. Clayton, 33 Cal. App. 357, 165 Pac. 37. The various Code sections applicable to the matter were reviewed in detail. Since that decision, rendered in 1917, several sessions of the Legislature have intervened, and no material changes have been made. Appeals, doubtless, have been taken in reliance on the construction thus placed thereon. No new point has been presented which was not there considered, nor do the cases now cited by respondent throw additional light upon the subject. We see no reason to doubt the correctness of the holding in that case, and adhere to the same.

The amended information charges, in substance, that the defendant, E. W. Steffner, transacting business under the name and style of Steffner Overland Company, with intent to defraud the L. F. Weaver Company, a corporation, and with intent to obtain its money and personal property, fraudulently represented to it that he was the owner of, and had sold and delivered, under a conditional contract of sale, to Charles Baum, a certain automobile therein described; that defendant could and would assign, sell, and convey, and had assigned, sold, and conveyed, said automobile and said contract and the moneys payable thereunder, to said L. F. Weaver Company, a corporation, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said automobile was then and there the property of Anglo-California Trust Company, and had not been sold or delivered to said Charles Baum, and that the conditional contract of sale was fraudulent and void, and that said automobile and the conditional contract therefor could not be sold or assigned by defendant; that said Weaver Company believed said representations, and by reason thereof and on the security of said automobile and said purported and fraudulent assignment of the conditional contract for the sale thereof, it paid over to defendant the sum of $1,300, or thereabouts.

Defendant was an automobile dealer, transacting business at Susanville, Lassen county, Cal., under the name of Steffner Overland Company. On July 1, 1922, he entered into a contract with George A. Leal for the sale to him of the automobile described in the amended information; $800 being paid at the date of the signing of the contract, the balance amounting to $1,253.75, payable in monthly installments, covering a period of 12 months. By the terms of the contract, title to the automobile was retained in the seller. The agreement contains many provisions with reference to the care, possession, and other matters usually dealt with in such contracts, but which need not be detailed. Attached thereto are several documents, designated, respectively, "Purchaser's Statement," "Dealer's Recommendation and Warranty of Title," and "Seller's Assignment and Guaranty." By the terms of the assignment appellant transfers his interest in the contract and the property therein described to the Anglo-California Trust Company, warrants title to the property, his right to assign the same, that it is free and clear of all liens and incumbrances, and guarantees performance by Leal of all the terms of the contract including prompt payment of the purchase price. Thereupon these documents were forwarded by appellant to the Anglo-California Trust Company. The company accepted the assignment, and on July 10, 1922, forwarded to appellant its check for the sum of $1,175.72, being the amount represented by the deferred installments, less discount and other incidental charges. On August 24, 1922, said company was informed by letter from appellant that Leal desired a smaller car, and hence he was selling him a 4-cylinder car, and he was also selling the car originally purchased by Leal to a Mr. Lackey. The letter states, in part:

> "In selling this car to Mr. Lackey we have figured the brokerage as though it were a new car, which it really is. We wish you to take up the balance due on the contract of George Leal, and we believe there will be a refund of brokerage charge and if possible transfer the Leal insurance policy to Lackey. Any way you wish to transfer this contract will meet with our approval, as we are well acquainted with both purchasers and can adjust the matter with them. * * * We have included in the contract the sum of $24 to cover insurance premiums in case you cannot transfer the Leal policy."

Enclosed with the letter was an agreement of sale and purchase between Steffner Overland company, as the seller, and J. W. and W. H. Lackey, as the purchasers, similar in form and substance to the one between the defendant and Leal. This contract recites that the sum of $800 is paid upon the date of signing, leaving a balance due of $1,258.25, payable in monthly installments. It is signed "Steffner Overland Co., by E. W. Steffner, Mg., and J. W. & W. H. Lackey, by J. W. Lackey." Attached thereto is the seller's warranty of title, assignment, and guaranty, similar in substance to the one attached to the contract between appellant and Leal. Conformably to appellant's instructions, the Anglo-California Trust Company, upon receipt of said contract and the assignment thereof, made its usual discount and other incidental charges amounting to $78.02, deducted this sum from the amount unpaid on the contract, as indicated by the deferred installments, leaving a net balance of $1,180.23, which was credited as a payment on the prior contract of George A. Leal covering the same car. On September 23, 1922, appellant wrote to the Anglo-California Trust Company, asking to be advised promptly of any default in payment on the part of Lackey; that if the first payment then past due had not been paid, to wire him, as he had received word that the account should be watched closely, it being his intention to repossess the car in case any payment became delinquent. In answer thereto the appellant was advised that the payment due on the 20th had not been received. During the first week in October, 1922, R. F. Wentworth, a representative of the Anglo-California Trust Company, called on the defendant, and together they went over the various delinquent accounts. The Lackeys being in default, Wentworth and defendant proceeded to Westwood, secured the automobile, and returned with it to Susanville, where it was placed in a garage in the name of the Anglo-California Trust Company. The car was never thereafter in the possession of defendant, having remained in the garage at all times up to the date of the trial, excepting on several occasions when it was taken out by a representative of the said company, but not with reference to any matter with which defendant was concerned. Defendant testified that he had been given to understand by Wentworth, on the trip back from Westwood, that there was no objection to the car being sold by him so long as the company's interests were protected. This was not only denied by Wentworth, but the latter stated that he had told defendant that the automobile must remain in the garage until word was received from the Anglo-California Trust Company to release it to Mr. Lackey. In view of the conflict in this regard the verdict of the jury must be accepted as an implied finding against appellant.

The possession of the automobile and the title thereto thus stood on October 16, 1922. On that date, and unbeknown to the Anglo-California Trust Company, defendant entered into a conditional sales contract with one Charles Baum for the sale to him of the automobile originally contracted to be sold to Leal, the purchase price being $1,985, the contract reciting the payment of $685 at the date thereof, leaving a balance of $1,300, payable in monthly installments. This contract, together with the assignment thereto attached, is in the same general form and substance as the previous contracts and assignments to which reference is made above. Therein defendant affirms that the automobile in the contract described (and being the same automobile originally sold to Leal) has been delivered to Baum; he assigns and conveys to the L. F. Weaver Company all his right, title, and interest in and to the contract, the property therein described, the moneys payable thereunder, and warrants that he has the right to assign the title, and that the same is free from any and all liens and incumbrances. He also guarantees payment by Baum and full performance by the latter of all covenants. These documents were forwarded to the L. F. Weaver Company at San Francisco for discount. The contract and assignment were received and accepted by said company, and, in conformity with the request made in the letters accompanying the same, the L. F. Weaver Company deducted discount and other incidental charges, and mailed its check for the sum of $1,269 to defendant, which was deposited by him to his account in the Lassen Industrial Bank at Susanville. As Baum was unable to secure possession of the automobile, by reason of the fact that it was stored in a garage in the name of the Anglo-California Trust Company, the check given by him to defendant at the time of entering into the contract was ultimately returned.

The alleged false pretenses consisted in the statements made in the contract with Baum, the warranties and representations in the assignment thereof to the Weaver Company, and in the letters of transmittal accompanying the same.

Appellant does not deny the receipt of the check from the Weaver Company and the deposit of the same to his account in the Lassen Industrial Bank, but claims that it was the general custom of himself, as well as other automobile dealers, in cases where contracts had been discounted with banks, to repossess the cars, in case of default in payments thereon, and to resell the same, and to rediscount the contract on the second sale, either to the original financial institution to which it had been assigned, or to other financial firms; that when thus repossessed, resold, and rediscounted, the balance, represented by the deferred payments was handled by either crediting the amount thereof on the first contract, or by permitting the contract to be paid monthly according to its terms, or otherwise caring for the same; and that such had been the custom and manner of his dealing with the Anglo-California Trust Company. In other words, appellant's position is that he was left to deal freely with said automobiles much the same as though he was the absolute owner thereof. For the purpose of substantiating his claim in this regard, a number of transactions were gone into during the course of the trial, but a careful inspection of the record fails to disclose anything in these transactions analogous to the present case or justifying appellant's contention. They were made subject to approval and acceptance by the Anglo-California Trust Company. The new contracts and the assignments thereof were forwarded to it for approval and discount, but in such contingencies no additional advancements were made so far as we have noted. Even if further sums were advanced, the security remained intact. These transactions merely amounted to the substitution of one contract for another, subject to the approval of the Anglo-California Trust Company.

The letters and documents containing the false representations were executed and mailed by appellant in Lassen county, addressed to the Weaver Company at San Francisco. The check in payment for the amount represented by the deferred payments, in the conditional contract of sale between appellant and the purchaser, Charles Baum, was drawn by the Weaver Company on the Anglo and London-Paris National Bank, located at San Francisco, and mailed by said Weaver Company to appellant at Susanville, Lassen county. He indorsed the same and deposited it to his credit in the Lassen Industrial Bank at Susanville. It is indorsed:

> "Steffner Overland Co., E. W. Steffner. Pay to the order of any bank or banker. All prior indorsements guaranteed. October 21, 1922. Lassen Industrial Bank, Susanville, W. G. Culbreth, Cashier."

From these facts it is contended that the superior court of Lassen county lacked jurisdiction, as the crime was neither wholly nor partly committed in said county; that the false pretenses, if any, were made when received by the Weaver Company at San Francisco; that the money, if obtained at all, was received by appellant when the bank in San Francisco upon which it was drawn honored it; hence, it is asserted, also, that the evidence is insufficient to show that the Weaver Company ever parted with its money, or that appellant ever obtained the same. These questions will be considered together. Respondent relies upon the provisions of section 781 of the Penal Code to the effect that, where an offense is partly committed in one county and partly in another, jurisdiction is in either county.

[2, 3] Appellant cites the cases of People v. Griffith, 122 Cal. 212, 54 Pac. 723, People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 55 Pac. 898, and Golden v. Justice's Court, 23 Cal. 778, 140 Pac. 49, as holding that the representations were made where received. These cases throw little, if any, light on the questions presented here. The crime of obtaining money by false pretenses is a continuing crime, and may be committed in more than one county. People v. Dimick, 107 N. Y. 13, 14 N. E. 178; People v. Boggess, 42 Cal. App. Dec. 558.[1] It is true there is a conflict in some of the authorities as to whether the representations are deemed to have been made where mailed (People v. Arnstein, 157 App. Div. 766, 142 N. Y. Supp. 842; 12 Am. & Enc. of Law [2d Ed.] 848; Reg. v. Holmes, 12 Q. B. D. 23) or where received (State v. Gibson, 132 Iowa, 53, 106 N. W. 270; State v. Smith, 162 Iowa, 336, 144 N. W. 32, 49 L. R. A. [N. S.] 834). The subject is discussed and some of the cases annotated in Ann. Cas. 1917E, pp. 311, 312. But the question of where the fraudulent representations were made is not determinative of this case, for the reason that we are dealing with acts other than the mailing or receipt of the letters and documents. The check sent by Weaver & Co. to appellant was indorsed by him and deposited to his credit in the Lassen Industrial Bank in Lassen county. These were acts in furtherance of the fraudulent design (People v. Boggess, supra), and completed the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses (State v. Smith, 162 Iowa, 336, 144 N. W. 32, 49 L. R. A. [N. S.] 834; also, to the same effect, Burton v. United States, 196 U. S. 283, 25 Sup. Ct. 243, 49 L. Ed. 482). The placing of the check in the bank to appellant's credit was the equivalent of securing the money. State v. Mason, 62 Mont. 180, 204 Pac. 358; State v. Smith, supra. But it is argued by appellant that this does not constitute a payment by the Weaver Company, for the reason that the Lassen Industrial Bank was not the agent of the Weaver Company for the payment of the check; that the relation of debtor and creditor, instead of principal and agent, ensued, and for the further reason that the evidence fails to disclose that the check was ever paid by Weaver & Co. or charged against it by the bank on which it was drawn. Respondent cites People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194, and People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 180, 106 Pac. 1103, in answer to these contentions. These cases are not, however, strictly in point. In the former the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the money represented by the check had actually been paid by the prosecuting witness, and in the latter case the check was paid by the bank on which it was drawn; the bank being the agent of the drawer thereof. The identical question as to the effect of the payment by a bank other than the one on which it was drawn, of a check secured by means of false representations, arose in a case decided by the Supreme Court of the state of Iowa, and that court, in an exhaustive and carefully considered decision, held that the securing of the money under such circumstances completed the crime, and that the venue was properly laid where the check was cashed. State v. Smith, 162 Iowa, 336, 144 N. W. 32, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834. To the same effect is the case of Burton v. United States, 196 U. S. 283, 25 Sup. Ct. 243, 49 L. Ed. 482. The facts in the Smith Case, supra, are not distinguishable from the facts in the present case, excepting that the evidence in that case showed that the check was ultimately paid by the bank on which it was drawn prior to the institution of the prosecution of the case, but the decision does not depend upon that point, and the same may be said with reference to the Burton Case, supra. It would unduly extend this opinion were we to attempt to quote from these cases. They hold, however, that the moment the check is cashed that moment the drawer is defrauded; that had the check been deposited for collection a different question would then arise; but in such a case as the present, where a check is deposited to one's account, or cashed, the relation of debtor and creditor arises, and the title to the check immediately passes to the bank. See, also, Bates v. State, 124 Wis. 612, 103 N. W. 251, 4 Ann. Cas. 365; People v. Ballas, 55 Cal. App. 749, 204 Pac. 401. We see no escape from the logic of these cases. They state the law, in our opinion, applicable to the facts of this case on the questions above suggested.

[4] Before passing this phase of the case it might be well to call attention to the fact that the check bears a general indorsement, and there is nothing in the record inconsistent with the fact that it was paid in due course. The least that can be said, under the circumstances, is that the prosecution made out a prima facie case, and assuming, without deciding, that the defendant might properly make out a defense by showing that the maker was ultimately relieved from payment, the burden to do so, after the prima facie showing on the part of the prosecution, was cast upon him, and, not having done this, he cannot now complain.

[5-7] It is contended that there was no evidence, either direct or circumstantial, that the L. F. Weaver Company was induced, either wholly or in part, by reason of any alleged misrepresentations, to part with its money or property. For aught that appears it may have relied solely upon appellant's guaranty.

The transaction was the ordinary one of an automobile dealer assigning an installment contract for discount, in order to replenish his capital to carry on business. The correspondence indicated that both parties understood that in the assignment of the Baum contract by defendant, and the acceptance thereof by the Weaver Company, it relied upon the security thereby purported to have been transferred to it. Three letters accompanied the contract and assignment. In the first appellant asks that remittance on the contract be mailed direct to him, instead of depositing it in an account in the Anglo-California Trust Company as had been done in the past, showing a purpose to conceal knowledge of the transaction from the Anglo-California Trust Company. The second letter deals with the question of insurance covering the car. Request is made that the same be insured against fire and theft, "together with what other insurance you may require" for $1,500. If appellant understood that the Weaver Company was relying on his guaranty alone, there would be no occasion for him to assume said company would require or be concerned with insurance, other than such as appellant himself might suggest. The third letter contained a financial statement of the transaction, with a request for remittance of the sum of $1,300, less discount charges. Upon receipt of the contract, assignment and letters accompanying same, the secretary of the Weaver Company, not being familiar with the particular transaction, handed the same over to Weaver, who appeared to be in authority. The latter gave his approval thereto, and it was put through in the usual way. In the letter transmitting the check to appellant it was stated that it was sent "in settlement of the contract signed by Charles Baum." There is not a word in the record which suggests or intimates that it was other than by virtue of the contract and the assignment thereof and the reliance thereon by the Weaver Company that appellant obtained the check which was subsequently deposited to his account in the Lassen Industrial Bank; in fact, no such defense was made during the trial. The position then assumed was that appellant had the right to the possession of the automobile and authority to sell and assign the Baum contract to the Weaver Company, and that his title was free and clear of all other claims or liens. We fail to find any justification for the contention that the evidence showed that the warranties in the contract had often been disregarded by the lender (L. F. Weaver Company) in its dealings with appellant. The fact is the record merely shows this one transaction, at least so far as the point now suggested is concerned. In addition to the warranty with reference to the title to the automobile, appellant certified that he had delivered possession to Baum, whereas the real fact was that possession had not been delivered, nor could delivery be made for the reason it stood in a garage in the name and under the control of the Anglo-California Trust Company, with knowledge on the part of appellant that it was to so remain until an order was secured from said company for its release. The order was never secured.

It is not necessary or essential to a conviction that the person to whom the false pretenses were made shall have expressly testified that it was by reason of such misrepresentations that he was induced to part with his property, nor is it indispensable to a conviction that he take the stand.

> "The jury may be fully satisfied on the testimony of others, and from all the circumstances in the case, that the representations did induce him to turn over the property to the defendant." People v. Hong Quin Moon, 92 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 1096.

Neither is it necessary that the false pretenses be the sole inducing cause of the owner parting with his money or property. It is sufficient if it had a material influence, although he was also induced by other causes. 25 Corpus Juris, 601.

Testing the facts by the above rules, we have no hesitancy in holding that the jury was fully justified in its conclusion that the false representations did have a material influence on the Weaver Company in parting with its property, notwithstanding the fact that in the assignment the appellant does warrant full performance of all the terms and conditions of the contract between him and Baum.

[8] The next point urged by appellant is that—

> "There was no evidence to support the allegation the L. F. Weaver Company was or is a corporation either de facto or de jure, and the verdict of the jury fails of support in this essential."

In this connection it is claimed that the question of the corporate existence of said company was put in issue by his plea of not guilty, and the burden was thereby cast upon the prosecution to prove such fact the same as any other material fact in the case.

Prosecution was had under the provisions of section 532 of the Penal Code. That section provides, in part:

> "Every person who knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds any other person of money, labor, or property, * * * is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained."

It is urged in support of the position that at least the de facto corporate existence of said company must be shown; that the "other person" mentioned in said section (the party defrauded and described in the amended information herein as the L. F. Weaver Company, a corporation) must be the identical person mentioned therein as the victim of the fraud, otherwise a variance would ensue; that in the present case there was not a mere variance, but an utter failure to prove that the "other person" (the alleged defrauded party) existed by reason of the failure to show corporate entity, either de facto or de jure, on the part of said Weaver Company.

Respondent suggests that the corporate existence of said company was treated and assumed throughout the entire case as an admitted fact by both sides. The suggestion of respondent in this regard is not without support, at least so far as the rule in civil cases is concerned. In Lewis v. Bank of Kentucky, 12 Ohio, 132, 40 Am. Dec. 469, it is said:

> "In almost every trial, there are facts necessary to make out the case, which, by the parties, are treated as admitted, without requiring formal proof. To make the absence of express proof, in such cases ground for error, after verdict and judgment, would be unfair, and attended with great inconvenience."

More specific, however, is the language of the court in the recent case of Gilmore v. Caswell (Cal. App.) 224 Pac. 249, wherein it is said:

> "An examination of the cases all show that something was said or done which justified the assumption of the existence of the facts necessary to appear and to be made to appear in order to support the judgment."

We are of the opinion that the corporate existence of the L. F. Weaver Company is to be inferred from the evidence in the case rather than from admissions claimed to have been made by the parties.

It is conceded that in a criminal case, where such fact is an element of the crime (although it is not necessarily such in all character of criminal cases), a mere de facto corporate existence is all that is necessary to be shown. An interesing and illuminating case on the subject is United States v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 392, 6 L. Ed. 502. We quote therefrom as follows:

> "The next question is whether before the policy of insurance underwritten by the Boston Insurance Company could be given in evidence, it was necessary to prove that the subscription to the stock, and the payment of such subscription, as required by the act of incorporation, had been made. In our opinion it was not. This is not the case where a suit is brought by the corporation to enforce its rights, where, if the fact of its legal existence is put in controversy upon the issue, the corporation may be called upon to establish its existence. The case of Henriquez and Van Moyses v. The Dutch West India Company, cited in 2 Lord Raym. 1535, as decided before Lord King, whatever may be its authority, was of that sort, and therefore carries with it an obvious distinction; nor is this the case of a quo warranto, where the government calls upon the company to establish its legal corporate powers and organization. The case here is of a public prosecution for a crime, where the corporation is no party, and is merely collaterally introduced as being intended to be prejudiced by the commission of the crime. Under such circumstances we think nothing more was necessary for the government to prove than that the company was de facto organized and acting as an insurance company and corporation. The very procurement of a policy by the prisoner, to be executed by the company, was of itself prima facie evidence for such a purpose. In cases of the murder of officers, it is not necessary to prove that they are officers by producing their commissions. It is sufficient to show that they act de facto as such. In cases of piracy, it has been held sufficient to establish the proprietary title to the ship by evidence of actual possession of the party claiming to be owner. These are analogous cases, and furnish strong illustrations of the general principal. * * * The next question arises upon the instruction of the court 'that it was not material whether the company was incorporated or not; and it was not material whether the policy were valid in law or not; that the prisoner's guilt did not depend upon the legal obligation of the policy, but upon the question whether he had willfully and corruptly cast away the vessel, as charged in the indictment, with intent to injure the actual underwriters.' We think this opinion correct. The act of Congress of the 26th of March 1801, c. 40, on which this indictment is framed, declares 'that if any person shall, on the high seas, willfully and corruptly cast away, etc., any ship or vessel, of which he is owner, etc., with intent or design to prejudice any person or persons that hath underwritten, or shall underwrite, any policy or policies of insurance thereon, etc., the person or persons offending therein, etc., shall suffer death.' The law punishes the act when done with an intent to prejudice, it does not require that there should be an actual prejudice. The prejudice intended is to be to a person who has underwritten, or shall underwrite, a policy thereon, which, for aught the prisoner knows, is valid; and does not prescribe that the policy should be valid, so that a recovery could be had thereon. It points to the intended prejudice of an underwriter de facto." (Italics ours.)

In Fleener v. State, 58 Ark. 98, 23 S. W. 1, the court holds that a de facto corporation may be the victim of embezzlement; that evidence of general reputation of corporate existence is sufficient, and adds:

> "And, if the same rule is to be applied in criminal as in civil cases, it would seem that one dealing with even an ostensible corporation, as such, is not permitted to deny its corporate capacity."

In Norton v. State, 74 Ind. 337, it is said:

> "The court permitted a witness to state that the Terre Haute and Evansville Railroad Company was a corporation. There was no error in this. It was proper to prove that the railroad company was known and acting as a corporation. Wharton Criminal Evidence, § 164a. This conclusion is the logical sequence of the doctrine declared in Smith v. State, 28 Ind. 321. It is indeed doubtful whether it was incumbent upon the state to do more than prove that there was an artificial being assuming and acting under a name indicating and implying a corporation."

In People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645, it is said:

> "The next question is one of greater importance and of much more difficulty. The indictment charges the defendant with feloniously having in possession certain blank and unfinished bills in the form and similitude of a bill for the payment of money, to be issued by an incorporated bank, viz.: The Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, a foreign corporation then lawfully organized and incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and then carrying on business as such banking corporation at Hongkong, in China, etc., with intent, etc., to defraud the said the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China. On the trial, the prosecution was permitted to prove the existence of the Chartered Bank of India, etc., by reputation, that it was acting as a corporation and as a banking house, and as such issued bank bills, which were received as current in certain countries. The materiality of the evidence, if it be material, arises entirely from the unnecessary allegations of the indictment. It was not necessary to charge that the banking house whose bills were imitated, was an incorporated company. If it were a banking company, actually issuing bank bills, which were current anywhere, it is sufficient. The corporate character of the company is supposed to become material just as, in an indictment for stealing a black horse, though it was unnecessary to aver that the horse was black, yet it being averred it becomes material, in order to establish the identity of the crime. So, here, the fact that the company was incorporated becomes material only as a matter of description, and is not an element of the crime. We do not admit the justice of the comparison. It would be equally an offense whether the company be actually incorporated or not, so it is acting as a corporation and issues bank bills which are current. So, too, as a matter of identity, we think the description is satisfied by proof that the company is known as a corporate company and is acting as such, and as such issues bills which come within the statute. The case is widely different where a suit is pending, in which the legal existence of the corporation may be made an issue. U. S. v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 392; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507."

In People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, the defendant was charged with having forged an indorsement on a draft with intent to defraud the Utah Mining Company, alleged to be a corporation, and other persons. One Newby, a witness produced by the prosecution, testified that he had found the draft with the vouchers of the Utah Company; that he was president of said company. The draft was as follows:

> "Utah Mining Company, Aurora, N. T., Sept. 18th, 1864. $334.56. Ten days after sight, pay to the order of H. Bloomingdale & Co. three hundred and thirty-four fifty-six one-hundredths dollars, value received, and charge the same as advised. F. J. Baum, Sup't. To M. Frank, Esq., President Utah Mining Company, San Francisco."

This appears to have been all the evidence as to the corporate existence of said company. It was claimed, among other things, that the Utah Mining Company was not a corporation, and therefore could not have been defrauded. As to this the court said:

> "Whether the Utah Mining Company was a corporation de jure or not was not an issue in this case. If it was acting as such that was sufficient."

The court added, however:

> "But admitting that the Utah Mining Company is not a corporation, the indictment also charges an intent to defraud Howard who certainly had a legal existence."

In the case at bar the facts are much stronger in this regard than in the Frank Case, supra. While it is true there was no direct proof of the de facto corporate existence of the said L. F. Weaver Company, still we are of the opinion that the corporate entity of said company is inferable from the facts and circumstances of the case. We cannot agree with the contention of appellant that, for aught that appears, it may have been a copartnership. All the correspondence from said defendant to said company and from it to him was in the name of said company as an entity. The assignment made by him was to the L. F. Weaver Company. The check procured by defendant was signed "L. F. Weaver Company by Kenton Weaver, Vice President"; and in this connection we direct attention to the language of the court italized by us in United States v. Amedy, supra. A witness testified that he was secretary of said company, stating also the character of the business in which it was engaged. Thus it appears that said company was transacting business, not as an individual or individuals dong business under a trade-name, or as a copartnership, but ostensibly as a corporate entity, operating through its officer. This was a sufficient prima facie showing in a criminal case. There was no proof to the contrary. The defendant's guilt or innocence does not turn upon the question of its corporate entity, the evidence clearly justifying the implied finding of the jury that said company had been defrauded in the manner as charged. The transaction was in no manner changed by the character of proof on the question of corporate existence; the defendant is fully protected against further prosecution for the same offense, and his substantial rights were in no manner adversely affected.

Defendant asserts that, had corporate existence of said company been shown, a chance would have been given him on cross-examination to have ascertained the causal connection, if any, between the alleged false pretenses and the parting with its property by said company; also as to what extent, if any, the corporation, or the person assuming to act for it, had been deceived; and it is also suggested that said company may have purchased the Baum contract on the joint or several responsibility of Baum and the defendant, as to which, so it is claimed, there was no evidence. We have heretofore discussed this feature of the case under another point, and will only add that the evidence showed the names of the representatives of the Weaver Company who handled the transaction on its behalf and authorized its acceptance, together with the surrounding facts and circumstances, and all the other details of the transaction, as fully as if there had been direct proof of either its de jure or de facto corporate existence. As previously stated, one of the witnesses was secretary of said company and testified to that fact; also as to the business conducted by it. The fact that a copy of the articles of incorporation of said company was not introduced, or that no witness was directly interrogated by the prosecution as to its corporate existence, did not prevent defendant, who was party to the entire transaction and conversant therewith, from bringing out on cross-examination, had he so desired, such information as he might have deemed necessary. Under the circumstances, it is but reasonable to infer that defendant was satisfied, during the trial, with those details of the transaction which he now asserts he was prevented from ascertaining by reason of the alleged failure to prove the corporate entity of said company.

The corporate existence of a company, the alleged victim in the commission or attempt to commit a crime, is not, in every criminal case, an element of the crime. Different factors enter into a determination of the question. No general rule on the subject can be laid down as applicable to all criminal cases, although mere excerpts from some might lead to the opposite conclusion. As the views we have expressed render a discussion of the subject unnecessary, we shall refrain from a further reference thereto.

[9] Two instructions proposed by defendant were refused by the court, and the failure to give the same is now assigned as error, although the grounds upon which the contention is based are not set forth. These proposed instructions will be found in the clerk's transcript—the first on page 48, commencing at line 18, and the second on page 51. The first of these is extremely argumentative. Both, however, were substantially covered by instructions given. (Clerk's transcript, page 29, lines 4 to 24; page 31, lines 8 to 16; page 32, lines 3 to 11; pages 33, 36 and 39).

[10, 11] It is claimed the court erred in sustaining objections interposed by the prosecution to two questions asked the witness Stanbury. (The reference given is incorrect. The questions will be found on pages 111 and 112 of the reporter's transcript.) The record discloses the following:

"By Mr. Holl: Q. Did you bring with you the four contracts which you were directed by this subpœna to bring with you?

"By Mr. Hardy: We object to that as immaterial and irrelevant and not proper cross-examination.

"By the Court: I think the objection is good, but I don't see any object in making it. This witness is subpœnaed by the defense. If you insist upon it I will sustain it.

"By Mr. Hardy: The proper place to put that in is in his defense.

"By the Court: I think so too.

"By Mr. Holl: I am going to ask another question. Have you since your arrival here refused to discuss the case in any way with the attorney for the defense, myself, and refused to exhibit such, any contracts in your possession, described in this subpœna? This is for the purpose of showing animus of the witness.

"By Mr. Hardy: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and not proper cross-examination.

"By the Court: Objection sustained. This is not the time and place to take that matter up.

"By Mr. Holl: I think in fairness I should say I am offering this to show the animus of the witness, his interest, and the fact that he is opposed mentally to the defendant.

"By the Court: You haven't any right to argue that question. There is a way to get at that, and you probably understand how to do it.

"By Mr. Holl: That is all."

There appears to have been no definite or final ruling on the first question; but, irrespective of this, no claim is made that the contracts referred to were not produced in response to the subpœna, hence the relevancy of the question is not apparent. The objection to the second question was properly sustained. The witness was well within his rights to have refused to discuss the case with the attorneys for either side, or to have exhibited to them documents which he was required by the subpœna to produce in court. An affirmative answer, therefore, under the circumstances, would have disclosed no prejudice. The ruling of the court in sustaining the objection to the last question did not preclude the defendant from a line of questions, answers to which would tend to show whether or not the witness was biased or prejudiced against him. It is claimed, however, that the remarks of the court in sustaining the objection were prejudicial. The remarks of the court, as will be observed, were made in response to a statement by counsel for defendant, after the court had sustained the objection to the question, apparently for the purpose of shutting off further argument and directing attention to the fact that, if it was desired to bring out the facts which counsel claimed to exist, a different line of examination should be pursued.

[12, 13] It is finally urged that the court erred in sustaining an objection by the prosecution to a question, whereby it was sought to elicit from defendant the fact that after the commission of the crime charged he had assigned other contracts to the L. F. Weaver Company; the object of the question being, so it was stated, to show that defendant could have had no intent to defraud in assigning the Baum contract, otherwise he would not have placed additional assets in the hands of said company. There is no merit in the contention. After the objection had been sustained, permission was given defendant to submit authorities and to reopen the question. Thereupon counsel for defendant stated: "All right, I will abandon that now and go on to this matter." If the matter was not again brought to the attention of the court it must be assumed that defendant was satisfied with the correctness of the ruling made. There was no error, however, in the ruling so made. The subsequent acts of defendants in relation to other contracts had no bearing on the issues involved in the charge. Under the circumstances they were not relevant, but would be rather in their nature self-serving, and in no way tend to show the intent of defendant at the time of the commission of the crime charged. In Gardner v State, 4 Ala. App. 131, 58 South. 1001, defendant was charged with obtaining money under the false representation that he was the owner of a certain tract of land. It was claimed the court erred in refusing to permit testimony as to the subsequent conduct of defendant in attempting to perfect his title thereto. The court held:

> "What the defendant did after the commission of the offense was not relevant, and testimony of his subsequent actions or conduct was not admissible, even in mitigation of the offense, and the court properly refused to allow the defendant to make proof of what efforts he afterwards made to perfect title to the land or whether he was prevented from doing so by an injunction."

The foregoing disposes of all the points raised by appellant. In view of the suggestion made that defendant intended no wrong, and was improperly convicted of the offense upon which he was tried, we have gone over the entire record. Without reiterating the facts, we will say the case was fairly tried, the defense was permitted a wide latitude, the Weaver Company was defrauded of a considerable sum by the defendant in the manner charged, and the record amply justifies the conclusion reached by the jury; hence we see no reason for disturbing its verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

67 Cal. App. 23

PEOPLE v. STEFFNER. (Cr. 720.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 29, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 29, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1134(8)—Failure to appeal from order denying motion for new trial held not to preclude review of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

Failure to appeal from order denying motion for new trial held not to preclude review of question of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

2. Embezzlement ⚷32—Charge need not allege particulars of trust relation.

An information charging embezzlement need not allege the particulars of the trust relation.

3. Embezzlement 🔑4—Defined.

"Embezzlement" is larceny after trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Embezzle—Embezzlement.]

4. Embezzlement 🔑26—Information held to charge embezzlement.

Information alleging C. intrusted accused with money belonging to C., which accused received, and that while it was so intrusted in his possession accused feloniously and fraudulently embezzled it by appropriating it to his own use, not in the due and lawful execution of the trust, etc., held sufficient under Pen. Code, §§ 503, 506, 950, 952.

5. Embezzlement 🔑44(5)—Evidence held to sustain implied finding that accused became trustee of prosecuting witness in receipt of money.

Evidence held to sustain finding, implied from verdict that accused became the agent or trustee of prosecuting witness in the receipt of money from witness for a specified purpose.

6. Embezzlement 🔑4—When appropriation of money intrusted is "embezzlement."

If accused was intrusted with money of prosecuting witness, and while acting in such trust capacity fraudulently appropriated the same, he is guilty of embezzlement within Pen. Code, § 503.

7. Embezzlement 🔑10—Accused held estopped from denying he held money of another as trustee.

If, at the time C. turned money over to accused, the understanding between him and accused was that the latter received the money as the agent aud trustee of C. for a specific purpose, accused was estopped from denying that fact in a prosecution for embezzlement.

8. Embezzlement 🔑44(5)—Evidence held not to establish creation of agency to collect money.

Evidence held not to establish creation of agency within Civ. Code, § 2316, between accused and a trust company to collect money for the latter from a purchaser of a car whose contract was assigned by accused to the trust company.

9. Embezzlement 🔑10—Accused held estopped from asserting agency.

Where C. intrusted money to accused as trustee to remit it to a trust company for a certain purpose, and accused did not communicate to C. that he (accused) believed himself authorized to act as the agent of the trust company to collect such money, and C. was not aware of such belief, accused was estopped, in a prosecution for embezzlement, from claiming agency between himself and trust company.

10. Criminal law 🔑433—Letter which threw light upon those introduced by defense held admissible.

A letter which threw light upon those introduced by defense in support of his theory held admissible.

11. Embezzlement 🔑11(1)—Agent to collect money must turn it over to principal within reasonable time.

It was the duty of accused as agent, in making collection from C., to notify the principal of the collection and to turn the money over to it within a reasonable time, in view of Pen. Code, § 506, which makes the fraudulent secreting of property with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it embezzlement.

12. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Refusal to strike answer in form of conclusion held not prejudicial.

Where a witness for a company, to which accused assigned a conditional sale contract of an automobile, payable in monthly installments, in response to a question why the trust company did not charge accused's account with the total balance owing on the contract assigned, when buyer of car did not remit installment, answered that there was only one installment due at the time, and that "We had no right to deduct the entire amount of the contract," refusal to strike out the latter part of the answer as calling for conclusion held not prejudicial; there being no attempt to state terms of contract.

13. Criminal law 🔑1169(2) — Admission of testimony previously received without objection could not be prejudicial.

The admission of testimony could not be prejudicial, where such testimony was previously received without objection.

14. Criminal law 🔑822(1)—Instructions to be read together.

Instructions are to be read together.

15. Criminal law 🔑823(1) — Instruction on embezzlement held not misleading, in view of other instructions given.

An instruction on embezzlement held not misleading, in view of other instructions given.

16. Embezzlement 🔑48(2)—Instruction requested held not to state defensive matter enumerated in statute.

To constitute a defense under Pen. Code, § 511, to a charge of embezzlement, the property must be appropriated openly and avowedly, and under a claim of title preferred in good faith, and an instruction that accused was not guilty of embezzlement, where he converted money to his own use, believing he had a right to do so, was not a statement of the defense authorized by such section.

17. Criminal law 🔑1172(6)—Refusal to give requested, and giving of substituted, instruction, embracing defensive matter to which accused was not entitled, held not prejudicial.

Where accused, charged with embezzlement, was not entitled under the evidence to an instruction embracing the defensive matter enumerated in Pen. Code, § 511, the refusal to give his requested instruction on that subject, and the giving in lieu thereof of another instruction embracing that matter, held not prejudicial.

18. Embezzlement 🔑48(2)—Proposed instruction held properly refused as inapplicable.

Where the money on which prosecution for embezzlement was based was either intrusted to accused for C., or was paid to accused as agent for a certain corporation, a proposed instruction that the statutory crime of embezzlement is not a substitute for debt, and cannot be used to punish a party for failure to comply with ordinary obligations to pay money, held properly refused as inapplicable.

19. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal to give requested instructions, covered by instructions given, held not error.

Refusal to give requested instructions, covered by instructions given, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

E. W. Steffner was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles C. Holl, Grover C. Julian, of Susanville, and R. L. Waggoner, of Cedarville (Archibald M. Johnson and A. A. DeLigne, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

GLENN, Justice pro tem. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement. A motion for a new trial was duly made and denied. No appeal was taken from this order, the appeal being from the judgment only.

[1] Respondent contends that, as no appeal was taken from the order denying motion for new trial, this court is without power to review the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. The same point was made, and decided adversely to this contention, in the case of People v. Steffner (Crim. No. 723, Cal. App.) 227 Pac. 690, in which an opinion has this day been filed. We refer to that case for our views on the subject.

[2-4] The sufficiency of the information was challenged by defendant, both by demurrer and motion in arrest of judgment. So far as is material to be considered here, the amended information provides:

> "E. W. Steffner is accused by the district attorney of the said county by this amended information of the crime of felony-embezzlement committed as follows:
> "The said E. W. Steffner, on or about the 5th day of August, 1922, at the said county of Lassen and before the filing of this amended information, being then and there intrusted by E. J. Craddock with the following described personal property of him the said E. J. Craddock, namely, lawful money of the United States to the amount and value of more than fifty ($50.00) dollars, to wit, the amount of $684.74 or thereabouts, and the said E. W. Steffner then and there received the said property and money in trust as aforesaid, and while so intrusted and in possession of said property, he, the said E. W. Steffner, to wit, on or about the 5th day of August, 1922, at Susanville, in said county of Lassen, state aforesaid, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and fraudulently embezzle, convert, and appropriate to his own use the said money, not in the due and lawful execution of said trust as aforesaid, contrary," etc.

It is claimed that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense and also that it does not substantially conform to the provisions of sections 950 and 952 of the Penal Code, in that the facts constituting the offense are not pleaded; it being asserted that neither the trust relation relied on, nor the character of the trust, is set forth.

The information alleges that E. J. Craddock "intrusted" the defendant with the said money, and that the said money was the money and personal property of the complaining witness; it also shows the fiduciary relation existing at the time of the appropriation by defendant of the said property of Craddock, for, following the above allegation, it is averred:

> "That the said defendant on said date received the said property and money in trust as aforesaid, and while intrusted and in possession of said property, the said defendant, on or about the 5th day of August, 1922, fraudulently," etc.

Under these allegations it is clear that defendant received and held the money of Craddock as his trustee and for his benefit.

It is uniformly held that it is necessary to state the fiduciary relation existing between the defendant and the owner of the property, as that the defendant was the agent, servant or clerk, or that the property was held by him pursuant to a trust or bailment. 7 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 418.

In People v. Neyce, 86 Cal. 393, 24 Pac. 1091, it is said:

> "The objections raised by the demurrer and motion in arrest of judgment to the sufficiency of the information are not well taken. The main point here made is that appellant is not called in the information 'bailee,' 'trustee,' or 'agent,' or formally put into any of the classes named in the sections of the Code which define embezzlement. But facts constituting the crime were fully stated, and, that being so, it was not necessary to designate the appellant by any particular name (People v. Johnson, 71 Cal. 389), and the information in all other respects was unassailable."

It is not necessary to set forth the particulars of the trust relation. In People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174, the charge being embezzlement, it is said:

> "The essential elements of embezzlement are the fiduciary relation arising where one intrusts property to another, and the fraudulent appropriation of the property by the latter. Pen. Code, § 503. The origin or particulars of the relation need not be stated. 2 Bishop's Criminal Law, § 323a."

Also, to the same effect, People v. O'Brian, 8 Cal. App. 641, 97 Pac. 679.

In Keys v. State, 112 Ga. 392, 37 S. E. 762, 81 Am. St. Rep. 63, the defendant was charged with larceny after trust, or embezzlement. In stating the nature of the charge, the court says:

> "The indictment charging, in substance, that the defendant, on January 6, 1898, was intrusted with one $5 bill, lawful money, of the value of $5, by W. J. Biggers, for the use and benefit of the latter, and did on the day and year aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, fraudulently convert the said $5 to his own use, to the injury and without the consent of Biggers, and without paying Biggers the price thereof."

The indictment was upheld. The statute under which that indictment was drawn provided:

> "If any person who has been intrusted by another with any money, * * * or any other article or thing of value, for the purpose of applying the same for the use or benefit of the owner or person delivering it, shall fraudulently convert the same to his own use, he shall be punished by imprisonment," etc. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 194.

This section is substantially the same as sections 503 and 506 of our Penal Code. Section 503 reads:

> "Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted."

Section 506 is as follows:

> "Every trustee, * * * agent * * * or person otherwise intrusted with or having in his control property for the use of any other person, who fraudulently appropriates it to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, * * * is guilty of embezzlement."

In the indictment in the Keys Case, supra, it is stated that the money was intrusted for the use and benefit of Biggers. The court points out that it is certain a trust of some kind was set out, and that it would have been more definite had it stated the way the accused was to have disposed of the money for the use and benefit of Biggers. But in this regard the court says:

> "In this respect it might have been made more definite, but can it be fairly said that, because of the omission to go further into detail, the accused was not sufficiently informed of the nature of the charge he was called upon to meet? We think not. If, as matter of fact, Biggers did intrust the accused with $5 in money with which he was to do something in behalf of the depositor, and if instead of complying with the obligation thus imposed he fraudulently converted the money to his own use, did he not know well enough what the indictment meant?"

In the instant case, while there is no direct averment to the effect that the money was intrusted for the use and benefit of Craddock, no other deduction is possible from the language used, and therefore to have added these words would have furnished no additional information. Embezzlement is larceny after trust. The information in this case alleges the trust, and, in appropriate language, the larceny thereafter. The information, while not as full and complete as might be desired, substantially complies with the provisions of the Code under which it was drawn, and is therefore sufficient. The trial court was correct in overruling the demurrer and in denying the motion in arrest of judgment.

[5, 6] Appellant contends that, assuming the evidence on the part of the prosecution to be true, it is insufficient to establish an implied finding that defendant became the agent or trustee of the prosecuting witness, E. J. Craddock, in the receipt of the money from him, for the purpose of forwarding it to the Anglo-California Trust Company; that the testimony of the prosecuting witness was so inconsistent with the undisputed facts as to be wholly unsupported; that, on the other hand, it does appear that in receiving the money he was acting exclusively for the bank and himself, and not as the agent of Craddock; that, if appellant was authorized to collect the money for the bank or for himself, or jointly for himself and the bank, immediately upon payment by Craddock he became divested of the title, and any subsequent wrongful conversion by appellant, if such there was, was not of money belonging to Craddock.

Appellant concedes that it is a well-recognized rule that courts of appeal are bound by the verdict of the jury, when supported by proper and sufficient evidence. The rule is stated by the court in People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 62 Pac. 1069, as follows:

> "For if the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive."

If the defendant was "intrusted" with the money of the prosecuting witness, and, while acting in such trust capacity, fraudulently appropriated the same, he is guilty of embezzlement. Pen. Code, § 503. The question of whether or not he was so "intrusted" is a question of fact for the jury to determine. As was said in People v. McMahan, 133 Cal. 278, 65 Pac. 571, on this particular subject:

> "Being properly instructed as to the law of the matter, as we presume the jury were, it was for them to say, from all the evidence before them, whether the money was 'intrusted' to the defendant or not. By their verdict of conviction they found that it was so intrusted. Of course, it is possible in this, as it is in most cases, to take different views of the evidence, but we think the view taken by the jury was a reasonable one."

Is the verdict of the jury justified by the facts of the case? A somewhat extensive review of the evidence will be necessary to determine this question, and, as the testimony of the witness Craddock is of prime importance in this regard, we feel justified in quoting therefrom at length.

Defendant was a retail automobile dealer in Susanville, Lassen county, Cal. On May 20, 1922, defendant, under the name of Steffner Overland Company, entered into an agreement with E. J. Craddock, wherein he agreed to sell, and Craddock agreed to buy, a certain automobile therein described, for the sum of $1,396.70. The contract provided for the payment of $575 at the date of signing, and the balance in monthly installments. This contract was assigned, by an instrument attached thereto, to the Anglo-California Trust Company, executed by Steffner Overland Company, by E. W. Steffner, manager, and dated May 31, 1922. The contract and assignment thereof were mailed by defendant to the Anglo-California Trust Company for discount. It was received by that company on or about June 1st, and a remittance made to the defendant of the sum of $765.50 in payment therefor. Under the terms of the contract the first installment became due on June 27th, and the second, as well as the subsequent installments, were to be paid on the same date in each succeeding month. The first installment was sent direct by Craddock to said company, on or about the date on which it was due. The second installment was likewise sent by him on or about July 27th. On August 5th Craddock paid the full balance owing on the contract, amounting to the sum of $684.74, to the defendant, who applied it to his own use and purpose. The prosecution is for the alleged embezzlement of this sum.

The circumstances surrounding this payment were substantially as follows:

The first conversation between the parties on the subject occurred near the post office in Susanville concerning which the witness Craddock testified:

"Q. Did you have any conversation with him [the defendant] at that time? A. I told him I wanted to pay the balance due on the contract —pay up on the car in full. I had the money, and he said it was perfectly all right to come to the office in about half an hour and we would fix it up."

Pursuant to this conversation, Craddock went to the defendant's office and there paid him the sum of $684.74, $550 of which was represented by a check drawn in Craddock's favor by one G. Orsi, and on which Craddock indorsed his name; the balance of $134.74 being paid in cash. Concerning the payment thus made Craddock testified:

"Q. At that time did you make any payment to Steffner? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How much? A. I paid Mr. Steffner $684.74.

"Q. Did he say anything at that time about that payment? A. He said he would send it in, and he would have my contract within a few days.

"Q. How did you make that payment—in what way? A. I gave him a check for $550 and the balance in cash; $134.74 in cash.

"Q. Did you get a receipt at that time? A. He gave me a receipt for it, yes."

The receipt given reads:

"No. 90 Aug. 5, 1922.

"Received of E. J. Craddock, six hundred eighty four and 74/100 dollars. Payment on contract covering purchase of Olds roadster $684.74. E. W. Steffner."

The witness testified with reference to the receipt as follows:

"Q. At the time you were in his office you saw him write the receipt, People's Exhibit 2, and deliver it to you at that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say at that time? A. He would send it to the bank and I would get my contract in a few days. That is the best I can remember that he said.

"Q. What bank did he say? A. The Anglo-California Trust Company."

Referring to a conversation between the witness and defendant on August 24th, at the latter's residence, the witness testified:

"Q. At that time what conversation was had between you and Steffner, if any? A. I got a slip showing me my payment had come due and I didn't figure I would have any more and on the 24th of August I got this notice, so I took it up and showed it to Steffner.

"Q. Did Mr. Steffner receive it from you at that time? A. Mr. Steffner took the slip.

"Q. Did he give it back to you? A. No sir.

"Q. What was that?"

At this point there was objection made; after some discussion the objection was overruled. Thereupon the following occurred:

"By Mr. Holl: Further object unless it be shown that the witness knows the contents.

"By the Court: He asked the witness what it was.

"By the Witness: It was a notice showing me my payment was coming due, $74 and some cents.

"By Mr. Nutting: To whom? A. To me.

"Q. It was a payment due to the Anglo-California Trust Company Bank? Was that a payment due from you to them? A. From them to me. It was a payment on my car.

"Q. Was it a demand from them to you to pay an installment on your contract? A. Yes, sir; that is what it was.

"Q. What did you say to Steffner at that time? A. I asked him why that came to me.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said he didn't know. He said I will take it up by wire tomorrow morning and find out why it came back to you. He said he was in San Francisco and just got back a few days ago and this was all marked 'Paid' on the books. He said, 'I seen it myself.' "

Concerning a conversation between defendant and Craddock, held on September 13th, the latter testified:

"Q. What, if anything, did you say to Steffner at that time? A. I asked him why my contract didn't come.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said that he didn't know. He didn't know why it didn't come. He said, 'I will wire tomorrow morning and find out.'

"Q. Did Mr. Steffner say anything else at that time, if you remember? Do you recall anything about his actions or manner? A. He kept stalling me off and acting as if he didn't know me."

In his cross-examination the witness testified:

"Q. In answer to the question by the district attorney, I think his question was, 'What bank?' and you said, 'The Anglo-California Bank,' referring to a time when you paid this money to Mr. Steffner. You don't know whether he mentioned the Anglo-California Bank at all at that time, do you? A. I know he mentioned he would send it to the bank and I would get the contract. I know that.

"Q. You wouldn't attempt to say those were his exact words, would you? A. That is what I understood him to say.

"Q. That is the way you remember it now? A. Yes; if I hadn't, I sure wouldn't have given him the money. * * *

"Q. Did you ask Mr. Steffner in that conversation between you and him in the post office, and when you say it was about half an hour before you went up to pay him, if it would be all right for you to pay the money to him? A. I sure did.

"Q. That is the reason you paid it to him? A. Certainly.

"Q. Because you believed that statement? A. I believed he would send it. He told me he would.

"Q. He didn't tell you at that time he would. A. He sure did.

"Q. He told you half an hour before you went up to the office? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And again after you got up to the office? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He told you that in front of the post office? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And half an hour later he told you that again? A. You bet you. * * *

"Q. Now, why didn't you tell at the preliminary examination that he told you while you were at the post office that if you gave him the money he would send it in? (An objection was here made to the question by the prosecution and overruled by the court.) A. Well, you know you don't always— when you get up on the stand you don't always think of everything the first time. I am quite excitable myself, but that is right, to the best of my knowledge.

"Q. Which is right? That he did or did not tell you at the time in front of the post office? A. That he did tell me that he would send it in.

"Q. At the time you were in front of the post office? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And again repeated that statement half an hour later in the office? A. Yes, sir; I wouldn't give him the money and think he would keep it for himself. I know what I gave it to him for. That was the understanding when I gave it to him.

"Q. That is what you now believe was the understanding? A. It was the understanding.

"Q. He gave you a receipt saying you had paid the money to him? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you understand that receipt meant what it said at the time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. It says you paid it to him? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. It doesn't say anything else only that you paid it to him? A. No, sir.

"Q. You understood that is what you were doing, what that receipt shows—paid it to him. A. Certainly, I understood I gave it to him to send in.

"Q. Why didn't you have that written on the receipt? A. Because I thought he was an honest man.

"Q. You thought you were paying it to him? A. Yes; I thought I was paying it to him.

"Q. You wasn't thinking anything about what he would do with it? A. I knew in my own mind he would send it in.

"Q. It says you paid it to him, and you testified that he said it would be all right if you paid it to him? A. Yes, sir. He said it would be just as good as if I paid it to the bank, just the same.

"Q. You thought he had authority from the bank to collect it? (Objection made by the prosecution and overruled.) A. No; I didn't think it."

The wife of the prosecuting witness also testified that defendant had stated he would send the money to the bank. It is admitted defendant retained the amount so paid him by Craddock, at least $550 of which was deposited to his own account on the 7th day of August, 1922, at which time an overdraft existed against him and in favor of a bank in Susanville where his account was kept. Notwithstanding this fact, the testimony shows that on August 24th, and after Craddock had received notice that the third installment due on his contract had not been paid, he sought defendant and inquired as to the reason, and was informed by him, in substance, that he did not know, but that he had just returned from San Francisco, and it was marked "Paid" on the books, adding that he had seen the books so marked. Appellant calls attention to the fact that there was no proof that this latter statement was untrue, and that the uncontradictory documentary evidence showed that the bank had charged the Craddock account against defendant's withholding account. The so-called "withholding" account was not a credit in defendant's favor, and was not used for the purpose of liquidating the Craddock account. Referring to the withholding account, the assistant manager of the contract department of the said trust company testified:

"It is simply a name for the account representing transactions where an automobile contract is submitted to us with a greater balance than the value of the car. We don't discount the entire contract, but in order to take care of the matter we will remit a certain amount on the contract, placing the balance in the withholding account subject to the further discount, provided the purchaser makes the payments promptly and is going to terminate the contract."

He further explained that under certain forms of contracts there was also a withholding for security of 1 per cent. of the balance which was placed in this account. On September 30, 1922, the withholding account represented approximately the sum of $700, which might eventually become a credit in defendant's favor, under the contingencies as above explained. The trust company merely made an entry in the withholding account to prevent withdrawals therefrom. But it is further to be noted that the conversation referred to was held on August 24th. Up until that time, and for some time thereafter, the Anglo-California Trust Company was not aware of the fact that defendant had been paid the amount owing under the contract; in fact he had made an installment payment earlier in the same month, and it was not until the 28th of September that he was informed by said company, by letter, to the effect that Craddock had written that defendant had been paid in full, adding:

> "If Mr. Craddock's statement is correct, and we have no reason for doubting it, you certainly must realize that full payment of the account must be made immediately by you."

If we are correct in this, then the statement of defendant to Craddock with reference to having seen the books marked "Paid" was false. Thus it appears that defendant not only concealed from Craddock the fact that he had not remitted the money paid to him, but concealed also from the trust company, whose agent he claimed to be, the fact that it had been so paid. It is true, as stated by appellant, that Craddock did not testify that it was understood or agreed that defendant should act as his "trustee" or "agent" in receiving and transmitting the money. We do not, however, view this as indicative of the fact that such an understanding was not had. Laymen, in transacting business, do not ordinarily resort to terms used by the legal profession. To determine whether there was such an understanding or agreement between Craddock and the defendant, recourse must be had to the entire transaction. Craddock stated, in answer to a question asked by the defense, that he did not think defendant had the authority from the bank to collect the sum so paid, and which was evidenced by the receipt above set forth. Concerning the giving of the receipt he stated, in effect, that at the time it was signed defendant said the money would be sent to the trust company and that he would receive his contract. While the receipt is not signed by the defendant as agent for Craddock, it is also to be noted that it is not signed in the name of the trust company, by defendant, purporting to be acting for it, nor did the defendant claim to have imparted this information to the complaining witness. That he had made the contract with defendant could not be taken as knowledge on Craddock's part of any authorization of defendant to collect. There is no question of ostensible agency so far as Craddock is concerned.

> "The application of the rule of ostensible agency or authority depends primarily upon the acts or conduct or words of the principal, and not upon the acts or conduct or words of the agent." Wiley B. Allen Co., etc., v. Thama M. Wood, 32 Cal. App. 76, 84, 162 Pac. 121, 124.

It is not claimed Craddock had notice from the trust company of any authority on defendant's part to collect the installments under the contract; in fact his payments had been made, in accordance with the policy of the trust company, direct to it. The contract under consideration also contained a provision to the effect that, in case of assignment thereof, all payments thereunder by the purchaser "shall be paid to such assignee without recoupment, set-off, or counterclaim of any sort whatsoever." Thus there appears from the evidence to have been no source of information from which it can be reasonably said that Craddock had knowledge of any such claim of agency on defendant's part. We are not permitted, of course, to indulge in the supposition that he surmised such to be the fact. Considering these matters, our view is that the verdict of the jury was amply supported by the evidence.

Appellant earnestly insists that, although the Anglo-California Trust Company's policy and desire was to have purchasers remit direct to it, nevertheless there was proof to the effect that it did permit appellant to make collections on its behalf; that appellant was its agent for that purpose, and, if there was a conversion, it was not of the money of Craddock. People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520, is cited as sustaining this view. It is also contended:

> "If the rediscounting of the contract is to be considered, as it appears to have been regarded at the trial, to be an absolute sale and transfer of the contract and the car therein described to the bank, then there was actually transferred only a partial interest, although the greater interest therein to the bank, because, as shown by the evidence generally, the bank was entitled only to the amount of the proceeds and returns of the contract sufficient to reimburse itself with its interest and discount. Any overplus belonged to appellant. This constituted the bank and the appellant joint obligees, and payment could have been made to either by Craddock, and his obligation discharged." Hence "Craddock became divested of his title to the money when he paid it to appellant, the bank's joint obligee."

On the other hand, it is asserted that if the transaction be treated as a loan to appellant and a pledge of the contract by him to the bank, then appellant as pledgor had a right to make collection for the benefit of the pledgee and himself.

[7] These various contentions are untenable for several reasons. Assuming there was a conflict in the evidence as to the capacity in which defendant received the money, the jury has determined the question by its verdict adversely to these contentions. People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 234, 10 Pac. 502, 507. If the agreement and understanding between Craddock and defendant was to the effect that the money was intrusted to defendant as the agent and trustee of Craddock, defendant is now estopped from denying he was such, or from claiming to have acted in any other capacity. People v. Treadwell, supra; People v. Robertson, 6 Cal. App. 514, 92 Pac. 498.

In the former case it is said:

> "The evidence is overwhelming that Quinn, when he paid his moneys upon the note, acted with the defendant as the attorney and agent of Haneke for the purpose of receiving and forwarding them to Haneke. He so understood it from Haneke and the defendant himself. He knew nothing of the indorsement of the note to Mrs. Wise, for the defendant had not informed him. The defendant was therefore, when he received the money from Quinn, in fact the agent, or acting as the agent, of Haneke, and he is estopped in law from denying that he was the agent."

[8] Appellant strongly urges that the evidence clearly established the fact that he was the agent of the trust company in the collection of the money from Craddock. It is claimed this agency arose through a course of conduct and dealing between the parties. It is true that he had assigned many contracts similar to the one under consideration to the trust company, and the dealings between the parties in relation thereto had extended over a considerable period. The policy of the company required purchasers under these contracts to make payments direct to it. As defendant was a guarantor under the terms of the assignments of the contracts, he was notified from time to time of the delinquency of purchasers, and in such communications was directed to bring the accounts up to date or to see the purchasers and collect the back installments, or some other similar direction was given. Whatever authority may have been contained in these letters was special, not general. In the instant case the amounts payable under the contract had not become due. No similar transaction have we found in the record. Possibly there may have been instances where, by special direction, defendant had been called upon to make some collection on behalf of the trust company, but of course these cases cannot be used as a means of establishing general agency to make collections under all circumstances or in all cases. Defendant did testify that it was his custom to collect money due on contracts and to transmit the same to the company; that sometimes he deposited the money and remitted his check. Apparently these were delinquent collections. We believe these facts are not sufficient to bring the defendant within the provisions of section 2316 of the Civil Code. That section reads:

> "Actual authority is such as a principal intentionally confers upon the agent, or intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, allows the agent to believe himself to possess."

[9] But if we assume the defendant did believe himself possessed of authority to act as agent for said company in the Craddock transaction, he did not communicate such fact to the latter, nor was Craddock aware of that fact from any other source of information, and the defendant is now estopped from availing himself of this character of defense. The facts in the Van Ewan Case, supra, are entirely dissimilar to those in the present case. The points which we have discussed were not there referred to.

[10] The court admitted in evidence, over the objection of defendant, a copy of a letter from the Anglo-California Trust Company addressed to him, dated October 23, 1922. The body of the letter is as follows:

> "Notwithstanding the fact that you have heretofore denied that you received full payment on the E. J. Craddock account, we are to-day in receipt of a copy of what purports to be your receipt No. 90, in the sum of $684.74, under date of August 10th. The above-mentioned copy has been forwarded to us by Mr. George E. Gardner, assistant district attorney of Butte county, and we have no reason to doubt that it is an authentic copy. Agreeably to your request of recent date, we forwarded our collection last Friday to the Bank of Lassen County, to cover the balance due us on the Craddock account, and we trust that this draft will be promptly honored upon presentation."

Respondent does not attempt to justify the relevancy of the first portion of the letter, but does contend that the objection made that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial" was addressed to the letter as a whole, and, as the latter part was material, the court did not therefore err in its admission. Appellant does not dispute the proposition of law thus advanced, but denies the materiality of the entire letter. Appellant asserts that, as it contained the only reference to any denial of the payment made by Craddock to defendant, proof of that fact would be fatal to the defense that defendant had collected it in the regular course of business and expected to have the same deducted from his funds in the hands of the trust company. Under the theory suggested by appellant, a number of letters from said trust company to him were introduced in an endeavor to show, as we gather therefrom, an implied authority on his part to collect on its behalf from purchasers under contracts assigned to said company, and also to show that it had been the practice of said company to deduct from sums or credits in its hands belonging to defendant the various amounts thus collected by him, and this course of procedure had been relied upon and followed by defendant in the instant case. The latter portion of the letter was a reply to a telegram from defendant, wherein he requested that the Craddock contract be sent to the Bank of Lassen with a sight draft attached. The telegram and the reply thereto negative the theory that either he or the trust company recognized that the Craddock account had been paid, or that the amount thereof had been deducted or withheld from any funds belonging to defendant, or that defendant was then relying on such a custom or practice. The letter was one of a number between the parties throwing light upon those introduced by the defense, and was therefore admissible. The evidence does not disclose a defense along the lines suggested. The defense introduced a letter dated September 28, 1922 (an excerpt from which we have heretofore inserted and which is also included in the portion here referred to), from the Anglo-California Trust Company to defendant, containing, among other things, the following:

> "It will no doubt interest you to know that we have received a communication from Mr. E. J. Craddock, indicating that on September 5th he paid to you the total balance due on the account, whereas you but sent to us on September 15th the August 29th installment. If Mr. Craddock's statement is correct, and we have no reason for doubting it, you most certainly must realize that full payment of the account must be made immediately by you. For your information I am inclosing herewith a copy of the letter received from Mr. Craddock, together with my reply." (The money was received by defendant on August 5th, and the error in the letter is explained in the testimony of one of the witnesses.)

[11] It was the duty of the defendant, if it be assumed for the moment he was the agent of the trust company in making the collection from Craddock, to notify his principal and to turn the money so collected over to it within a reasonable time. Fraudulently secreting property with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it is embezzlement. Pen. Code, § 506. The money so collected was never turned over either to Craddock or to the said trust company, but was appropriated to defendant's own use and purpose. The facts fail to substantiate the suggested defense.

[12] On redirect examination the witness Lockhart testified, in answer to questions by the prosecution:

> "Q. You testified on cross-examination, I think both yesterday and to-day, that Mr. Steffner had enough money on deposit, or enough credits with the Anglo-California Trust Company to take up the entire Craddock contract. Is that correct? On September 30th? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. You also testified that you didn't take up the Craddock contract by charging Mr. Steffner's account with the amount? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Why was that not done?
> "By Mr. Holl: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. It is a self-serving declaration, calling for the conclusion of the witness and not redirect.
> "By the Court: To what time does this relate?
> "By Mr. Hardy: September 30th. The same date that was mentioned in the question of counsel for defendant.
> "By the Court: I will overrule the objection.
> "A. There was only one installment due on September 30th. We had no right to deduct the entire amount of the contract."

Thereupon a motion was made to strike out the latter part of the answer as calling for the conclusion of the witness and contradictory of the terms of the contract. The part objected to does seem to be in the nature of a conclusion, but the reasonable construction is, to our minds, that it was an attempt by the witness to state or assign the reason why the trust company had not taken up the Craddock account in the manner suggested, rather than an attempt to state the terms of the contract. Substantially the same matter was brought out by the defense on cross-examination of the same witness.

[13] Complaint is made of the ruling of the court permitting the witness Craddock to testify, over the objection of the defense, to the payment of a draft drawn by the Anglo-California Trust Company against him for the sum of $629. This matter was fully covered, however, without objection of any kind, by the testimony of the witness Lockhart. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine its admissibility, as no prejudice could have resulted from its reception.

[14, 15] The court gave of its own motion the following instruction:

> "The court instructs you that, if any person assumes to act as the agent of another, and in such assumed capacity he is intrusted with, and received into his care and custody, the property of another, for the use of such other person, and thereafter fraudulently and feloniously appropriates and converts such property to his own use, or to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, he is guilty of embezzlement."

Appellant states that this was inapplicable and confusing, in that it may have misled the jury into the belief that he might have been guilty because of his collecting from Craddock while pretending to be an agent of the Anglo-California Trust Company. It is also stated that there was no evidence that defendant ever assumed to act as the agent of Craddock; hence the instruction was inapplicable. We have previously set forth excerpts from the evidence sufficient to show that the jury was justified in its implied finding that defendant was intrusted with the money of Craddock. We do not think the instruction was confusing, for the reason that all the instructions must be read together. One of the instructions proposed by defendant, and given by the court, was as follows:

> "Steffner, defendant, is charged with embezzling certain property from Craddock. He is not being tried for embezzling anything from the Anglo-California Trust Company. So, unless you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that he has embezzled from Craddock, you must find him not guilty."

The court also in its charge referred to the information which had theretofore been read to the jury, and instructed the jury that the plea of not guilty put in issue every material allegation of the information, and it therefore became necessary for the people to establish all such allegations to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. The information leaves no doubt as to the nature of the charge. Reading these instructions together, it is clear the jury could not have been misled.

[16, 17] The following proposed instruction was offered by defendant and refused:

> "A defendant who has converted money to his own use, believing he had a right to do so, is not guilty of embezzlement, even though he is mistaken, and did not have the right to do so."

The court gave instead thereof the following:

> "You are instructed that if, upon consideration of the whole case, you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the appropriation of the money charged in the information to have been embezzled by the defendant was made by the defendant upon the belief, honestly entertained by him, that he had a lawful right to appropriate the money, the act was not criminal."

It is claimed that the refusal to give the one and the giving of the other constituted prejudicial error, as the defendant relied upon the defense outlined in section 511 of the Penal Code. The objection to the instruction given is addressed to the portion italicized. Section 511 of the Penal Code reads:

> "Upon any indictment for embezzlement it is a sufficient defense that the property was appropriated openly and avowedly, and under a claim of title preferred in good faith, even though such claim is untenable. But this provision does not excuse the unlawful retention of the property of another to offset or pay demands held against him."

The court was justified in its refusal to give the proposed instruction, for the reason that, to constitute a defense under said section the property must be appropriated "openly and avowedly and under a claim of title preferred in good faith." This provision was not covered by the instruction proposed, to the effect that a defendant is not guilty of embezzlement where he has converted money to his own use, "believing he has a right to do so." Defendant was not entitled, however, to any instruction embracing the principles of law covered by said section of the Penal Code, and therefore the refusal of the one and the giving of the other did not operate to his prejudice.

In the case of People v. Bracklis, 54 Cal. App. 40, 200 Pac. 1062, an instruction following the language of the first provision of said section 511 of the Penal Code was offered and refused. As to this the court says:

> "The defendant did not claim the right to appropriate the property to his own use. If his testimony be true and the inference of his counsel therefrom correct, then appellant was a bailee for Gale Bros., with authority to sell and under obligation to account for the proceeds. Embezzlement of the proceeds of such sale might constitute a different crime from that charged but not an appropriation under a claim of title preferred in good faith. While the proposed instruction states a correct proposition of law, it is not applicable to the evidence."

In the case at bar the prosecution claimed the money was intrusted to defendant for the use and benefit of Craddock, while the defense maintained it was paid to defendant as the agent for the Anglo-California Trust Company. In neither case did he have the right to appropriate the property to his own use; therefore, the instruction given by the court to the effect that, if the jury found "to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt" that if defendant appropriated the money upon the belief honestly entertained by him that he had a lawful right to do so, the act was not criminal, was not prejudicial to the defendant. That he received the property in trust for some one is admitted; that it was never paid over is not denied. The claim now made that it was appropriated openly and avowedly and in good faith is not supported by the evidence, and under the facts of the case runs counter to the provisions of sections 511 and 512 of the Penal Code; the former section providing as above set forth, and the latter section that intent to restore property embezzled is no defense or ground for mitigation of punishment, if not restored before the information is laid before a magistrate or an indictment found by the grand jury, charging the commission of the offense.

[18] It is claimed the court erred in refusing the following instruction proposed by defendant:

> "The statutory crime of embezzlement is not a substitute for imprionment for debt, and cannot be used to punish a party for failure to comply with ordinary obligations to pay money."

As previously stated, the money was either intrusted to defendant for Craddock, or, under defendant's theory, was paid to him as agent for the Anglo-California Trust Company. Under neither theory was the proposed instruction applicable. It is not explicit, nor can it be told therefrom to what portion of the evidence it was intended to apply. We find no evidence justifying the giving of the proposed instruction in its present form.

[19] A number of other instructions proposed by defendant, covering various features of the crime of embezzlement, were refused, and the court's refusal is now assigned as error. We are satisfied that the instructions given by the court substantially covered the principles of law contained in those so proposed. It was not error, therefore, to refuse to further instruct on the subject.

Reading the record as a whole, no reasonable doubt can be entertained as to the guilt of the defendant; in fact, there seems to be no substantial evidence to the contrary.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LUCAS. (Cr. 742.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1924.)

1. Forgery 🔑4—May consist of either making a false instrument or passing an instrument known to be false.

Under Pen. Code, § 470, forgery as defined may consist of either of two kinds of acts; making of a false instrument and passing of an instrument known to be false.

2. Criminal law 🔑371(5)—Evidence of other offense limited to question of fraudulent intent held admissible.

In a prosecution for forgery, by making and passing false check, court did not err in admitting evidence of other offense, where it was specially limited to question of fraudulent intent and both transactions were alike.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sarcamento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

R. M. Lucas, alias George Chandler, was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. Appellant, having been prosecuted and convicted in the superior court of Sacramento county upon an information charging him with the crime of forgery, presents to this court his claims that there was error in the trial court on the part of the prosecution and in the following particulars, to wit: First, that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and, secondly, that the court erred in permitting the introduction of evidence of other crimes.

1. The information upon which the defendant was tried charged the defendant with the crime of forgery, in language as follows:

> That he "did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, knowingly, falsely, and fraudulently with the intent to prejudice, damage, and injure one H. E. Reedy make, alter, forge, and counterfeit a certain instrument in writing in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Sacramento, Calif., July 5th, 1923, No. 71. Fifth and J Street Branch. United Bank & Trust Company $\frac{90\text{–}31}{12}$ of California: Pay to the order of R. N. Lucas $24.50, twenty-four and 50/100 dollars, for labor. L. B. Wilson.'
> "And he, the said R. N. Lucas, true name John Chandler, then and there well knowing the same to be false, altered, forged, and counterfeited did then and there, to wit, on the 5th day of July, 1923, at the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently, and with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud the said H. E. Reedy, utter, publish, and pass the same as genuine and true to the said H. E. Reedy."

Section 470 of the Penal Code, in so far as it is here applicable, provides as follows:

> "Every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, or of a fictitious person, knowing that he has no authority so to do, to, or falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits, any * * * check, * * * or utters, publishes, passes, or attempts to pass, as true and genuine, any * * * [check] knowing the same to be false, altered, forged, or counterfeited, with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud any person, * * * is guilty of forgery."

[1] It will thus be seen that the crime of forgery, as defined in said section, may consist of either of two different kinds of acts—the making of a false instrument, and the passing of an instrument known to be false.

It is plain that the testimony herein presents a clear case under section 476 of the Penal Code. Why the prosecution was had under section 470 instead of under 476 need not, however, concern us. The testimony taken at the preliminary examination may have left the matter in some doubt. Section 470 of the Penal Code was amended in 1905, and apparently for the purpose of making it sufficiently broad to cover the making of a fictitious check, as well as forged checks.

In People v. Bernard, 21 Cal. App. 56, 130 Pac. 1063, the defendant was prosecuted for the identical offense as here charged, and the proof was substantially as here produced and upon appeal a like objection was made. That case is authority for the right to prosecute under either section 470 or 476 of the Penal Code. A portion of that decision is as follows:

> "Appellant claims that the court erred, for the reason, as he claims, that a prosecution for making a fictitious check should be under section 476 of the Penal Code, and not under section 470, under which this case was prosecuted, citing in support thereof People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433, and People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538. Since those cases were decided, however, section 470 has been amended to avoid the rule laid down in those cases and so as to cover the case made by the proof in this action, and covered by the instruction given by the court and now challenged by appellant. Stats. 1905, p. 673."

Prosecutions were being had before the 1905 amendment, and many cases failed solely because, upon an information charging forgery, a defendant would cause it to appear that the check was a fictitious check, and thus thwart the prosecution. In 12 Cal. Jur. § 7, it is laid down that a prosecution for forgery, where it is accomplished by passing a fictitious check, may be had under either section 470 or 476 of the Penal Code, since said amendment of 1905.

It may be pertinent to here remark that no demurrer or other motion was made challenging the information.

It will be seen that the defendant was charged, not alone with making a false check, but was by other language charged with passing a false check. Had defendant by demurrer objected to the information on the ground that he had a right to be advised of what the falsity consisted, he would have some standing, but the information was unchallenged. The evidence fully sustained that part of the charge.

[2] 2. Upon a charge of forgery, and indeed upon all the charges of this kind, fraud is the essential element that must be laid at the door of the accused. Fraud, by its nature, is generally conceived in secret. To practice it of very necessity requires secrecy. Hence, the intent with which a false check is passed becomes necessary to be proved. A long line of authorities sustains the introduction of evidence of like crimes, especially when associated with the crime charged, or at or about the same time, to prove intent. Evidence of this second offense was in the instant case specially limited to that issue. See the cases cited in section 14 under the title of Forgery (volume 12, Cal. Jur. 664). Also, see sections 309 and 315, Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) To sustain the text, Wigmore, as usual, collects and clearly distinguishes the cases on this proposition.

The proof here showed the giving of a false check, in payment of room rent, and that the defendant took back a balance in change, over and above the amount of the false check. The other offense, offered to prove intent, showed a payment of a like fraudulent check for board at a restaurant for a week in advance, and the taking back of a similar amount, as change. Both transactions were alike.

The record does not disclose any testimony either in denial of the main testimony or as to that of the similar offense.

There being no substantial error in the record, it is ordered that the judgment and the order be affirmed.

CLARKSON v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4877.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 20, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1924.)

1. Evidence ⚷595—Jury not bound to draw conclusion from plaintiff's resumption of employment that he was not permanently injured.

In passenger's action for injuries, that plaintiff resumed his former employment was evidence from which jury might draw the conclusion that he had not been permanently injured, but they were not required to do so.

2. Trial ⚷260(1)—Refusal of instruction covered by given instructions held not erroneous.

Instruction was not erroneous where it was completely covered by other given instructions.

3. Witnesses ⚷269(9)—Cross-examination of railroad switchman touching written agreement between railroad and street railroad held improper.

In passenger's action for injuries when street car on which he was riding collided with railroad train, cross-examination of a railroad switchman by street railroad concerning a written agreement between railroad and street railroad, regarding manner in which each should handle its rolling stock at intersection where accident occurred, was improper, where such subject was not touched by railroad in its direct examination of such switchman.

4. Customs and usages ⚷17—Instruction on custom prevailing at street railroad intersection with railroad held not to vary written agreement between parties.

In passenger's action for injuries when street car on which he was riding collided with railroad train, instruction that, if street railroad allowed railroad to have precedence at crossing where accident occurred, railroad had a right to rely on such custom was not erroneous as varying a written agreement between the parties as to precedence at such crossing, since action was based on negligence of parties to written agreement by one who was not a party thereto, and as to each of railroads, issue was negligence or no negligence.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1048(6)—Refusal to permit defendant to cross-examine plaintiff's witness held not prejudicial.

In an action for injuries, refusal to permit defendant to cross-examine a neurologist called as plaintiff's witness was not prejudicial in that it prevented defendant from showing that plaintiff was a malingerer, since defendant was allowed to go into such theory when its own witnesses were upon stand.

6. Damages ⚷128—Verdict will not be deemed excessive, where nothing to show that it was not result of cool and dispassionate consideration of jury.

A verdict will not be deemed excessive, where there is nothing in the record which would justify conclusion that it was not a result of cool and dispassionate consideration of jury.

7. Appeal and error ⚷1067—Refusal of instructions concerning railroad's duty to ring its bell held not reversible error, where such failure would not have relieved street railroad from liability.

In passenger's action for injuries when street car on which he was riding collided with a railroad train, refusal of street railroad's instructions concerning duty of railroad to ring its bell, as required by Civ. Code, § 486, was not reversible error, since railroad's negligence would not have relieved street railroad from liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by William H. Clarkson against the United Railroads of San Francisco and another. Judgment for plaintiff against named defendant, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Sturtevant, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco (Ivores R. Dains, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

E. A. Douthitt and John D. Willard, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff was riding as a passenger on one of the street cars operated by the United Railroads at a time when the street car came in collision with the rear end of a train of freight cars that was being operated by the Western Pacific Railroad Company. He commenced an action against both defendants to recover damages for the injuries which he sustained. The jury brought in a verdict in the plaintiff's favor against the United Railroads but in favor of the Western Pacific Railroad Company. The United Railroads thereafter made a motion for a new trial. The trial court denied the motion on the condition that the plaintiff should waive $5,000 of the amount of the verdict. The plaintiff accepted the condition, and filed his waiver, and from the judgment as modified the United Railroads has appealed, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

[1] During the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced in evidence the American Experience Mortality Tables; thereafter the court instructed the jury that the tables were admitted merely as a guide to estimate the damages, in the event that the jury should find that the plaintiff had been permanently injured. The gist of the appellant's point in this behalf is that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company as an engineer in one of its stations in San Francisco; that shortly after the accident the plaintiff was able to, and did, resume his former position; and that, at the time of the trial, he was and had been steadily employed in his old position. On these facts the appellant predicates the statement that the plaintiff had not been permanently injured, notwithstanding the fact that several witnesses had given evidence to the effect that under certain conditions it was possible that the plaintiff had been permanently injured. We think that the matter of resuming his former employment was evidence from which the jury might draw the conclusion that the plaintiff had not been permanently injured, but that the jury was not bound to draw that conclusion.

[2] The appellant requested the trial court to instruct the jury that its verdict must be for the United Railroads, if the negligence of the Western Pacific Railroad Company was the sole proximate cause of the collision. As stated by the appellant the instruction is a correct statement of the law. However, by instructions Nos. 82 and 83, the subject-matter was completely covered and the trial court did not commit an error because it did not repeat an instruction on the subject.

[3] On the 4th day of January, 1917, the two railroad companies entered into an agreement in writing, and inserted certain covenants regarding the manner in which each of the contracting parties would handle its rolling stock at the intersection of the streets where the accident occurred. During the trial of the case the Western Pacific Railroad Company called as a witness a switchman, Frank J. Brenenman. On his direct examination that company propounded to him no questions of or concerning the written agreement. When the defendant

United Railroads took up its cross-examination of the witness, certain questions were propounded to the witness of and concerning the written agreement. To each of those questions counsel for the Western Pacific Railroad Company interposed objections. The trial court sustained the objections, and the appellant complains of those rulings. There was no error committed in making the rulings. Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 389, 390, 104 Pac. 986.

[4] Acting upon the request of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, the trial court instructed the jury that, if it should find that by usage and custom the agents of the United Railroads allowed the cars or trains of the Western Pacific Railroad Company to have precedence at such crossing, " * * * then the agents, servants, and employees of the defendant, the Western Pacific Railroad Company, at the time of the accident involved in this action, had a right to rely on such usage and custom. * * *." The appellant contends that the ruling did violence to the rule that a contract in writing may not be modified by word of mouth. That contention would be altogether sound in an action between the parties to the written agreement, if the action were based on the written agreement; but this is an action based on the alleged negligence of the parties to the alleged written agreement, and the action is being maintained by one who was not a party to that written agreement. As to each of the defendants the issue in this case was negligence or no negligence. The court instructed the jury:

> "Negligence is failure in the matter of care under the circumstances. Every man is bound to be careful that others take no harm by his conduct or his actions. The measure of his duty is the circumstances of the case. What may be absolutely necessary under some circumstances, to protect others from harm, may not be necessary under other circumstances. Negligence, as I have said, is the lack of care under the circumstances. It is the doing of something which, under the circumstances and in view of his duty to endeavor to protect other people from harm by reason of his conduct, a reasonable and prudent man of ordinary common sense, would not do. * * *"

As stated by this court in a recent decision, Adamson v. City & County of San Francisco, Civil 4732, filed March 20, 1924, (Cal. App.) 225 Pac. 875:

> "Where, as here, a usual practice or custom has obtained, and where, as here, the claim is made that one of the parties has, to the discomfiture of the other, without notice, departed from the usual custom, or practice, the courts have by an unbroken line of decisions held that the question of negligence on the part of the defendant, and the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, are both questions for the jury to determine in the light of all of the facts, including the evidence tending to establish the alleged custom or practice and the alleged deviation therefrom."

As between the two defendants in this case we think it is clear that the same rule should apply. The question was not what each of the defendants had agreed to do, but the question distinctly was what custom or practice theretofore had obtained.

Acting upon the request of the plaintiff, the trial court instructed the jury as to its duty if the jury should find that the plaintiff was luetic at the time of the accident. The appellant objected to the giving of each of those instructions. As we understand the appellant on this point, the objection rests mainly upon the contention that there is no evidence in the record that the plaintiff was at that time luetic. However, we think that the appellant overlooks some testimony. The evidence is not at all strong on the point, but we are unable to say that there was no evidence.

[5] The plaintiff called as an expert neurologist Dr. Otto G. Freyermuth. On his examination in chief he was asked many questions and made many answers of and concerning traumatic neurosis. On cross-examination he was asked:

> "Q. Isn't it a fact that traumatic neurosis is commonly known among the medical profession as 'litigant's neurosis' or 'railroad spine,' and is commonly attributed to people who have claims that are being prosecuted against railroad corporations?"

The trial court sustained an objection. Assuming that the trial court erred in its ruling, the ruling was not prejudicial. The appellant claims that the ruling operated to prevent the appellant from showing that the plaintiff was a malingerer. The ruling did not so operate. Thereafter, when some of the witnesses for the appellant were on the stand, the appellant was allowed without any objection to go into the proof of the malingerer theory.

[6] The verdict, as modified by the stipulation of the plaintiff, is attacked by the appellant as being excessive, but there is nothing in the record which will justify the conclusion that the verdict was not a result of the cool and dispassionate consideration of the jury. Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., supra.

[7] On the trial of the case it was the theory of the plaintiff that the Western Pacific Railroad Company was guilty of negligence in failing to comply with the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code, and that it should have had a bell on the engine, and that the bell should have been ringing as the train proceeded from a point at least 80 rods distant from the point of crossing Seventeenth street and De Haro street. Neither defendant made an issue between itself and its codefendant as to culpability. As to the duty of the Western Pacific Railroad Company to ring its bell, the appellant requested the trial court to give three several instructions of and concerning the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code. If the instructions had been tendered by the plaintiff, it will be conceded they should have been given. But the appellant was interested solely in the issue as to its own negligence or nonnegligence. If the appellant was negligent and its codefendant was also negligent, that fact would not relieve the appellant from liability. In this connection we understand that the very core of the appellant's point is that the instructions in question served to bring out the fact that the appellant was guiltless and that the negligence of the Western Pacific Railroad Company was the sole proximate cause of the accident. But, in reply to this contention, there are two answers. The instructions in question were not addressed to the subject of sole liability. In the second place instructions 82 and 83 were addressed to sole liability, and both of them were, at appellant's request, duly given.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

STEINMETZ v. STEINMETZ. (Civ. 4824.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 10, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1924.)

Divorce ⚷213—Property settlement agreement does not preclude award of alimony pendente lite.

A property settlement agreement between husband and wife, in accordance with Civ. Code, § 159, being subject to examination and approval by the court, does not deprive the court of power to grant alimony pendente lite, under section 137, nor is it necessary that such contract shall have been adjudged invalid prior to such award.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Joseph P. Steinmetz against Zella D. Steinmetz, wherein defendant filed cross-complaint. From order allowing defendant alimony pendente lite, counsel fees, and costs, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Crawford & Mayock, of Gilroy, and Maurice J. Rankin, of San Jose, for appellant.

Rea & Caldwell, of San Jose, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of Santa Clara, state of California, directing the plaintiff to pay to the defendant the sum of $60 a month for her support pending the trial of a divorce action, and the further sum of $10 for costs, and $250 for counsel fees in said action in which defendant had filed a cross-complaint.

In the trial court the plaintiff opposed the granting of the motion for alimony pendente lite, costs, and attorney's fees upon the ground that the parties had entered into a contract for the settlement of their property rights, under which the defendant had received the sum of $1,000 and had relinquished all other claims against the property of the plaintiff and the property of the community. The agreement between the parties with reference to their property rights was offered in evidence at the hearing upon the motion, as were also the pleadings in the divorce action in which the defendant and cross-complainant attacked such agreement as fraudulent and void.

Appellant contends that it is apparent upon its face that said agreement is not objectionable in any way under the decisions dealing with agreements of this character which have been held to be contra bonos mores, and that, unless a hearing was had upon the issue that the same had been obtained by undue influence or fraud and a finding made thereon, it stands as a binding agreement between the parties, and precludes the trial court from making any allowance for alimony and costs contrary to its provisions.

We are thus confronted with the question: Does a contract between husband and wife settling out of court their property rights, in accordance with the provisions of section 159 of the Civil Code, which contract does not show upon its face that it is contra bonos mores, and which contract has not been adjudicated null and void because obtained by fraud, undue influence, or for any other reason, deprive the trial court of its power to grant alimony pendente lite under the provisions of section 137, Civil Code? We think the case of McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 173, 190 Pac. 458, is pertinent. In that case—

"After judgment the defendant moved the court on affidavits showing she was practically destitute and had no means of her own, for an order directing plaintiff to pay her costs and counsel fees on appeal. The plaintiff filed a counter affidavit, in which he alleged the execution of the contract of separation referred to; that it provided for, and he had paid to the defendant, the sum of one hundred dollars for her costs and counsel fees in the action. He objected to making any further payments and interposed the stipulation of the contract as a bar to the granting of the motion. The court overruled the objection, and, refusing to be governed by the provision of the contract relating to counsel fees and costs, made the allowance complained of. The question presented on this appeal is the right of the court to make the order, in view of the provision of the contract. * * *"

It is true that in the above-cited case the opinion states that the portion of the contract of separation which governed the amount to be paid for counsel fees in the event of a divorce was void as contra bonos mores, and therefore of no force and effect; but it expressly said that for another reason the trial court might have disregarded the provisions of said contract relating to counsel fees and costs. The other reason was:

> "Our statute provides that during the pendency of a divorce action the court may, in its discretion, compel the husband to pay the wife any money necessary to prosecute or defend the cause. Civ. Code, § 137. * * * The courts of this state have consistently recognized and upheld the broad discretionary power vested in the trial judges, by the above section of the Code, in these matters. In refusing to sanction an agreement, between an attorney and a plaintiff in a divorce action for a contingent fee, the Supreme Court pointed out that in such cases 'the law has taken care that the wife shall not be without assistance in proper cases either to prosecute or defend such actions. * * * The reason or necessity therefor does not exist in such cases as in the others for allowing contingent attorney's fees, and where the reason ceases the rule or law also ceases.' Newman v. Freitas, supra. In yet another case the same court was called upon to construe a contract similar, in effect, to the provision in the agreement we are here considering. It was there said: 'Nor in the case of suit could the agreement control the action of the court in the exercise of its discretion in allowing alimony or attorney's fees.' In re Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393, 177 Pac. 150. Assuming, as claimed by appellant, but not so holding, that it may have been unnecessary for the court, in deciding the case, to have used the language quoted, we consider the statement significant, as being in complete accord with what we conceive to be the consistent policy of the courts of this state in such matters.
> "Appellant relies upon the case of Lee v. Lee, 55 Mont. 426, 178 Pac. 173, as fully supporting his contention. While the court there takes a view contrary to that which seems to prevail in this state, we are unwilling to accept it as final authority. We are satisfied it is best to leave the matter of costs and counsel fees, in divorce actions to the discretion of the trial court, in whose exclusive jurisdiction it has been vested by legislative enactment. If it is desirable or expedient to settle these matters out of court, such agreements must be subjected to the examination of the court. Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 513."

It would seem that the decision from which the foregoing extract is taken rests upon the broad ground that the matter of costs and counsel fees in divorce actions has been exclusively vested in the discretion of the trial court by legislative enactment, and that any agreement made by the parties attempting to settle such matters is subject to the examination and sanction of the court. This was recognized in the later decision of Whiting v. Whiting (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 92.

In the case of Millar v. Millar, 51 Cal. App. 718, at page 729, 197 Pac. 811, 816, it was said:

> "It cannot be said in any just sense that an allowance for suit money or for temporary alimony involves a claim 'arising upon contract.' It is a matter entirely of statutory regulation and is not affected by any agreement of the parties."

The answer to appellant's position that he has a right to stand upon his contract with the respondent until the same is set aside in a proper proceeding is that under the decisions hereinbefore cited all such contracts must be made subject to the discretion of the trial court vested in it by section 137 of the Civil Code.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

LOCKE-PADDON v. LOCKE-PADDON et al. (S. F. 10921.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1924. Rehearing Denied July 17, 1924.)

1. Divorce 🔑285—Appeal from allowance of alimony pendente lite held not dismissible.

On appeal from order allowing alimony pendente lite, counsel fees, and costs, where testimony heard on motion for such allowance was not preserved, and consequently not in the record, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, but, where court had before it typewritten copy of judgment roll, certified by clerk of trial court, the appeal was not dismissible.

2. Husband and wife 🔑278(2)—Parties may competently settle property rights; contract subject to approval of court.

It is competent for husband and wife, pursuant to Civ. Code, § 159, to contract for the purpose of settling their property rights, though such contract is between persons occupying confidential relations and subject to review and approval by the court, under Civ. Code, §§ 158, 2235.

3. Divorce 🔑214(4)—Court in action for has jurisdiction to determine validity of property settlement agreement.

In action for divorce on application for alimony pendente lite, court has jurisdiction to determine validity of property settlement agreement, under Civ. Code, § 159; a separate proceeding to question the validity of such agreement being unnecessary.

4. Divorce 🔑214(4)—Good faith of wife prosecuting action only question considered on application for alimony pendente lite.

On application for alimony pendente lite and costs, in absence of any issue as to the fact of the marriage, good faith of wife prosecuting such action only will be considered, not merits of her claims.

5. Divorce 🔑285, 286—Allowance of alimony pendente lite not reversed, except for abuse of discretion; allowance of alimony pendente not reversed in absence of showing as to evidence heard by court.

Allowance of alimony pendente lite being within the discretion of the court, under Civ. Code, § 137, its action will not be reversed, except for abuse of discretion, nor in absence of showing as to evidence heard by court.

6. Contracts 🔑266(2)—Placing of parties in statu quo not always prerequisite to rescission on ground of fraud.

Rescission of a contract on ground of fraud will not always be denied merely because parties cannot be placed in statu quo.

7. Divorce 🔑209—Wife not required to restore moneys received under property agreement as prerequisite to right to alimony pendente lite, notwithstanding agreement.

A wife alleging fraud in procurement of a property settlement agreement, and seeking an allowance of alimony pendente lite and costs, notwithstanding contract, is not required as a prerequisite to such relief to restore moneys previously received by her.

8. Divorce 🔑284—Appeal from order allowing alimony pendente lite does not defeat power of court to make nunc pro tunc order correcting one appealed from.

After an order allowing alimony pendente lite, costs, and attorney fees, and the taking of an appeal from such order, the court is not without jurisdiction to enter a nunc pro tunc order correcting the order appealed from so as to make it read in accordance with the order actually made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Una Margaret Locke-Paddon against William Locke-Paddon and others. From order allowing alimony pendente lite, counsel fees, and costs, William Locke-Paddon appeals and moves for diminution of record. Motion to dismiss appeal denied, motion for diminution of record denied, order appealed from affirmed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin V. McKenzie and Harry A. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, Myron Harris, of Oakland, and Preston & Duncan and W. A. Andrews, all of San Francisco (Clarence A. Linn, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHENK, J. Defendant has appealed from an order granting to the plaintiff temporary alimony, counsel fees, and costs in an action for divorce. He has also made a motion for diminution of the record. A motion to dismiss the appeal has been made by the plaintiff, which will first be considered.

Upon the filing of the complaint an order was issued requiring the appellant to show cause on November 3, 1922, if any he had, why he should not be required to pay to the respondent reasonable costs and counsel fees for the maintenance and prosecution of the action and alimony pendente lite. A hearing was had on the day appointed, at which the respondent was examined under oath and cross-examined by appellant's counsel. The court thereupon made and entered an order requiring appellant to pay to the respondent $300 per month as temporary alimony, $200 on account of attorney fees, and $100 for costs of suit. The appeal from the order was taken under section 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant in due time filed with the clerk of the court a notice that he intended to appeal from the order complained of, and requested that a "transcript of all the evidence offered or received, of all the testimony offered or taken, of all the rulings, acts, or statements of the court, of all the minutes of the court, of all the objections and exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate" be prepared and certified in accordance with the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant also requested that there be incorporated in the transcript all proceedings and papers in connection with the hearing on the order to show cause. The appellant thereafter in due time filed his notice of appeal. No transcript of the testimony taken at the hearing was prepared by the stenographic reporter on the order of the court or otherwise, for the reason, as satisfactorily appears from the record, that no reporter was present at the hearing, and consequently no photographic report thereof could be transcribed as required by said section 953a. The motion to dismiss the appeal is made on the ground that the record on appeal does not contain a reporter's transcript of the evidence taken upon the hearing which resulted in the making of the order appealed from nor a bill of exceptions setting forth such testimony. Pursuant to the appellant's notice the clerk of the trial court has certified a typewritten copy of the record, but a transcript of the testimony taken in open court at the time of the hearing is not in the record for the reason above stated. The transcript so presented is also certified by the trial judge, and for all purposes of the appeal may be considered as a judgment roll.

[1] It has been recently decided that on an appeal from a judgment under the alternative method, where there is before the court a typewritten copy of the judgment roll, certified by the clerk of the trial court, the appeal will not be dismissed because of the absence of the testimony at the hearing, such as is designated in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Ramsay v. Rodgers, 189 Cal. 100, 207 Pac. 516; Beckett v. Stuart, 35 Cal. App. 796, 171 Pac. 107.

A consideration of the merits of the appeal must necessarily be limited to what appears on the face of the judgment roll. The complaint was filed October 30, 1922, wherein it is alleged that the parties intermarried on the 7th day of September, 1904, and have two children, one of whom is a minor; that they separated on or about September 20, 1915; that the appellant and respondent are the owners of real and personal property described in the complaint of the approximate value of $200,000, and which is alleged to be community property; that at the time of the marriage in 1904 the appellant was without any property; that the appellant has a large income from his activities in a real estate and land sales business, the amount of which is unknown to the respondent; that respondent has no income and no separate property under her control, and has no control over the said community property or the business of the appellant. Then follow allegations of extreme cruelty on the part of the appellant which need not here be set forth.

It is also alleged that at all times since the said marriage the appellant represented to the respondent that he had little or no money; that the business transactions with which he had been connected had been failures; that his earnings from all sources amounted to barely enough to support the respondent and himself; that she had no knowledge of his financial status except as acquired by her from his statements; that on December 22, 1919, for the purpose of settling the property interests and rights of the parties hereto and dividing the said community property, an agreement was entered into, a copy of which is annexed to and made a part of the complaint. The agreement recites that by reason of divers disputes and unhappy differences it is impossible for the parties to live together in peace, and it is desired to settle their property rights so that neither shall have any claim upon the other except as therein set forth. The husband then agreed to pay the wife the sum of $10,000, of which $1,250 was payable in cash, a further sum of $1,250 on January 15, 1920, and the balance in installments of not less than $100 per month. In addition, the appellant agreed to pay the respondent $200 per month, commencing February 16, 1920, and ending March 15, 1923, and thereafter $100 per month until October 15, 1926, at which time all payments should cease and the appellant be forever discharged from supporting or contributing towards the support of the respondent. Upon her part the respondent agreed to assign to appellant all her right, title, claim, or interest in or to any community or separate property theretofore or thereafter acquired by the appellant, "and in case of proceedings for the dissolution of marriage between the parties hereto or any other litigation being instituted between said parties hereto, the said party of the first part (respondent herein) does hereby release, absolve, and discharge said party of the second part from any and all claims for alimony, attorney fees, or costs incurred in such litigation by said party of the first part." It was further agreed that out of the moneys paid by appellant to respondent the latter should at all times support the minor child of the parties until he arrives at the age of 21 years. It was also provided that the agreement was not made with the idea or purpose that either of the parties should get a divorce from the other, but that, should divorce proceedings be instituted by either party, the said agreement might be introduced in evidence as a stipulation of the parties as to what was the fair and equitable settlement of their property rights.

The complaint then alleges that the said agreement was made under the following circumstances: That the appellant represented to respondent that he was possessed of no community property, had no separate property, was bankrupt, and unable to meet his debts; that he would be required to borrow the money to meet the money payments required by the agreement; that when he presented the agreement to her for her signature he stated to her that it would be unnecessary for her to procure legal advice or counsel; that if she had anything to do with attorneys at law they would take from her the sums of money payable under the agreement; that he still loved her and would always consider himself obligated to support her and her children; that these statements were false, were known by the appellant to be false and untrue, and were made for the purpose of defrauding the respondent out of her interest in the said property; that she relied upon said fraudulent representations, and except for the same would not have entered into the agreement; that she is unfamiliar with business matters, and acted solely without legal or other advice; that one of the means employed by appellant to deceive the respondent and conceal from her the true extent of his business transactions was to conduct the same through the medium of corporations such as Small Farms Improvement Company, Great Western Syndicate, Locke-Paddon Land Company, and Locke-Paddon Company—all defendants in said action. The compaint alleges other and numerous allegations of fraud and of false pretenses on the part of the appellant in connection with the execution of said agreement, but sufficient have been noted to indicate the nature of the attack that is made upon the agreement. Respondent prays that the agreement be set aside on account of the alleged fraud practiced upon her; that there be an equitable division of the community property of the parties; that she be granted alimony pendente lite and permanent; that she be awarded counsel fees and court costs and for general relief.

It is the contention of the appellant that the trial court had no power to award alimony pendente lite, counsel fees, and court costs in the face of the contract settling the property rights of the parties, and providing that alimony, counsel fees, and costs shall not be awarded the plaintiff in the event suit for divorce be instituted. It is insisted that the agreement is valid until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction; that, as there has been no trial on the question of its validity, it is binding upon the parties; and that the agreement cannot be deemed fraudulent merely because the plaintiff charges that it is.

[2] It was competent for the parties hereto to enter into a contract, the purpose of which was to settle their property rights (section 159, Civ. Code); but such a transaction between them was subject to the general rules controlling the actions of persons occupying confidential relations as defined by the title on trusts (sections 158, 2235, Civ. Code). In Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 204 Pac. 583, this court said:

> "Confidential relations are presumed to exist between husband and wife, and in his dealings with his wife, the husband, if he obtains an advantage over her, must stand unimpeached of any abuse of the confidence presumptively reposed in him by the wife and resulting from the marital relation, and, failing in this, he must bear the burden of showing that the transaction was fair and just and fully understood by the party from whom the advantage was obtained."

[3] The issue as to the validity of the agreement is tendered by the allegations of the complaint, and the court has jurisdiction to determine said issue in the action. In Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 Pac. 801, the appellant contended that the court had no jurisdiction to set aside such an agreement in the action, which was one for divorce, and that an independent action should have been brought for that purpose. It was there said:

> "But the court clearly had jurisdiction to make disposition of the community property (Civ. Code, §§ 146, 147); and, when appellant insisted upon said instrument as providing how said property should be divided, the court necessarily had jurisdiction to consider it and to disregard it if found to be void. * * * 'Such pretended agreements, if they are to have any force, must be subjected to the examination of the divorce court, and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with a knowledge of the facts.' "

In McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 Pac. 460, the court stated that, inasmuch as the trial court had jurisdiction of the divorce action, it had authority to make disposition of the community property of the parties, and added:

> "Whenever, therefore it was made to appear that a division of the property had been made in accordance with the terms of the separation agreement, the court necessarily had jurisdiction to consider the instrument, and to affirm it, or to disregard it if it was found to be void."

Even if the agreement be not void, it is subject to the sanction of the court, and does not deprive the court of its power to grant temporary alimony under the statutory authority therefor. Section 137, Civ. Code; Steinmetz v. Steinmetz (Cal. App.) 227 Pac. 713.

Appellant relies on the rule stated in the case of Hogarty v. Hogarty, 188 Cal. 625, 206 Pac. 79, wherein the court said:

> "Such an agreement, when untainted by fraud, collusion, or the like, is valid * * * and when made a part of the decree is binding on the parties as a part thereof."

But there is nothing in that case inconsistent with the converse statement of the rule as contended for by the respondent that, if the agreement be tainted with fraud or be not approved by the court, it is not binding on the parties.

[4, 5] If we assume that it may transpire upon the trial of the case that the allegations, both as to the respondent's right to a divorce and as to the invalidity of the agreement may not be proved, and that the appellant has been compelled to furnish the respondent with means to prosecute an unmeritorious action, it may be said that the duty of the husband to support the wife and to furnish her with the means to have her rights adjudicated is inherent in the marital relation. The sole object of the order complained of is to furnish the wife with the means to show that she is entitled to the relief sought. On the hearing of the application the merits of the case, when there is no issue as to the marriage, and there is none here, will not be considered further than to determine that the wife is prosecuting the action in good faith and not merely for the purpose of obtaining money from the husband. Kowalsky v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 394, 78 Pac. 877. It is, of course, also necessary for the court to determine that the necessities of the wife warrant the making of the order and that the husband is able to pay. Presumably all of these matters were inquired into by the court on the hearing, and in the absence of the record of such evidence on this appeal the order cannot be reversed. Kellogg v. Kellogg, 170 Cal. 84, 148 Pac. 518. Furthermore, the order of allowance was in the discretion of the court (section 137, Civ. Code), and in the absence of an abuse of discretion the order must stand (Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 Pac. 885). No abuse of discretion is here shown.

[6, 7] Appellant contends that the allegations of the complaint are insufficient to vest the court with jurisdiction to set aside the agreement on the ground of fraud, for the reason that the respondent has not offered to restore to the appellant the money she has received under the agreement, and relies on the cases of Hite v. Mercantile Trust Co., 156 Cal. 765, 106 Pac. 102, and Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393, 177 Pac. 150, where it was held that an offer to restore was essential to a cause of action to set aside a property settlement agreement on the ground of fraud under the circumstances alleged in those cases. In the case of Hite v. Mercantile Trust Co., supra, the plaintiff brought the action against the administrator of the estate of one James R. Hite to set aside on the ground of fraud a separation agreement by which she had received the sum of $16,000 in consideration of her release of all claims against the deceased and his estate and to set at naught also on the ground of fraud a judgment in a divorce action between the parties wherein it was decided that the plaintiff was not and never had been the wife of deceased. It was held that the complaint was fatally defective, in that it did not contain an offer to restore as required by section 1691 of the Civil Code. In Estate of Sloan, supra, the surviving widow sought to set aside an agreement settling property rights on the ground that the agreement was void, and it was held that the wife had no standing in court in the absence of an offer to restore the property she had received under the agreement. In each of the cases relied on by appellant the point was raised and decided on demurrer. In the case at bar we are not dealing with a ruling of the court on demurrer. So far as the record discloses no pleading has been interposed to the complaint. We are here concerned merely with the propriety of an order made in an ancillary proceeding which is in reality a separate judgment. Millar v. Millar, 51 Cal. App. 718, 724, 197 Pac. 811. For aught that appears in the record it may have been shown before the trial court that the moneys which the respondent has heretofore received were no more than she was entitled to under the law as support from the appellant for the intervening years, and that the monthly allowance to which she was entitled at the time of the hearing was grossly inadequate for her support pending the trial of the action, taking into consideration the circumstances of the parties. It is not an invariable rule that a rescission of a contract on the ground of fraud will be denied merely because the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 Pac. 234. It would be manifestly unjust to require of the wife, as a prerequisite to maintaining an action to rescind a property settlement agreement on the ground of fraud, that she restore to the husband the moneys received by her under the agreement and used for living expenses and to which under the law she would have been entitled to so receive and use notwithstanding the agreement. Milekovich v. Quinn, 40 Cal. App. 537, 181 Pac. 256.

[8] The order of allowance was made on November 3, 1922. The notice of appeal was filed December 7, 1922. On October 29, 1923, the trial court made and entered a nunc pro tunc order as follows:

> "Amended Minute Order. It having been brought to the attention of the court that in the minute entry of the court's order awarding the above-named plaintiff alimony pendente lite, costs, and counsel fees, which was duly made in the above entitled action on the 3d day of November, 1922, a part of said order as actually made at said time was inadvertently omitted by the clerk, now for the purpose of correcting said inadvertent omission and making the record conform to the actual order of the court made at said time said minute entry of said order is hereby amended and corrected nunc pro tunc as of November 3, 1922, to read as follows."

The order of the court actually made and entered on November 3, 1922, is here repeated, and the nunc pro tunc order continues as follows:

> "The court further orders that in the event that a certain contract made between the plaintiff and defendant dated December 22, 1919, annexed to the complaint and marked Exhibit A, which is sought to be set aside in the action above entitled, and in that certain other action pending between the said parties in said court and numbered on the record thereof 128432, shall be declared a binding agreement in full force and effect, then all such payments as shall have been made to plaintiff on account of alimony pendente lite as aforesaid shall be credited upon the sums payable under the said contract."

It is insisted by appellant that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order of October 29, 1923, for the reason that the appeal had been taken and the whole matter been removed from the jurisdiction of the trial court pending the appeal. Appellant seeks by a motion made in this court for diminution of the record to eliminate such nunc pro tunc order from the certified record. When the clerical omission was discovered, it was proper for the trial court to correct the same by a nunc pro tunc order, and the power of the court to correct such omission was not suspended or impeded by the appeal. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 Pac. 892, and cases cited. Furthermore, the order was not prejudicial to the appellant's interest. In fact, it was in his favor. It was an assurance to him that whatever he might pay on account of temporary alimony required by the order would be credited on the same payable under the contract, thus avoiding a duplication of payments on his part.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The motion for diminution of the record is denied. The order appealed from is affirmed.

SZOPIERAY v. WEST BERKELEY EXPRESS & DRAYING CO. et al.
(S. F. 10402.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(6)—Movement of truck as proximate cause of injury held jury question.

In action for injuries to three year old child by truck, evidence that the proximate cause of injury was the movement of the truck held to present jury question.

2. Pleading 🔑364(5)—Striking ordinance, concerning hitching animals, from complaint for personal injuries proper.

In an action for injuries to a three year old child from being run over by truck, striking from the complaint an allegation of an ordinance requiring hitching of animals on public streets was not error, it being admissible without being pleaded, as such cause of action was not a violation of the ordinance.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑706(4)—Ordinance relating to hitching animals on streets held admissible.

In action for injuries to three year old child run over by a truck, excluding from evidence a city ordinance relating to the hitching of animals on public streets was error.

In Bank.

Action by Alexander Szopieray, Jr., by Alexander Szopieray, guardian ad litem, against the West Berkeley Express & Draying Company and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for appellant.

George Gelder, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, and Chris B. Fox, all of Oakland, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries to a minor, alleged to have been caused by a truck heavily laden and driven by horses passing over the child's left leg, crushing it, and rendering amputation necessary. The complaint was demurred to and an amended complaint filed. Issue was joined on the facts of the accident, contributory negligence was pleaded, and the answer further alleged that the parents of the minor "are guilty of negligence in allowing said child of such tender years to be alone upon said public streets." When the plaintiff rested, a motion for nonsuit was interposed and granted. The plaintiff appeals.

1. Appellant claims the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. We quote the specified grounds of the motion:

"We move for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiff does not show that the defendants, or either of them, were guilty of any kind of negligence, either in the handling of this team or in doing any affirmative act, or in omitting to do any act, the duty of doing which rested upon them or either of them. We move for a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence does not show that by any act, either of negligence, or otherwise, of these defendants, or either of them, that an injury was inflicted upon or received by this child. We again move on the ground that the evidence is entirely silent as to how or in what way this child was injured. We invoke the principle of law where it is not shown how the accident happened the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff show that the defendant was guilty of negligence. The plaintiff fails to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence, not only by no preponderance of evidence, but by any evidence at all. And that we claim is the situation in this case. There is no testimony, no eyewitness saw this accident, so there is no scintilla of evidence here of any kind showing how the accident occurred. And in order to fasten any negligence upon the defendant it must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence that by some act or omission or commission he was negligent. These are the grounds upon which we move for a nonsuit."

It was said in Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 509, 185 Pac. 388:

"The law governing motions for nonsuit is well settled in this state. In Marron v. Marron, 19 Cal. App. 328 (125 Pac. 914), it was said: 'A motion for nonsuit assumes as true every fact which the evidence, and presumptions fairly deducible therefrom, tend to prove, and which was essential to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583 (82 Pac. 252). On such motion the evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant. Contradictory evidence must be disregarded (In re Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329 [114 Pac. 787]), and the motion denied if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case without passing on the sufficiency of such evidence (Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73 [43 Pac. 408]; Vermont Co. v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579 [87 Am. St. Rep. 143, 56 L. R. A. 728, 67 Pac. 1057]). The rules as to a nonsuit are the same, whether the trial is by the court or by a jury. Freese v. Hibernia S. & L. Soc., 139 Cal. 394 (73 Pac. 172).'"

[1] The testimony is in substance as follows: At about 9:30 a. m. on September 14, 1917, the plaintiff, a child of three years of age, with the knowledge of its mother, left its home 200 feet from the northeast corner of Addison and Eighth streets in the city of Berkeley to go to the house of his aunt, who lived on the northwest corner of said streets, distant from the Szopieray residence about 200 feet. Mrs. L. T. Wilson, a witness for appellant, on returning from market saw the child sitting on the sidewalk leaning against the fence opposite the horses attached to the truck. She entered her house and after busying herself for about five minutes looked out of the window and saw him playing at the left hind wheel; he was playing "by rubbing his fingers along the spokes of the rear left wheel." About one-third of the truck was visible to her. She left the window and hearing a scream she walked across to the window and saw the boy sitting on the street about four feet behind the wagon, with a man supporting him. At no time did she observe any driver on, about, or near the wagon. According to this witness the boy was not bleeding but there was blood on the street in front of him, but not where he was sitting. She saw an automobile in that vicinity. Emil Turpin, called as a witness on behalf of the appellant, testified that while at work in his yard he noticed a truck loaded with boxes of grapes, to which two horses were attached, standing on Eighth street north of Addison street, and that the team was not tied. He saw some one taking a bunch of grapes from the truck, and about half an hour later, hearing a cry, he ran to the truck, and saw the teamster holding the child in his arms. He also testified that "the little boy was about two feet behind the left hind wheel, back of the hind wheel." He said he did not see the truck move, but "I had seen the truck before that on that day, prior to that time, standing on Addison street." Frank Sabine, a witness called on behalf of appellant, testified that while at work in the Ramos coal yard he saw the truck standing on Eighth street; that it was there about three-quarters of an hour, during which time the driver was standing inside the coal yard; that some one hollered "Whoa" and every one rushed outside; that there were other horses in the coal yard at the time; and that he was up in the loft, and when he got out the child had been taken to the hospital. The doctor, Julian J. Benton, a witness for appellant, testified that—

> "The thigh, the muscles of the thigh, were crushed and the macadam ground into the muscles, into the leg itself, and the tibia torn from its articulation, I mean the fibula torn from its articulation with the tibia. That means the joint of the small bone of the leg with the large bone at the knee, torn asunder. * * *
> "Q. What did you find was the injury with reference to the muscular structure of the leg between the knee and the foot? A. Crushed and torn from the bones entirely; the calf of the leg, what is commonly called the calf on the leg. The skin was torn from the shin bone. Of course, there are no muscles there; the skin was torn away. The skin together with the calf, the muscles composing the calf was torn away from the bones entirely. The whole thing was crushed entirely, entirely severed from the bone, from the bony structure, not only that, but the macadam ground into the muscles and the skin. It was absolutely necessary to amputate it, because it was impossible to get healing without. It was impossible to get healing in the first place, and in the second place gangrene would have set in within twenty-four or forty-eight hours with the accompanying absorption of what is commonly called blood poison later, and besides that he would never have got any cover whatsoever to the part, the skin was so mutilated and the muscular attachment being torn from the leg and the macadam gone into it; amputation was absolutely necessary to save the boy. * * *
> "Q. From the nature of those injuries, doctor, could you state whether or not it could be the result or likely to be the result of great weight upon the leg to produce this crushed condition, or could that be done with just dragging? A. It could not be done by dragging, utterly impossible.
> "Q. Would it indicate a great weight? A. Absolutely a crushing weight, yes."

Respondent Louis Erickson, called by appellant, testified that the truck loaded with grapes would weigh between five and six tons; that it was not equipped with brakes of any kind; that the reins were equipped with rings, and there was a hook in the dashboard to fasten them on; and that "he had them off and on."

Appellant argues that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the injury was caused by the moving of the truck, and that such moving was due to the negligence of the driver.

Respondents argue that, if the chain of evidence is interrupted by a failure to prove a material fact, such as the act or instrumentality which caused the injury, or by an intervening independent or efficient cause, it is the duty of the court to withdraw the case from the jury by granting a motion for nonsuit. It is contended that it has not been shown that any negligent moving of the wagon was the cause of the injury.

It is true there is no direct evidence that the truck moved and that such movement was the cause of the injury. In our view, however, there is sufficient indirect evidence tending to show that the proximate cause of the accident was the passing of the truck over the leg of the child. There is evidence that before the accident the minor was near the left hind wheel passing his fingers over the spokes; that blood stains were found on the roadway, say two feet from the truck and an equal distance from where the child was picked up. The doctor testified that the condition of the leg was caused by "absolutely a crushing weight." No blood was seen where the baby was sitting when the driver reached him. This might indicate that all the blood had been forced from the limb by the heavy weight of the truck. All the flesh was torn from the bone, the limb "was crushed entirely; * * * macadam was ground into the muscles and the skin." Because of the condition of the leg amputation was found necessary. There is no intimation in the evidence that between the time Mrs. Wilson saw the child at the wheel and heard the scream any other vehicle passed along the street or was near the child. According to the physician the injury was not caused by dragging. It is more likely that the baby moved slightly away from the truck after it passed over the leg and before it felt the pain. The testimony is that when the mother reached the baby after Mrs. Wilson informed her of the accident it was not crying. It would be entering the realm of pure speculation to hold that any other vehicle or cause other than the heavy truck injured the child. The jury might under the evidence have concluded that the cry "Whoa" was addressed to the team attached to the truck. This would tend to prove that the horses had moved. Furthermore, only a slight movement of the truck would be sufficient to produce the injury, and it would be almost impossible for the witnesses to have observed such movement from the position of the truck. It may be noted that the driver of the truck was not produced as a witness.

It has been declared that upon a motion for nonsuit "the evidence must be interpreted most strongly against the defendant." Gates v. Pendleton, 184 Cal. 797, 195 Pac. 664. "The motion for a nonsuit being in effect but a demurrer to the evidence received in support of the plaintiff's case, presented for the decision of the trial court purely a question of law, and, therefore, for the purpose of the motion, assumed the truth of all the evidence educed in support of the plaintiff's case. This is the settled and generally well-understood rule, and taking such evidence as true, it was the duty of the trial court, without regard to the conflicts, if any, appearing therein, to adopt only those inferences, reasonable, of course, fairly deducible therefrom, which were most favorable to the plaintiff." Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 Pac. 125. "While the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged, yet, where the evidence is such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, it is a sufficient answer to a motion for nonsuit." Scheuermann v. Kuetemeyer, 186 Cal. 225, 199 Pac. 13. Taking into account all the testimony in the case, including the inference which the jury might have drawn therefrom, it cannot be held that it was not sufficient as matter of law to justify the jury in concluding that the proximate cause of the injury was the movement of the truck.

[2] 2. Appellant assigns error to the ruling of the court in striking from the complaint the allegation of ordinance No. 107 (N. S.) of the city of Berkeley, regulating, among other things, the hitching and control of horses and mules upon the public streets; "provided, however, any such animal may be securely checked by a rein or line attached by a ring to a hook firmly fastened to the seat of the vehicle drawn by such animals, and by having at the same time a good and sufficient brake attached to such vehicle and firmly set." The motion was granted on the ground that said words are surplusage and redundant. This was not an action for a violation of an ordinance, and, as was said in Martin v. Shea, 182 Cal. 130, 187 Pac. 23, the ordinance "was admissible without being pleaded, since the cause of action was not a violation of the ordinance, but the negligence of the defendant in maintaining the trench without barriers or lights, and the ordinance was evidence of such negligence." See, also, Opitz v. Schenck, 178 Cal. 636, 174 Pac. 40. The ruling was correct.

[3] 3. It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in sustaining objections to the introduction in evidence of said ordinance No. 107 (N. S.). In addition to the conventional objections it was stated that "it does not meet any issue in this case, or any set of facts under which this ordinance may materially be considered." It is claimed in respondents' brief it was not shown that the violation of the ordinance was the proximate cause of the accident. But if the ordinance had been received in evidence, it cannot be said the jury might not have found that the violation thereof contributed to the proximate cause of the injury. The ruling was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

WENBAN ESTATE, Inc., v. HEWLETT et al.
(S. F. 10312.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1924.
Rehearing Denied July 3, 1924.)

1. Corporations 🔑519(3)—Evidence held to show that issue of corporate bonds to defendant was authorized.

Evidence of corporation minutes with testimony of corporation owner held to show that corporate meetings were held and resolutions regularly passed authorizing issue of corporate bonds to a director.

2. Corporations 🔑398(3)—Corporation organized for sole purpose of operating owner's property held bound by owner's acts.

Where corporation was organized for sole purpose of owning and operating owner's property, her acts and conduct when dealing with director with reference to corporate bonds were the acts and conduct of corporation, and therefore corporation was estopped to complain that the bonds were not issued or delivered by corporation, or that no consideration was received by it from the pledgees or transferees of such bonds.

3. Corporations 🔑1—Fiction of independent corporate existence cast aside to redress fraud and protect rights of third persons.

Generally a corporation is an entity separate from its stockholders, with distinct liabilities and obligations, but when necessary to redress fraud and protect third persons' rights, or prevent a palpable injustice, law and equity will interfere and cast aside legal fiction of corporate existence and deal with corporation and stockholders as identical entities with identical duties and obligations.

4. Corporations 🔑398(3)—Corporation obligated for acts of sole owner either in law or equity as though corporation did not exist.

Upon a showing that a corporation is but an instrumentality through which an individual, who is sole owner of all corporate capital stock, for convenience transacts his business, equity, looking to the substance and law as well, will hold such corporation obligated for acts of sole owner to same extent as though corporation did not exist.

5. Corporations 🔑1—Fiction of separate corporate entity may be disregarded, if refusal to do so would bring about inequitable results.

To disregard fiction of separate corporate entity it is unnecessary that actual fraud be shown; it being sufficient if a refusal to recognize identity of corporation with that of the individual would bring about inequitable results.

6. Corporations 🔑415—Relation of agency to dispose of bonds held to exist between director and owner of corporation and corporation.

Where corporation director was expressly authorized "in his private capacity to mortgage, hypothecate, sell, or trade" corporation's "bonds at his own discretion," in order to create a fund for improvement of corporation's property, he was made agent of sole owner of corporation and corporation to dispose of the bonds.

7. Corporations 🔑425(5)—Corporation estopped to complain that director did not have power to carry into effect his authority to sell its bonds.

Where a corporation, through its sole owner, conferred upon director authority to dispose of its bonds as if they were his own, and bonds as result of such authority came into possession of third parties for value, and in ordinary course of business, corporation was estopped to complain that director did not have power to carry into effect his authority.

8. Corporations 🔑474—Pledgees not deprived of title to bonds by failure to inquire as to agent's authority to dispose.

That pledgees of corporate bonds made no inquiry as to director's authority to pledge same would not deprive them of title or right to possession, where director not only had possession but actual authority to dispose of them.

9. Corporations 🔑415—Consideration received by agent for sale or pledge of corporation's bonds held to inure to corporation's benefit.

Where director was vested with power as corporation's agent to sell or pledge its bonds for corporation's benefit, whatever consideration he received for their sale or pledge became consideration for bonds, as though sale or pledge had been made by corporation itself.

10. Corporations 🔑415—Failure of agent to use money derived from sale of bonds as intended by corporation held not to prevent it from being consideration for bonds.

That director, authorized to dispose of corporation's bonds, did not use the money for purpose for which it was intended by corporation did not prevent it from being consideration for the bonds, since for that breach of trust corporation had its remedy against him for an accounting and settlement.

11. Corporations 🔑316(1)—Agreement between corporation owner and director held presumptive evidence of consideration.

A written agreement between corporation owner and director, which acknowledged delivery of bonds to him in cancellation of past accounts, was presumptive evidence of consideration therefor, in view of Civ. Code, § 1614.

12. Account stated 🔑1—Agreement between corporation owner and director, canceling past indebtedness for transfer of bonds, held to constitute.

An agreement between owner of corporation and director, which purported to cancel all past obligations between parties thereto, and declared that consideration of cancellation was transfer of bonds to director, held to constitute an account stated.

13. Account stated 🔑4—Unnecessary to set out mutual or cross accounts or demands between parties to constitute.

That an agreement between corporation owner and director, canceling past accounts in consideration of a transfer of bonds to director, did not set out mutual or cross accounts between the parties, did not prevent instrument from constituting an account stated.

14. Account stated 🔑8—Legal effect not defeated by showing lack of consideration.

While generally expressed consideration of an agreement is not conclusive upon its real consideration, legal effect of an account stated may not be defeated by mere showing of lack of consideration, nor can it be opened by party to whom it was rendered and accepted other than by appropriate pleading and proof of its procurement through fraud, duress, or mistake, or other ground which would appeal to equity in an action for avoidance thereof.

15. Pleading 🔑166, 381(3)—If defendant's answer had tendered an issue of account stated, averment would have been deemed denied, and plaintiffs could show fraud in procurement thereof as if specially pleaded.

In corporation's action to cancel bonds in possession of third parties, where cause of action did not seek to avoid legal effect of an account stated between corporation owner and director, transferring such bonds to director, by any allegation that it was procured through fraud, duress, or mistake, if defendants' answer had tendered such issue, its averments would have constituted new matter, and, under Civ. Code Proc. § 462, would have been deemed denied, and under general issue thus raised corporation would have been permitted to show fraud in procurement of account stated as though such fraud had been specially pleaded.

16. Account stated 🔑1—Adjustment of doubtful right constitutes good consideration therefor.

If an account stated between corporation owner and director was based upon a claim or demand of doubtful validity and value, such adjustment was good consideration, and corporation owner was estopped to complain that the claim or demand upon which it was made was unjust or invalid.

17. Corporations 🔑471—Constitution and statutory requirements for issue of corporation bonds satisfied, if consideration emanating from legitimate transaction inures to corporation's benefit.

If there is some consideration emanating from a legitimate transaction not tainted with fraud and tending to inure to corporation's benefit, constitutional and statutory requirements for issue of corporation bonds, in so far as corporation or its stockholders are concerned, are satisfied.

18. Corporations 🔑316(1)—Acknowledgment of delivery of bonds by corporation director held to constitute a complete delivery.

That at time of a written agreement between director and corporation owner, which acknowledged a delivery of bonds to him, same were already in his possession as an officer of corporation did not prevent an effective delivery; such acknowledgment being inconsistent with supposition that he was continuing in possession of them as a director of corporation.

19. Limitation of actions 🔑39(1)—Action seeking equitable relief held not barred by statute.

Corporation's cause of action to determine adverse claims upon alleged obligations of corporation, made by defendants against corporation, constituted an action for equitable relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 1050, and therefore section 343 embodied only statute of limitations applicable.

20. Pleading 🔑403(2)—Defects in complaint held cured by allegations of answer and cross-complaint.

In corporation's action to determine adverse claims upon alleged obligations of corporation, made by defendants against corporation, if complaint was defective in not affirmatively alleging that any claims or demands were being asserted against corporation on account of such obligations, such defect was cured by answer and cross-complaint, which showed definitely and affirmatively that defendants were asserting or about to assert a claim adverse to corporation upon such obligations.

21. Corporations 🔑513(1)—Failure to allege time of discovery of pledge and transfer of corporate obligations held not fatal.

In corporation's action to determine adverse claims upon corporate obligations, made by defendants against corporation, if it was proper to allege the time of discovery of pledge and transfer by corporate director of such obligations to defendants, failure to do so was not fatal, where no demurrers upon that ground or any other ground were interposed to complaint.

22. Limitation of actions 🔑95(1)—Action to determine adverse claims upon corporate obligations held not barred by statute of limitations.

Corporation's action to determine adverse claims upon corporate obligations, made by several defendants against corporation, which was filed in October 22, 1914, was not barred by statute of limitations, where secretary of corporation never knew of the adverse possession of the bonds until January, 1913, and corporation owner had no knowledge of such adverse possession until she obtained it from secretary.

23. Equity 🔑39(1)—Will dispose of all equities and priorities between several parties to a case to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Where equity assumes jurisdiction of subject-matter and of parties, it will proceed, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, to dispose, as prayed for, of all equities and priorities, if any, existing between the several parties to a case.

Richard C. Harrison, of San Francisco, for Flora A. Mills.

L. H. Roseberry, of Los Angeles, for Southern Trust Co.

LENNON, J. In this action in equity the plaintiff sought and secured a judgment against the defendants declaring 500 of the plaintiff's first mortgage bonds, of the par value of $500,000, to be null and void, and requiring the defendants to surrender and deliver them up to plaintiff, upon the ground that said bonds were never issued by the corporation plaintiff nor delivered to the defendant Hewlett, who pledged or transferred them to the other defendants, and that no consideration for their issuance and delivery, if any, was ever given or received as required by the fundamental and statutory law of the state, which provides that "no corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received. * * *" Const. art. 12, § 11; Civ. Code, § 359.

After the institution of this action, Caroline S. Wenban, who was originally named as a defendant, died, and Flora Wenban Mills, the executrix of her will, was substituted in her place and stead. Mary A. Huntington, also originally named as a defendant in this action, died after the action was instituted. Howard Huntington, the executor of her will, was substituted as a defendant in her place and stead. Since the appeal was taken to this court, Howard Huntington died, and Louis S. Beedy was appointed administrator with the will annexed of Mary A Huntington's estate in the place and stead of Howard Huntington as executor thereof, and said Beedy, as administrator, was in the court below substituted as defendant in his place and stead, and a like order of substitution has been made by this court. Since the appeal was taken, Mary E. Nelson, also named originally as a defendant in this action, died, and W. W. McNair was appointed executor of her will, and as such executor has been substituted as a defendant in her place and stead by orders made in the lower court and in this court.

The plaintiff's complaint consisted of two counts, the first of which only need be considered, with relation to the points presented in support of the appeal, for the reason that no findings were made in response to the issues involved in the second count.

The first cause of action pleaded in plaintiff's complaint alleges, among other things, that on the 19th day of June, 1909, the plaintiff, the Wenban Estate, Incorporated, executed a deed of trust bearing date July 1, 1908, to the Southern Trust Company, Incorporated, of Los Angeles, whereby the plaintiff corporation granted, conveyed, assigned and transferred to said trust company, as trustee, certain property then owned by said plaintiff corporation, to secure, as the same should be issued and delivered by plaintiff, the payment, equally and without priority, of 1,000 bonds, numbered consecutively from 1 to 1,000, both inclusive, bearing date of July 1, 1909. Said deed of trust, it was alleged, was thereafter delivered by the plaintiff corporation to said Southern Trust Company as the trustee therein mentioned, and was on the 11th day of August, 1909, duly recorded in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco.

The plaintiff's complaint further alleges that 500 of said 1,000 bonds, which said trust deed was provided to secure, when the same should be issued and delivered by said plaintiff, were duly issued and delivered by said plaintiff corporation to one Caroline S. Wenban, as part consideration to her for certain property theretofore purchased from her by said plaintiff corporation and theretofore conveyed and transferred and delivered by her to said plaintiff corporation, and that said last-mentioned 500 bonds and all thereof so issued and delivered by said plaintiff corporation to said Caroline S. Wenban were issued and delivered by said plaintiff corporation in good faith for property received by said plaintiff corporation, and that they and each of said bonds became and were, through such issue and delivery, the valid and existing obligations of said plaintiff corporation secured by said deed of trust.

The complaint, however, further alleges that, save and except the 500 bonds issued and delivered to Caroline S. Wenban, none of the 1,000 bonds of said plaintiff described in the deed of trust from the plaintiff to the Southern Trust Company, as trustee, ever was issued or delivered or authorized to be issued or delivered by said plaintiff; and that the plaintiff has never received any consideration whatsoever for said bonds or any thereof; and that any purported issue or delivery of said bonds to any person or persons at any time was and is wholly without authority of this plaintiff and without consideration.

It is further alleged that 51 of such unissued and undelivered bonds are now in the possession of said plaintiff corporation; that 4 of said bonds are in the possession of Hewlett; that 200 of the bonds are in the possession of Mary A. Huntington, and that ownership of said 200 bonds is claimed by her by virtue of a pretended transfer of the same from the defendant Hewlett; that 150 bonds are in the possession of the German-American Trust & Savings Bank, and that this bank claims a right to the possession of said bonds by virtue of a claimed agreement of pledge with Hewlett; that 15 of such bonds are in the possession of the Security Trust & Savings Bank, and this bank claims the right of possession to said bonds by virtue of a claimed agreement of pledge with Hewlett; that 80 of said bonds are in the possession of Mary E. Nelson, right to the possession of which bonds was claimed by her by virtue of a claimed agreement of pledge with Hewlett; and that Mary A. Huntington claims the absolute ownership of an additional 200 of the bonds, some of which are now in the possession of either the plaintiff corporation or of the other defendants.

The complaint also alleges that the defendant Hewlett was during all of the times involved in the controversy in suit a member of the board of directors of the plaintiff corporation, and that all of the defendants had knowledge of this fact at all of the times of entering into the purported transactions by virtue of which they respectively claim ownership or the right of possession to the unissued and undelivered bonds in suit.

The plaintiff's complaint prayed that it be ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the bonds in suit were not valid obligations of the plaintiff corporation; that none of the defendants holding said bonds have any right or lawful claim thereto; that the defendants having possession of said bonds be ordered and directed forthwith to surrender and deliver the same to the plaintiff corporation; that the title to such bonds be quieted in the plaintiff corporation free and clear of all claims of any kind of said defendants; that the rights of the various holders of all of the bonds of the corporation plaintiff issued and outstanding and their priorities and equities between each other, if any such there be, be ascertained and determined.

The plaintiff's complaint, however, proceeded to pray further that, in the event it should be determined that the defendants who are holding any of the bonds in suit or claiming (adversely to the plaintiff corporation) any interest therein are entitled to any rights or equities between themselves, or against any other of the defendants, on account of the possession of such bonds or the manner in which they came into the possession thereof, or otherwise, all necessary accounts or accountings be made to the end that a proper decree be entered adjusting the rights of such several defendants, and the equities and liabilities of the plaintiff corporation; and, further, to the same end, and that a discovery be ordered and an accounting be had of the accounts between Mary A. Huntington and Eugene Hewlett, and between Caroline S. Wenban and Eugene Hewlett, and that the various defendants holding said bonds or any of them as collateral security for the payment of any obligation or indebtedness entered into or incurred by the defendant Hewlett be ordered, directed, and required first to resort to the sale of any other securities held by them respectively as such collateral security for the payment of such indebtedness prior to making any attempted sale of any or all of said bonds.

Only the defendants Hewlett, Howard Huntington, as executor of the will of Mary A. Huntington, deceased, Mary E. Nelson, Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, formerly the German-American Trust & Savings Bank, and the Security Trust & Savings Bank answered the plaintiff's complaint, and they, separately answering, while admitting the corporate existence of the plaintiff and other formal allegations, generally and specifically denied all other material allegations of the complaint. The defendants Howard Huntington, as executor of the will of Mary A. Huntington, Mary E. Nelson, and the Security Trust & Savings Bank, interposed the statute of limitations as a bar to the action. All of the several last-named defendants, save and except Hewlett, in addition to their answers interposed cross-complaints in which they pleaded in effect that they had acquired the bonds in suit in good faith, for value and without notice of any defect therein or of any adverse claim thereto. They then proceeded to allege, among other things, in substance and effect that at all of the times following the incorporation of the plaintiff, and at all of the times mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint, Caroline S. Wenban was the owner of all of the capital stock of said Wenban Estate, Incorporated, and that at all of the times since the incorporation of the plaintiff she owned in her own right all of its corporate capital stock by reason of the fact that all of the stock originally subscribed for by the other stockholders was indorsed in blank by them and delivered to her for the purpose of vesting in her title thereto; that no person other than the said Caroline S. Wenban paid any money or other thing of value for any of the capital stock of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated; that the directors and officers of said corporation during all of the times mentioned in the complaint carried out her instructions and wishes, and were at all times dominated and controlled in their official corporate acts by her; that during all of the times since the incorporation of said plaintiff the defendant Hewlett was the agent and confidential adviser of said Caroline S. Wenban, and was the agent of said corporation; that the plaintiff was incorporated and organized wholly and solely for the purpose of being and constituting an agency for said Caroline S. Wenban in the care, conduct, and control of her property, and not for any other purpose; that during all of the times mentioned in the complaint said plaintiff acted as the agent and agency of said Caroline S. Wenban in the care, control, and management of her property; that the bonded indebtedness referred to in the plaintiff's complaint, and purporting to have been created by said corporation, to wit, a bonded indebtedness of $1,000,000 represented by 1,000 bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each was created wholly and solely as a means employed on the part of Caroline S. Wenban to more easily and readily manage and control her property, and for the purpose of procuring loans and funds to maintain and carry on the management of said property and pay the taxes and expenses thereof and make improvements thereon; that the corporation plaintiff did create a bonded indebtedness in the sum of $1,000,000 represented by 1,000 bonds of the denomination of $1,000, and numbered from 1 to 1,000, consecutively; that the whole of said 1,000 bonds in plaintiff's complaint referred to were certified to at one time by the Southern Trust Company, the corporation named as trustee in the trust deed which was obtensibly executed to cover the properties of the plaintiff corporation and given to secure the payment of said bonds; that said bonds were issued and executed by the said Caroline S. Wenban, president of, and Flora Wenban Mills, secretary of, the plaintiff corporation and in the name of the said corporation, all at the same time; that the seal of the corporation was impressed upon all of said bonds and at the same time; that for the purposes above stated said Caroline S. Wenban did cause 500 of said bonds, designated and identified by their serial number, to be delivered to the defendant Hewlett, and the remaining 500 of said bonds, designated and identified by their serial number, to be delivered to her, the said Caroline S. Wenban; that said Caroline S. Wenban, acting through said agency, the plaintiff corporation, vested the legal title to the said 500 bonds hereinabove enumerated as delivered to defendant Hewlett in him for the purpose and with the intent of having him sell, mortgage, hypothecate, pledge, or otherwise deal with the same as if the same were his own property, and that he should handle the properties of said Caroline S. Wenban, make investments for her out of the proceeds of said bonds, pay taxes and assessments on her properties, namely, the property, title to which stood in the name of the corporation plaintiff, make improvements thereon, and otherwise deal with her said properties irrespective of the corporation as if the title thereto stood in her name, but using the said corporation as an agency for facilitating the handling of said properties; that said defendant Hewlett did, after receiving the said bonds, claim to be the owner thereof, with the knowledge and consent of said Caroline S. Wenban, and did dispose of a large portion of the same, and did pledge to the defendants and cross-complainants certain of said bonds, and did hold himself out to be the owner thereof, and was at all of the times vested with the ostensible and legal title thereto with the knowledge and with the consent of said Caroline S. Wenban, and did procure from the defendants and cross-complainants as proceeds of said loans large sums of money; that by the acts of said Caroline S. Wenban, so acting through the agency of the said corporation as aforesaid, the cross-complainants were deceived and misled into believing that the defendant Hewlett was the owner of said bonds and entitled to pledge and dispose of the same, and to deal with the same as if they were his own and thereby were induced to make the said loans and to pay to the said Hewlett large sums of money; that but for the acts of the said Caroline S. Wenban as aforesaid defendants and cross-complainants would not have made to defendant Hewlett the said loans, and would not have paid to said Hewlett the said or any sums of money, and, finally, in effect, that, if the relief prayed for be granted to the plaintiff corporation, it would under all the circumstances unjustly inure to and be for the benefit of Caroline S. Wenban and her successors in interest in the corporation plaintiff.

The cross-complainants prayed that it be ordered, adjudged, and decreed that they were the lawful owners and holders of said bonds, and that their title to the same be quieted as against said plaintiff and cross-defendants and for general relief.

Upon the issues thus framed the trial court, among other things, found that "the plaintiff did not at any time issue or deliver, or authorize to be issued or delivered, to any person or persons any bond or bonds" other than a certain lot of 500 bonds which were issued and delivered to Caroline S. Wenban, which bonds, however, were not sought to be surrendered by this action. The trial court further found that "the plaintiff did not at any time receive any consideration by way of money paid, labor done, or property actually received or otherwise or at all for any bond or bonds" sought to be declared void and of no effect by this action.

From these findings the trial court deduced the conclusion of law that the bonds in suit purporting to be secured by a deed of trust, and now in the possession of the defendants Eugene Hewlett, Mary E. Nelson, Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, formerly German-American Trust & Savings Bank, and Howard Huntington, as the executor of the will of Mary A. Huntington, deceased, "are not the bonds of the plaintiff, and do not represent obligations of the plaintiff, and no one of said instruments is a bond of the plaintiff or represents any obligation of the plaintiff." Accordingly it was adjudged and decreed that the defendants last above mentioned be required to deliver and surrender forthwith to the plaintiff said instruments in writing purporting to be the bonds of plaintiff, and that the said defendants and each of them be enjoined and restrained from at any time asserting against the plaintiff, or against the Southern Trust Company, as trustee under said deed of trust, any claim based upon said instruments in writing, or any of them, or predicated upon any of the matters or things set forth or referred to in any of the cross-complaints and amended or supplemental cross-complaints or any pleading filed by said defendants in the action.

A review of the evidence adduced upon the entire case reveals a series of undisputed facts which, briefly stated, are these:

Prior to April 18, 1906, Caroline S. Wenban was the owner of an apartment house and a residence in San Francisco and some mining properties in the state of Nevada. The apartment house and residence were destroyed by the great fire of that date, which left Mrs. Wenban without any funds and without any income. Eugene Hewlett, attorney at law, a friend of Mrs. Wenban's daughter, Eva Shaw, became Mrs. Wenban's legal and financial adviser. Fire insurance money in the sum of $136,500 was collected by Hewlett upon authorization from Mrs. Wenban. In June, 1908, upon the advice of Hewlett, the corporation was formed for the express purpose of taking over, managing, and developing the properties of Caroline S. Wenban.

At the time the corporation was organized 9,995 shares of its 10,000 shares of corporate capital stock were issued direct to Caroline S. Wenban. The remaining 5 shares were issued in order to qualify directors, 1 share to Caroline S. Wenban, 1 share to her daughter, Eva Shaw, 1 share to her daughter, Flora Wenban Mills, 1 to her business agent, George W. Merrill, and 1 share to defendant Eugene Hewlett. These shares were shortly thereafter indorsed by the persons to whom they were originally issued over to and delivered to Caroline S. Wenban, who has ever since held them as sole owner. She controlled the corporation in all of its actions, and the officers of the corporation, who were members of her family, did whatever she wanted them to do with regard to the corporation.

A resolution dated June 12, 1908, was adopted by the corporation plaintiff authorizing the issuance of 1,000 bonds of the par value of $1,000. Five hundred of these bonds were delivered to Caroline S. Wenban. As a consideration for the transfer to her of all of the shares of the corporation and the delivery to her of the 500 bonds Caroline S. Wenban conveyed and transferred to the corporation plaintiff all of her real property. The remaining 500 bonds came into the possession of defendant Hewlett as managing director of the corporation. Fifty-one of these bonds were returned by Hewlett to the corporation. They were returned, however, as a preliminary step to the cancellation of a certain agreement between defendant Hewlett and Caroline S. Wenban, which agreement, however, was not canceled, and as to these bonds Hewlett claims the right, title, and interest. Four of the bonds are now in the possession of Hewlett. The 80 bonds held by Mary E. Nelson, the 150 bonds held by the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, formerly the German-American Trust & Savings Bank, and the 15 bonds held by the Security Trust & Savings Bank are held respectively under a claimed right to possession as security for the payment of indebtedness evidenced by promissory notes of Hewlett. The 200 bonds held by the executor of Mary A. Huntington are held under claim of absolute ownership for the repayment of a debt owing by Hewlett at the time of their transfer to Mary A. Huntington and also for a new consideration advanced to him at that time.

It is the claim of Hewlett, as evidenced by his testimony, that the 500 bonds in suit were issued and delivered to him by the corporation for a valuable consideration, and that by reason thereof he became the absolute owner of said bonds. It is the contention of the plaintiff corporation that Hewlett's claim is disputed and dissipated by the established facts and circumstances preceding, attending, and following the formation of the corporation, and that these facts and circumstances show that Hewlett obtained the manual possession of the bonds merely by reason of his position as managing director of the corporation, and not otherwise, and that the bonds of the corporation now in suit were never in fact issued or delivered to Hewlett, and that no consideration was paid by him for them, and finally, that in reality the bonds never had any existence as valid and existing obligations of the corporation but were mere worthless pieces of paper.

In support of his claim that he became the legal owner of and entitled to the possession of 500 bonds of the plaintiff corporation, Hewlett, in his testimony, narrated the circumstances attending the formation and management of the plaintiff corporation, detailed certain conduct on the part of Caroline S. Wenban, and relied upon certain written agreements between him and Caroline S. Wenban from which he claims the result follows that he did become the legal owner of the bonds.

In this behalf Hewlett testified in substance that shortly after the fire of 1906 an oral agreement was entered into between himself and Caroline S. Wenban whereby he obligated himself to finance a corporation to be formed to operate the properties of Caroline S. Wenban, and to pay out of the earnings of the corporation $1,000 a month to Caroline S. Wenban for her personal use, and, in the event that the corporation did not yield that amount per month, he, Hewlett, was to make good the difference. According to Hewlett at the time of the original oral agreement there was no definite understanding as to what he should receive in return for his services, but later it was worked out and agreed that he should receive for such services 500 of the bonds of the corporation when it was formed.

Whether or not there was actually an oral agreement between Hewlett and Caroline S. Wenban prior to the formation of the corporation is immaterial, inasmuch as such agreement, if any, was, as the record shows, subsequently superseded by a written agreement dated March 16, 1910. Under the well-recognized rule, the written agreement speaks for itself and supersedes any oral negotiations which may have preceded its making. Civ. Code, § 1625.

On June 23, 1908, so Hewlett testified, a meeting of the directors of the corporation was held and a resolution adopted authorizing the delivery of 500 bonds to Hewlett, which action of the directors was on the same day approved by all the owners and holders of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation. A duplicate copy of the minutes of the meeting of the directors, signed by Caroline S. Wenban, Flora Wenban Mills, and Eva Shaw, was offered and received in evidence by defendant Howard Huntington, executor of the will of Mary A. Huntington, who is claiming through Hewlett. Those minutes are as follows:

"Directors' meeting of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated.

"Held on the 23d day of June, 1908, Caroline S. Wenban, president of the board, presiding. The secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting of the board, held on the 19th day of June, 1908, which, on motion duly seconded, were approved.

"E. E. Hewlett delivered the secretary of the company 60 shares of the Southern Trust Company stock, * * * shares of the Riverside Improvement Company stock, deed of boarding house on Hill and Court streets, Los Angeles, an order for 600 shares of Flora Park, Incorporated, stock, a written promise of Howard E. Huntington indorsed over by E. E. Hewlett, of one-fourth of the capital stock of Pacific Annuity Company to be delivered to the Wenban Estate, Incorporated; also vouchers for $86,000.

"On motion duly seconded, the above property was duly accepted by the company by unanimous vote. And upon motion made by Eva J. Shaw, seconded by Flora Wenban Mills, it was unanimously resolved that 500 bonds of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated, be delivered to E. E. Hewlett. * * *

"There being no further business, on motion the meeting adjourned.

"[Signed] Caroline S. Wenban.
"Flora Wenban Mills.
"Eva J. Shaw."

There was also offered and received in evidence the minutes of a shareholders' meeting held on the same day which approved the prior resolution authorizing the delivery of 500 bonds to Hewlett, which minutes are as follows:

"Stockholders' Meeting of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated.

"Held on the 23d day of June, 1908, Caroline S. Wenban, president, and all the owners and holders of the subscribed capital stock of the company were present, namely, Caroline S. Wenban, Eva J. Shaw, Flora Wenban Mills, George W. Merrill, E. E. Hewlett.

"The secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting of the stockholders held on 19th day of June, 1908, which, on motion duly seconded, were approved.

"The secretary was then directed to read the minutes of the directors' meeting of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated, held June 23, 1908; the secretary then read the minutes as were engrossed on the pages of the company's books. Thereupon, on motion of Flora Wenban Mills, seconded by Eva J. Shaw, it was unanimously resolved that the business transacted at said meeting be unanimously ratified and approved.

"There being no further business before the stockholders, on motion the meeting adjourned.

"Caroline S. Wenban.
"Eva J. Shaw.
"Flora Wenban Mills."

The evidence shows, we think, without conflict that a meeting of the corporation was held at which the resolution authorizing the delivery of the bonds to Hewlett was passed and adopted as the act of the plaintiff corporation. This is shown by the duplicate minutes of the two meetings held on June 23, 1908, the one authorizing the delivery of the bonds to Hewlett and the other ratifying that authorization. It is true that Mrs. Mills at the time of the taking of her deposition, which was some three years and six months prior to the trial of the case, testified, "I don't think there was any such meeting. * * * I know it was impossible at that time, * * * owing to the illness of my sister, Mrs. Shaw, in Burlingame. She could not leave the house at all." Mrs. Caroline S. Wenban, however, testified that a meeting had been held at Burlingame, and when asked if she remembered the meeting, replied, "Not very clearly, I do not," but added, "I know something about it." She testified that this meeting had been held in Burlingame because of the illness of her daughter, Mrs. Shaw, and that the condition of Mrs. Shaw's health at that time was such that she could sign the minutes of the meeting. Mrs. Mills, when testifying as a witness at the trial, and when confronted with the signed duplicate of the minutes of the meeting of the directors on June 23, 1908, which in their signed form were not called to her attention when giving her deposition, testified that duplicate minutes were always signed, and that the signatures attached to the minutes of the meeting in question of Caroline S. Wenban, Eva J. Shaw, and herself were genuine. She did not then testify that no such meeting was held. She did say, however, "I don't think I attended any meeting of June 23, 1908," and when asked if the signatures to the minutes of the meeting of June 23, 1908, which she admitted were genuine, did not refresh her memory concerning the time and circumstances under which she signed, she replied, "No, but I know that my sister was very ill. She must have signed it in bed."

It will thus be seen that Flora Wenban Mills based her notion that no corporate meeting was held on June 23, 1908, and that such a meeting was impossible, on the fact that her sister, Mrs. Shaw, was ill in Burlingame at that time. Other evidence, however, as previously indicated, tends to show, and without contradiction, that a corporate meeting was held at Burlingame during the time that Mrs. Shaw was ill, and that she was able at that time to sign the minutes of the meeting. Mrs. Mills fixes the time of the meeting in question at a time when her sister, Mrs. Shaw, was ill, and Caroline S. Wenban, without contradiction, testified that a corporate meeting was held at Burlingame during the time of the illness of Mrs. Shaw. If Mrs. Mills is correct in her recollection of the time and of the place of her sister's illness, evidently such illness did not render a corporate meeting of that date at Burlingame impossible or improbable.

[1] In short, Mrs. Mills' testimony concerning the fact as to whether or not a corporate meeting was held on the date in question is so nebulous and evanescent as to render it nothing more than a mere pretense of evidence (Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 666, 34 Pac. 504; In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 269, 49 Pac. 172, 711; Estate of Tibbetts, 137 Cal. 123, 128, 69 Pac. 978; Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 506, 82 Pac. 57; Houghton v. Loma Prieta Co., 152 Cal. 574, 578, 93 Pac. 377), and therefore it may be said that, as a matter of law, is not any evidence at all. It does not, therefore, contradict or tend to contradict, either directly or by justifiable inference, the positive evidence that such a meeting was held. The positive and unequivocal character of the corporate minutes, coupled with the testimony of Caroline S. Wenban, compels the conclusion that the evidence sufficiently shows that corporate meetings were held on June 23, 1908, and that the resolutions recited in the minutes referred to were regularly passed and adopted as the act of the corporation plaintiff. It follows that the finding of the trial court to the effect that the corporation did not at any time authorize to be issued or delivered to any person all or any of the bonds in suit is not only not supported by the evidence but is contrary to the evidence.

On August 26, 1909, Caroline S. Wenban signed and acknowledged before a notary public a formal assignment conveying 500 of the corporation's bonds to Hewlett. There is no denial by the respondents that such a conveyance was made and executed by Caroline S. Wenban, and it must, therefore, be taken as an admitted fact in the case.

It is to be noted that the bonds of the corporation were not in physical existence at the time of the resolution of the plaintiff corporation authorizing the delivery of the 500 bonds to Hewlett, nor were such bonds in existence at the time of the written conveyance by Caroline S. Wenban to Hewlett of the bonds.

It is not disputed that the total issue of bonds of the corporation was, on February 7, 1910, certified by the Southern Trust Company, as trustee, under the deed of trust, and that at some time between that date and March 16, 1910, Hewlett came into actual physical possession of the bonds.

On March 16, 1910, Caroline S. Wenban entered into a formal written agreement with Hewlett by which Hewlett agreed to "finance" the corporation and to guarantee to Caroline S. Wenban a monthly income of $1,000 during the existence of the bond issue. On her part, by the agreement, Caroline S. Wenban "ratified the conveyance and delivery heretofore made" to Hewlett of 500 bonds of the Wenban Estate, Incorporated. It was provided by this agreement that 400 of the bonds, or an amount of property equivalent to the then value of the bonds, should be held by Hewlett in a separate trust account as security for the performance of his covenants contained in the agreement. This agreement expressly provided that Hewlett might "in his private capacity, mortgage, hypothecate, sell, or trade said bonds at his own discretion." The remaining 100 bonds from 1 to 100 inclusive were, so the agreement reads, "delivered to" Hewlett "in cancellation of past accounts"; that agreement expressly providing further, that "all past obligations between the parties hereto are hereby canceled." The agreement provided that Hewlett should have no charge or obligation against Caroline S. Wenban or the corporation except out of the income of the corporation, and in the event of the cancellation of the agreement Hewlett was not to be paid in money "for work, labor, or services rendered or for interest on the money advanced," but should be allowed in bonds the difference in the value of the 400 bonds above mentioned at the time of the making of the agreement and their value at the time of the cancellation of the agreement.

There is no denial by the plaintiff corporation of the execution of the written agreement of March 16, 1910, by Caroline S. Wenban, and the execution of the agreement must also be taken as an admitted fact in the case.

[2] We are now brought to a consideration of the point primarily presented in support of a reversal of the judgment, viz., that the evidence adduced upon the entire case without substantial conflict was to the effect that Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation were one and the same entity, and that, therefore, the acts and conduct of Caroline S. Wenban when dealing with Hewlett, with reference to the bonds in suit, were the acts and conduct of the corporation plaintiff, and therefore, the corporation plaintiff will not be heard to complain that the bonds in suit were not issued and delivered by the corporation or that no consideration was received by it from all, or any of the defendants, for the pledges or transfers respectively made to them of said bonds. This contention is, we think, well taken.

Upon this phase of the case it is obvious that the trial court, in its findings, endeavored to preserve the integrity and independence of the corporation plaintiff as a separate entity from that of Caroline S. Wenban. While the trial court does not in terms make such a finding, nevertheless it is fairly inferable from its findings, as a whole, that the findings, as made, bearing upon this phase of the case, were predicated only upon the theory that the corporation was not bound by the acts and conduct of Caroline S. Wenban. This, we think, under all of the undisputed evidence bearing upon this phase of the case, could not rightly be done, and that, in so far as it may be implied from the findings of the trial court that Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation were distinct and separate entities, the findings are contrary to the evidence.

That the identity of Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation are the same cannot, under the practically admitted facts of the case, be doubted or disputed. She was at all times following the formation of the corporation the sole owner of all of the shares of the stock of the corporation. Caroline S. Wenban at all times controlled and directed the affairs of the corporation as if she and the corporation were one. She herself testified in effect that all of the corporate stock of the corporation belonged to her, and that she practically controlled the corporation in all of its actions, and that the directors of the corporation, who were members of her family, did whatever she wanted them to do with regard to the corporation, and this testimony stands undisputed. The corporation was organized for the sole purpose of owning and operating Caroline S. Wenban's property. It was created merely as a convenience for the management of her property. There was a complete unity of interest and ownership in the assets of the corporation between Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation. In other words, the corporation was her alter ego. That the corporation was looked upon as the alter ego of Caroline S. Wenban is evidenced by the acquiescence of the other directors of the corporation in her conduct whereby she treated the bonds of the corporation as her own. In such a situation her responsibility as the sole shareholder of the corporation, when dealing with the assets of the corporation, was the corporation's responsibility, and conversely the obligation of the corporation in this particular situation is her obligation.

[3] While it is the general rule that a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, with separate, distinct liabilities and obligations, nevertheless there is a well-recognized and firmly settled exception to this general rule, that, when necessary to redress fraud, protect the rights of third persons, or prevent a palpable injustice, the law and equity will intervene and cast aside the legal fiction of independent corporate existence, as distinguished from those who hold and own the corporate capital stock, and deal with the corporation and stockholders as identical entities with identical duties and obligations.

[4] Accordingly it has been held that upon a sufficient showing that a corporation is but the instrumentality through which an individual, who is the sole owner of all of the corporate capital stock, for convenience transacts his business, equity, looking to the substance rather than the form of the relation, and the law as well, will hold such corporation obligated for the acts of the sole owner of the corporation to the same extent and just as he would be bound in the absence of the existence of the corporation. Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 Pac. 986; Commercial Security Company v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 Pac. 964; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 Pac. 673. Thus proof that an individual owns all of the stock of a corporation and that the corporation is in truth and in fact but the corporate double of the owner of the stock will, in conjunction with a further showing that as a result of the double relationship fraud or injustice will inure to a third person, suffice to dissipate the separate identity of the corporation. Minifie v. Rowley, supra. In such a situation, where, as here, the rights of third persons are involved, the law will have no compunction in holding the contract of the owner of the corporation dealing with the corporate assets to be the contract of the corporation. Porter v. Lassen County Land Co., 127 Cal. 261, 59 Pac. 563; Schuyler v. Pantages, 54 Cal. App. 83, 201 Pac. 137; Swartz v. Burr, 43 Cal. App. 442, 185 Pac. 411.

In Erkenbrecher v. Grant, 187 Cal. 7, 200 Pac. 641, it was held that in order to cast aside the legal fiction of distinct corporate existence it must appear that "they are the 'business conduits and alter ego of one another', and that to recognize their separate entities would aid the consummation of a wrong."

Minifie v. Rowley, supra, states the rule to be:

> "Before the acts and obligations of a corporation can be legally recognized as those of a particular person, and vice versa, the following combination of circumstances must be made to appear: First, that the corporation is not only influenced and governed by that person, but that there is such a unity of interest and ownership that the individuality, or separateness, of the said person * * * has ceased; second, that the facts are such that an adherence to the fiction of the separate existence of the corporation would, under the particular circumstances, sanction a fraud or promote injustice. * * * It is not necessary * * * that the complaint allege actual fraud; it is sufficient if the facts set forth disclose that the dealings were in form with a corporation but in reality with an individual and that a refusal to recognize this fact will bring about inequitable results."

It is at once apparent, in the instant case, that an adherence to the fiction of independent corporate existence would permit Caroline S. Wenban, despite the fact that she herself ignored the corporate fiction and treated the bonds in suit as her own, to seek shelter behind a corporate existence, which was no more nor less than her individual self, and thereby escape all liability for obligations to third persons incurred by her in her dealings with the assets of the corporation. In short, an adherence to the fiction of independent corporate existence, under the circumstances of the instant case, would permit Caroline S. Wenban to secure an advantage over third persons, through the medium of the corporation, to which she would not be entitled as an individual, and which it would be inequitable to permit her to obtain and retain.

[5] True, there is no showing or claim of fraud in the instant case on the part of Caroline S. Wenban or the corporation plaintiff. Still, as previously indicated, it is not necessary that actual fraud be shown. It is sufficient if a refusal to recognize the fact of the identity of the corporate existence with that of the individual would bring about inequitable results. All of the facts and circumstances surrounding the inception of and attending the controversy in suit bring the case clearly within the two requirements declared in Minifie v. Rowley, supra, to be sufficient to constitute the cause of action stated in the cross-complaints of the several appellants.

Although in the instant case it is the corporation which is seeking to have the bonds annulled, such relief, if effected, would obviously be for the benefit of Caroline S. Wenban as sole shareholder. As was said in Home Fire Ins. Co. v. Barber, 67 Neb. 644, 93 N. W. 1024, 60 L. R. A. 927, 108 Am. St. Rep. 716, where a corporation "is proceeding in equity to assert rights of an equitable nature, or is seeking relief upon rules or principles of equity, the court of equity will not forget that the stockholders are the real and substantial beneficiaries of a recovery, and if the stockholders have no standing in equity, and are not equitably entitled to the remedy sought to be enforced by the corporation in their behalf and for their advantage, the corporation will not be permitted to recover."

The acts of Caroline S. Wenban being the acts of the corporation, the contract of Caroline S. Wenban of March 16, 1910, is the contract of the corporation and binding upon it. The resolution of the corporation of June 28, 1908, and the written conveyance of Caroline S. Wenban of August 26, 1909, both purporting to convey 500 bonds to Hewlett, are to be read and construed in the light of this ultimate and final agreement between Hewlett and Caroline S. Wenban. This agreement represents the final understanding of the parties thereto, and clarifies and controls the terms of the preceding instruments.

It is evident that the delivery of the 500 bonds, expressly ratified in said agreement, was never intended to be a delivery for the purpose of vesting title to the entire 500 bonds in Hewlett. The agreement does, however, on its face show that title to 100 of the bonds, numbered 1 to 100, inclusive, was intended to be vested in Hewlett in cancellation of past accounts. The mere fact that 100 of the bonds were so segregated as payment for past accounts clearly evidences, when considered in conjunction with the other recitals of the instrument, the fact that the remaining 400 bonds were delivered to him, not for his own personal use and benefit, but for the purpose of financing the affairs of the corporation. Indeed, the contract itself expressly provides that the 400 bonds or the equivalent in property shall be kept in a separate trust fund. Incidentally it may be noted again that the contract provides that for Hewlett's future labor, services, and money advanced he shall be paid in bonds equivalent in value to the difference between the value of the 400 bonds at the time of the agreement and their value at the time of the cancellation. This fact shows that it was not intended to pass title in the 400 bonds to Hewlett at the time of the agreement, for manifestly, if it were the intent of the agreement that he was to be the absolute owner of the bonds, he would be entitled to the full value of the bonds at the time of the cancellation of the agreement. Hewlett, therefore, became the actual and absolute owner of only 100 of the bonds.

[6-7] As to the other 400 bonds, however, he was expressly authorized "in his private capacity to mortgage, hypothecate, sell, or trade the bonds at his own discretion" in order to create a fund for the improvement of the corporation plaintiff's property. By such provision he was made an agent of Caroline S. Wenban, the sole owner of the corporation, and consequently the agent of the corporation to dispose of the bonds. In short, the conclusion is inescapable that the relation of principal and agent existed not only between Caroline S. Wenban and Hewlett but between Hewlett and the corporation as well. The corporation, through its alter ego, having conferred upon Hewlett the power and the authority to dispose of the bonds as if they were his own and the bonds, as a result of such power and authority, having come into the possession of third parties for value, in the ordinary course of business, the corporation will not now be heard to complain that Hewlett did not have the power to carry into effect his authorization. Grange v. Judah Boas Co., 60 Cal. App. 484, 213 Pac. 712.

[8] The fact that the appellants other than Mary Huntington made no inquiry as to Hewlett's right or authority to pledge the bonds will not deprive them of title or the right to possession thereof. Hewlett had not only possession of the bonds but had actual authority to dispose of them. It is the fact of actual authority and not the knowledge of the fact on the part of the pledgees and transferees which is the controlling factor. Fairmont Creamery Co. v. Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Co., 33 Cal. App. 414, 165 Pac. 553; Id. 47 Cal. App. 103, 190 Pac. 194.

[9] Hewlett being vested with power as the corporation's agent to sell or pledge the bonds for the corporation's benefit, it follows that whatever consideration he received for their sale or pledge became consideration for the bonds as effectually as if the sale or pledge had been made by the corporation itself.

The evidence shows without contradiction that the Security Trust & Savings Bank loaned Hewlett $7,500 upon the security of 15 of the bonds; the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank (formerly German American Trust & Savings Bank) loaned him $50,000 on the security of 150 of the bonds; Mary E. Nelson loaned him $31,500 upon the security of 80 of the bonds; Mary A. Huntington loaned him $200,000 on the security of 200 of the bonds.

[10] All of this money, under the undisputed facts, must be regarded as consideration for the bonds, and did not fail to be such consideration merely because Hewlett did not use the money for the purpose for which it was intended by his principal. For that breach of trust the corporation had its remedy over against Hewlett for an accounting and settlement.

Obviously this case is not analogous to those cases which hold that, where an agent or an employee obtains possession of nonnegotiable instruments merely by reason of the fact that he had access thereto and disposes of them without right, no title could be transferred by such agent or employee.

[11-13] Either, therefore, by reason of the absolute ownership of Hewlett in 100 of the bonds or by reason of his express authority to dispose of the remaining 400 bonds as his own, the appellants herein to whom Hewlett pledged or transferred the bonds have legal title to or right to possession of the bonds which are now in their possession.

Holding, as we do with reference to 400 of the bonds in suit, that Hewlett held the same as the agent of Caroline S. Wenban and that she, when conferring the power of agency upon Hewlett, was, as the sole owner of the corporation, acting for the corporation, and that the consideration which he received from the purchasers and pledgees of the bonds was a consideration to the corporation, eliminates any need for a discussion of the point made that there was no consideration from Hewlett to Caroline S. Wenban, and the corporation plaintiff for the transfer and delivery to him of said 400 bonds. We are still, however, confronted with the contention that there is no evidence of a consideration emanating from Hewlett to Caroline S. Wenban or the corporation plaintiff for the transfer and delivery to him of that lot of bonds in suit numbered 1 to 100. Upon this phase of the case it may be said that the written agreement dated March 16, 1910, which acknowledged a delivery of the 100 bonds immediately under discussion to Hewlett in cancellation of past accounts, being in writing, is itself presumptive evidence of a consideration therefor. Civ. Code, § 1614. Moreover, the agreement, as previously noted, purported to cancel all past obligations between the parties thereto, and, in effect, declared that in consideration of the cancellation of past accounts between said parties the particular bonds last referred to were delivered to the defendant Hewlett. Indeed, it may be said that this agreement, in the particulars referred to, was in the nature of an account stated. True, this agreement does not, in terms or otherwise, set out mutual or cross-accounts or demands between the parties, but this was not necessary in order to make it an account stated. It clearly and unequivocally, we think, expressly acknowledges a pre-existing debt, and marks and measures the compensation which was given and accepted in satisfaction of that debt, and this acknowledgment of the debt was sufficient to form the basis of an account stated. In short, it is a complete account stated because it embodies a signed written acknowledgment of an unqualified indebtedness or liability accompanied by a delivery and acceptance in payment of the indebtedness of the lot of bonds referred to therein as being numbered from 1 to 100, inclusive.

[14] While it is the general rule that the expressed consideration of an agreement is not conclusive upon the question as to what was in fact the real consideration for the agreement, still it is a well settled and recognized exception to this rule that the legal effect of an account stated may not be opened and defeated by a mere showing of a lack of consideration, nor can an account stated be attacked and opened by the party to whom it was rendered and accepted in any other way than by appropriate pleading and proof of its procurement through fraud, duress, or mistake, or other ground which would appeal to a court of equity in an action for the avoidance of the account stated. This is held to be so upon the theory that an attack upon an account stated for lack of consideration is forever foreclosed by the covenants and agreements of the parties, as expressed in the agreement itself. Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 150 Pac. 994.

[15] The plaintiff's first cause of action does not seek to avoid the legal effect of the agreement in question in so far as it purports to be an account stated between Caroline S. Wenban and Hewlett by any allegation in substance or effect that it was procured through fraud, duress, or mistake. If the plaintiff had desired to initiate an opening and an avoidance of the account as stated, in so far as it concerned the bonds still remaining in the possession of the defendant Hewlett, it should have laid the ground therefor by an appropriate pleading. Gardner v. Watson, supra; Merchants' National Bank v. Carmichael, 50 Cal. App. 749, 759, 196 Pac. 76. Of course, it goes without saying, if it had appeared from the answer of the defendant Hewlett that, with reference to these particular bonds, the issue of an account stated was tendered, then the averments of the answer in that behalf would have constituted new matter, and under our system of pleading would have been deemed denied. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. Under the general issue thus raised, on such new matter, the plaintiff would have been permitted to show fraud in the procurement of the account stated just as if such fraud had been specially and specifically pleaded. Sterling v. Smith, 97 Cal. 343, 346, 32 Pac. 320.

While it is true that the allegations of the plaintiff's second cause of action charge the defendant Hewlett with misrepresentations, deceit, abuse of confidential relations and fraud generally in his dealings with Caroline S. Wenban, and particularly with reference to the existence of the agreement of March 16, 1910, which embodies the account stated, this second cause of action does not in terms purport to proceed upon the theory that the account stated in that agreement between Hewlett and her was to be avoided because of fraud in its procurement. Nor did the trial court find that it was conceived and consummated in fraud. Liberally construed, the allegations of the second cause of action might perhaps be rightly considered as a pleading for an opening and an avoidance of the account stated, but even so the plaintiff's allegations of that cause of action are specifically denied by the defendant Hewlett, and the record shows that the issues raised by the pleadings on the second cause of action were never determined by the trial court.

[16] If it be conceded that after events disclosed by the record before us tend to show that the account stated was made and based upon a claim or demand of doubtful validity and value, still the adjustment of a doubtful right is a good consideration for an account stated, and therefore the party aggrieved will not be heard to say, in an endeavor to avoid the result of an account as stated, that the claim or demand upon which it was made and based was unjust and invalid. Gardner v. Watson, supra. It may be safely said, we think, that the recitals of the agreement itself, in addition to the fact that, as a written instrument, it imported a consideration, sufficiently show that at the time of the making of the agreement Hewlett was asserting some claim and making some demand upon Caroline S. Wenban, the justness, if not the legality, of which she recognized and accepted by her formal written agreement.

[17] Apart from the foregoing consideration an inspection of the record before us discloses undisputed facts tending to show that some consideration of value in the form of money, property, and services passed from Hewlett to Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation plaintiff prior to the making of the agreement of March 16, 1910, for the particular lot of 100 bonds immediately under discussion. Thus there is evidence uncontradicted to the effect that the defendant Hewlett agreed to pay and did pay certain designated legitimate obligations of the corporation running into large amounts of money, and that he did, prior to the execution of the agreement of March 16, 1910, perform certain services for Caroline S. Wenban and the corporation before and after the corporation was organized, which services were rendered in the promotion of the affairs of the corporation, and which inured to the benefit of the corporation itself. That these advances and services were consideration for the transfer to Hewlett of the particular 100 bonds under discussion and specifically designated in the agreement of March 16, 1910, is evidenced, we think, by the fact that Mrs. Caroline S. Wenban, by that agreement, recognized that Hewlett had given some consideration of some value prior to the making of that agreement for the transfer to him of said 100 bonds. And it is the rule that, if there is some consideration emanating from a legitimate transaction, one not tainted with fraud, and intended to redound to the benefit of the corporation, the constitutional and statutory requirements for the issue of corporate bonds, is so far as the corporation or its stockholders are concerned, are satisfied. McKee v. Title Insurance Co., 159 Cal. 206, 113 Pac. 140; California Trona Co. v. Wilkinson, 20 Cal. App. 694, 130 Pac. 190.

[18] Some contention is made that there was not an actual manual tradition from either the corporation or from Caroline S. Wenban to Hewlett of the bonds, and that therefore there was no legal delivery. This contention is founded upon the fact that at the time of the written agreement of March 16, 1910, between Hewlett and Caroline S. Wenban, which acknowledged a delivery of the bonds in suit to Hewlett, the same were already in his possession as an officer of the corporation. In such a situation it cannot be said that there was no effective delivery. The law does not require, under the circumstances of the instant case, that in order to constitute a delivery it was necessary for Hewlett to go through the idle and useless ceremony of returning the bonds and delivering up the possession of them to Caroline S. Wenban and then receive them back again in order to constitute a valid delivery. The acknowledgment of the delivery of the bonds already in Hewlett's possession being inconsistent with the supposition that Hewlett was continuing in possession of them in his capacity of managing director of the corporation, was sufficient to constitute a complete delivery. Snider v. Thrall, 56 Wis. 674, 14 N. W. 814.

[19] The plea of the bar of the statute of limitations set forth in the several answers of the defendants was rightly rejected by the trial court. The plaintiff's cause of action is for equitable relief, and therefore, section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure embodies the only statute of limitation applicable to the case. While the action is one for equitable relief, it is not in its primary purpose nor in the strict sense a mere action for the cancellation of instruments. The gravamen of the plaintiff's cause of action is that the bonds in suit, although existing and outstanding obligations of the corporation, and although apparently valid upon their face, are not and never were the bonded obligations of the corporation plaintiff. In its essence it was an action instituted pursuant to the provisions and permission of section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine adverse claims made against the property of the plaintiff corporation, upon an alleged obligation of the plaintiff corporation, and whatever other relief may have been demanded in the prayer of plaintiff's complaint, such as a surrender up of the bonds in suit alleged to be held by appellants, is clearly but a mere incident to the real relief sought by the plaintiff, viz., an adjudication that the plaintiff was not liable for any obligation purporting to emanate from the bonds in suit. The origin and purpose of the above-cited code section are evidently to be found in that principle of equity jurisprudence which confers jurisdiction upon courts for the purpose of administering protective and preventive justice by directing the delivery up of securities or other instruments which, although not void on their face, are alleged, in truth and in fact, to be void and invalid obligations, and which may be vexatiously and injuriously used at a distance of time when the proper evidence to repel the claim may have been lost or obscured, against the person upon whom the obligation is placed.

Equity will assume jurisdiction in such a situation, for, if, as alleged, the securities in suit were not valid obligations of the corporation plaintiff, they ought not to be used or enforced, and, this being so, it would be contrary to conscience to permit the parties holding the securities to retain them, since they could only do so for some sinister purpose. The plaintiff's complaint, although it does not so plead in terms, may be fairly said, when considered in its entirety, to state facts which show a cause of action by the corporation plaintiff against the several defendants to determine adverse claims upon alleged obligations of the corporation plaintiff made by the several defendants against the corporation plaintiff. So considered, the cause of action in the instant case is to be distinguished from that discussed in the case of Gagossian v. Arakelian, 9 Cal. App. 571, 99 Pac. 1113, wherein it was pointed out that the obligation there in suit was that of a third party.

[20] Although no demurrers were interposed in the court below attacking the sufficiency of the complaint upon any grounds, it is now insisted that the corporation plaintiff's complaint does not state a cause of action sufficient to bring it within the purview of section 1050. In this behalf it is argued that the complaint is defective in not affirmatively alleging that any claim or demands were being made or being asserted against the corporation for or on account of the bonds in suit. We think it fairly inferable from all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint that the several defendants who were in possession of the bonds in suit were asserting or were about to assert claims against the plaintiff based upon the obligations of said bonds. Moreover, it is apparent from the answers and cross-complaints of the several defendants that whatever defect there may be in the complaint in the particular stated was cured by the allegations of the answers and the cross-complaints, which show definitely and affirmatively that the several defendants were asserting or about to assert a claim adverse to the plaintiff based upon the bonds in suit.

[21, 22] The plaintiff's cause of action as pleaded does not purport to be grounded in fraud, and therefore contains no allegation as to the time of the discovery of the pledge and transfer by Hewlett to the other defendants of the bonds in suit. If it were otherwise proper that such an allegation be made, then let it be noted that no demurrers upon that or any other ground were interposed to the plaintiff's complaint, and, in so far as the plea of the statute of limitations as interposed in the answers of the several defendants may concern or involve the question of the need of notice to the plaintiff of the time when the adverse claims in suit were first asserted, it will suffice to say that the plaintiff's complaint was filed October 22, 1914, and the record shows some evidence to support the trial court's finding on the statute of limitations, to the effect that Flora Wenban Mills, the secretary of the corporation plaintiff, who lived with Caroline S. Wenban and was fully acquainted with the latter's affairs and the affairs of the corporation plaintiff, never heard or knew of the adverse possession of the bonds in suit until the month of January, 1913, and that Caroline S. Wenban herself never heard of any such adverse possession until she obtained the information to that effect from Flora Wenban Mills.

[23] It necessarily follows from what we have said that a reversal of the judgment must be ordered, and, in view of the fact that the case must go back for a new trial, it is proper to note that the action, being one in equity, and equity having assumed jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, will proceed, to the end of preventing a multiplicity of suits, to dispose, as prayed for, of all of the equities and priorities, if any, existing between the several parties to the case.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LAWLOR, J.; WASTE, J.; SHENK, J.

MYERS, C. J., deeming himself disqualified, does not for that reason participate.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The rehearing is denied. It is appropriate, however, to say that the use of the word "loaned" in the statement of the opinion that "Mary A. Huntington loaned him (the defendant Hewlett) $200,000 on the security of 200 of the bonds" is inaccurate. While Mary A. Huntington did not actually loan the defendant Hewlett $200,000 she did assign to him a one-half interest in a note calling for the payment of $400,000. In consideration of this assignment Hewlett was to turn over to her certain stock in the Pacific Ranch & Land Company, and as a guarantee that she would receive $200,000 out of this stock he deposited with her as security the said 200 bonds. While he did not, as he had agreed, turn over to Mary A. Huntington the stock referred to, he did deposit the bonds with her as security when she made the assignment to him of the one-half interest in the note. The opinion upon this particular phase of the case should have read that she held the said 200 bonds as security for the $200,000 which she was to receive from the stock of the Pacific Ranch & Land Company.

All concur, except MYERS, C. J., and STURTEVANT, Justice pro tem., who, deeming themselves disqualified, did not participate herein.

In determining need and propriety of classified legislation, where same does not appear upon face of legislative enactment, the court may resort to its judicial knowledge of contemporaneous conditions and situation of people, existing economic, sociologic, and civic policy of state, and all other matters of common knowledge.

10. Evidence 🔑12, 43(1)—Large population of certain counties and increased court business resulting judicially noticed.

It is a matter of common knowledge, to be noticed judicially, that there are several counties of the state, each possessing a population many times greater than the population of each of the remaining counties, that such counties have more court business and require more trial jurors, that boards of supervisors have more business to dispose of, and are personally acquainted with less of their constituents, and that superior court judges are well qualified, and doubtless better qualified than supervisors, to select jurors.

11. Constitutional law 🔑70(2)—Legislative selection of limit in classified legislation reviewed only in plain case of abuse.

Where discretion to classify laws is vested in Legislature, selection of limit of class is legislative power which will be judicially reviewed only in plain case of abuse.

12. Constitutional law 🔑205(7)—Statutes 🔑89—Statute providing for appointment of jury commissioner in designated counties held not invalid as disturbing uniformity of county government or granting special privileges.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 204a–204e, which permits appointment of jury commissioner in certain counties by judges of superior courts, held not violative of Const. art. 1, § 21, relative to special privilege or immunities, or article 11, § 4, relative to uniform system of county government; jury commissioner when appointed being adjunct of judicial system.

Three cases, the first two being petitions by James Martin and George Anastasion, respectively, for writs of prohibition directed against the Superior Court of Sacramento County and Charles O. Busick, as Judge thereof; the third case being a petition by Fred W. Chapman for writ of habeas corpus directed against the Sheriff of Sacramento County. Order to show cause in first two cases dismissed, and petitions denied, and preliminary writ of habeas corpus dismissed, and petitioner remanded to custody.

In S. F. 11128:

S. Luke Howe, R. B. Hibbitt, Markham Johnston, O. F. Meldon, and T. A. Farrell, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, and Roy W. Dowds, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of petition.

R. Platnauer and Wm. H. Devlin, both of Sacramento, amici curiæ.

In S. F. 11139:

T. A. Farrell, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Wm. H. Devlin, of Sacramento, amicus curiæ.

In Cr. 2683:

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and Wm. V. Cowan, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondents.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, and Roy W. Dowds, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of petition.

Wm. H. Devlin, of Sacramento, amicus curiæ.

LENNON, J. The three above-entitled cases, although differing in the facts which form the basis of the respective petitions, present precisely the same legal questions for decision. Each petition attacks the legality of the procedure provided for the selection and listing of trial jurors in certain counties of the state of which the county of Sacramento is one.

In the matter of the application of Fred W. Chapman, the petitioner seeks his release upon habeas corpus from a judgment adjudging him guilty of contempt of court in refusing to answer a summons to appear and serve as a trial juror and in refusing to act as a trial juror in the superior court of the county of Sacramento. The petitioner, Chapman, was summoned pursuant to the procedure provided by section 204 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The petitioners in the Anastasion Case and the Martin Case seek writs of prohibition to have the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento restrained from proceeding to a trial of the causes, in which they are respectively defendants, with a jury composed of persons selected to serve as trial jurors in said court for the year 1924.

In the Anastasion Case the petitioner was charged with unlawfully having in his possession intoxicating liquor in violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) with two prior convictions. Thereafter he was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and his case was set for trial for the 30th day of April, 1924. The manner and method of listing and selecting the persons to serve as trial jurors in the said superior court and from whom the jurors were to be drawn for the trial of the two last mentioned cases followed the provisions of the Code sections last above referred to.

A discussion and a decision of the facts and the law as applied to the Martin Case will suffice as a basis for the decision in the other two cases.

The petition for a writ of prohibition in the Martin Case is predicated upon the following facts: The petitioner was on the 27th day of November, 1923, indicted by the grand jury of the county of Sacramento for the crime of murder. Thereafter the petitioner was duly arraigned upon said charge, and thereupon pleaded not guilty. Subsequently the cause was set down for trial upon a designated day. Thereafter, at a time some several weeks in advance of the date set for the trial of the cause, a majority of the judges of said superior court made and entered a court order directed to one Matt P. Barnes, as "jury commissioner of Sacramento county," to return to said court within a specified time a list of one hundred qualified persons to act as trial jurors in civil and criminal causes during the ensuing year. Thereafter, pursuant to said order, the said Barnes, as jury commissioner, returned to said court a list of persons qualified to act as jurors. Whereupon the said judges selected each and all of said persons to serve as trial jurors in said court for the ensuing year of 1924. Subsequently the judge of department 1 of said court, wherein the charge of murder was and is pending against the petitioner, made and entered an order directing the clerk of said court to draw from the regular trial jury box of said county, in which were the names, and only the names, of persons returned and selected in the first instance as aforesaid, the names of 75 persons from which would be drawn the names of the persons to serve as trial jurors during the April session of said superior court. Upon said drawing being made the court directed to be issued and placed and there was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county a venire for the summoning of said persons returnable April 14, 1924. Thereafter the said sheriff returned said venire to said court, together with his return thereon, specifying the names of said jurors so summoned.

Prior to the filing herein of the Martin petition the said superior court, over the objection of the petitioner, declared its intention and purpose to proceed with the trial of the case of the said petitioner, now pending in said court, with the persons so as aforesaid selected to serve as trial jurors in said court.

In support of the petition for the writ of prohibition, it is contended that that portion of section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, c. 195, p. 436), relating to the selection of jurors, which provides that "In counties and cities and counties having a population of ninety thousand inhabitants or over, such selection shall be made by a majority of the judges of the superior court, * * *" is unconstitutional and void, in that it violates those provisions of the state Constitution which provide that:

> (1) "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Article 1, § 11.
> (2) "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the Legislature, nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens." Article 1, § 21.
> (3) "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Regulating the practice of courts of justice. * * * Summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries, and providing for their compensation. * * *" Article 4, § 25, subds. 3 and 8.

While the petitioner refers to and relies upon all of the sections of the Constitution above quoted, nevertheless the sum and substance of the argument made in support of the petition is condensed into the one proposition that the law in question is special legislation, in that it does not uniformly apply to and operate upon all persons and things throughout the state.

Section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed prior to 1923 provided in substance and effect that the superior court of each county, in the month of January of each year, should designate the estimated number of grand and trial jurors required for the transaction of the business of the court and the trial of causes therein during the ensuing year; that the court should select and list the grand jurors, and that immediately after the making of the order designating the estimated number of trial jurors "the board of supervisors shall select * * * a list of men and women to serve as trial jurors * * * during the ensuing year. * * *" It will be noted that the section in question, as it existed prior to 1923, contained the further provision that—

> "In counties and cities and counties having a population of one hundred thousand inhabitants or over, such selection shall be made by a majority of the judges of the superior courts."

By the amendment in question, as enacted in 1923, the basis of classification for the purpose of selecting and returning jurors for courts of record was changed from counties and cities and counties having a population of 100,000 inhabitants or over to counties and cities and counties having a population of 90,000 inhabitants or over.

It is conceded, as indeed it must be, that, where a classification of persons or things is distinctive and such distinction is based upon some "constitutional, or natural, or intrinsic distinction," laws may be made applicable to such class alone, providing the act is uniform as to all persons or things within such class. But it is argued in the instant case that there is no "constitutional, or natural or intrinsic distinction" inherent in the procedure and practice requisite for the selection and listing of trial jurors in counties having a population of 90,000 or over and the procedure and practice required for the same purpose in the remaining counties of the state having smaller populations.

[1-3] The amendment under consideration is not, in our opinion, a special law. It is a general law having a uniform operation upon a class of persons or things readily and naturally differentiated from another class of persons or things by reason of the necessities peculiar to the subject-matter of the legislation. A law is not special legislation merely because it does not apply to all persons. It is a settled principle of constitutional law that the Legislature may classify for the purpose of meeting different conditions, naturally requiring different legislation, in order that legislation may be adapted to the needs of the people. If the law is to bear equally upon all persons, the Legislature must classify whenever there exists a reason which may rationally be held to justify a diversity of legislation. In other words, different persons, different localities, and different governmental organizations and agencies may justly be found by the Legislature to stand in different relations to the law, and if the same law were, in such a situation, to be applied to all alike, it would not bear equally upon each of them. Darcy v. Mayor, etc., of the City of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; In re Sumida, 177 Cal. 388, 170 Pac. 823.

[4] The classification, however, must not be arbitrarily made for the mere purpose of classification, but must be based upon some distinction, natural, intrinsic, or constitutional, which suggests a reason for and justifies the particular legislation. That is to say, not only must the class itself be germane to the purpose of the law, but the individual components of the class must be characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes which suggest the need for and the propriety of the legislation. Subject to these limitations a law is general despite the fact that it operates only upon a class of individuals or things, if it applies equally to all persons or things within the class to which it is addressed. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Darcy v. Mayor, etc., of San Jose, supra; People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190, 75 Pac. 782; Title, etc., Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 Pac. 578; Matter of Application of Martin, 157 Cal. 51, 106 Pac. 235, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242; Matter of Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 Pac. 429; Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 138 Pac. 355; In re Sumida, supra; In re Morganstern (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 721.

[5-8] The power to thus classify necessarily carries with it a wide discretion in the exercise thereof. The authority and the duty to ascertain the facts which will justify classified legislation must of necessity rest with the Legislature, in the first instance, to whom has been given the power to legislate, and not to the courts, and the decision of the Legislature in that behalf is ordinarily conclusive upon the courts. Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the legislative act, and the legislative classification will not therefore be disturbed unless it is palpably arbitrary in its nature and neither founded upon nor supported by reason. In the Matter of a Proceeding to Validate the Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment No. 6 of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage District (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 27. It follows that in any given case if the existence of a state of facts of which the court may take judicial notice seems to have been made the basis of a particular piece of legislation, and if it may be reasonably said that such facts afford good ground for the making of a particular classification, the legislative enactment will be upheld, although the reason therefor does not appear prima facie in the law itself. Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230; Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 679, 98 Pac. 1059; People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207; Matter of Application of Martin, supra; Ex parte King, supra; Matter of Petition of Burke, 160 Cal. 300, 116 Pac. 755; In re Sumida, supra; Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 27 Sup. Ct. 289, 51 L. Ed. 499.

It cannot be said that the classification made by the Legislature in the instant case is palpably arbitrary and was made merely for the purpose of a classification which bears no relation to the inherent purpose of the law. To the contrary, we are of the opinion that good and sufficient reason existed for the classification. The amendment in question doubtless was enacted in order to facilitate and expedite the work of the superior courts in the more populous counties of the state. Manifestly, the plan of having trial jurors in such counties selected by a majority of the judges of the superior courts rather than by the board of supervisors of the county tends to promote the efficiency and expedition of the business of the courts.

[9, 10] In determining the need and propriety of classified legislation, where the same does not appear upon the face of the legislative enactment, the court may resort to its judicial knowledge of the contemporaneous conditions and situation of the people, the existing economic, sociologic and civic policy of the state, and all other matters of common knowledge. It is a matter of common knowledge, to be noticed judicially, that there are several counties of the state each possessing a population many times greater than the population of each of the remaining counties of the state; that the counties with the greater populations have vastly more court business and consequently require many more trial jurors than the less populous counties; that the boards of supervisors of the counties of the greater population have a larger, more continuous and complicated volume of official business to deal with and dispose of than do the boards of supervisors of the many less populous counties; that the boards of supervisors of the more populous counties are personally acquainted with only a comparatively small percentage of their constituents, and therefore less qualified to determine who, among their constituents, possess the degree of moral and intellectual fitness requisite for jurors, than are the boards of supervisors of the less populous counties who are ordinarily in closer communication with their constituents; that the judges of the superior courts, coming, as they do, constantly in contact with the personnel of trial jurors, are, by reason of their observation and experience, well qualified to perform the duties of selecting and listing persons to serve as trial jurors; and that, in a situation where the persons to be selected as trial jurors in the more populous counties are not personally known to the boards of supervisors, the judges of the superior court, doubtless, are better qualified to make the required selection than the boards of supervisors, who, because of their multitudinous duties incidental to the government of such counties, cannot be expected to give the time and thought requisite to the selection of trial jurors. From the foregoing facts the conclusion is readily deducible, and doubtless was deduced by the Legislature when enacting the legislation in question, that in counties having a small population the boards of supervisors have both the requisite time and frequent opportunity for observation requisite to the selection of the limited number of trial jurors required to serve the needs of the courts in these counties, and that the boards of supervisors of the more populous counties have not the requisite opportunity because of their other multitudinous duties and lack of personal acquaintance to personally and properly select the large number of trial jurors required in the more populous counties, and for that reason it may be said that the distinction which the Legislature drew between the known situation existing in counties having a population of 90,000 and over and counties having a lesser population was a natural and intrinsic distinction which amply justified the legislation complained of. In short, there is good reason for the distinction made by the amendment and a most natural one. The classification being permissible, it is not and cannot be denied that the law purports to, and undoubtedly does, in its operation and effect, apply equally and uniformly to all persons and things falling within the designated class.

The case of Ex Parte Brady (Cal. App.) 224 Pac. 252, cited and relied upon in support of the contention that the Legislature had no power to make the classification complained of in the instant case, is not in conflict with anything decided here. There the court had under consideration the question of whether or not an amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 73 and 142, Stats. 1923, c. 42, p. 78) which provided that one session of the superior court should be held in each city containing a population of not less than 50,000, located in counties of the first class, whose city hall was not less than 15 miles distant from the site of the county courthouse, was unconstitutional in that it was special legislation. The court there, speaking through Mr. Justice Houser, recognized and reaffirmed the settled rule that a statute even though it does not purport to apply to all of the people of the state, is not special legislation and therefore unconstitutional if it applies to and affects all individuals and things embraced within a proper classification, and then held that the classification made by the Legislature in that case was not a proper classification, for the reason that, having in mind the purpose of the statute, no constitutional, natural, or intrinsic distinction existed between cities containing a population of not less than 50,000 located in counties of the first class, and cities containing a population of not less than 50,000 located in counties not of the first class. We are satisfied that the conclusion reached in the case last cited is correct, and we are in substantial accord with the reasoning upon which that conclusion is based. Obviously, the situation presented in the instant case is distinctly different from the situation presented in the Brady Case in this, that in the instant case a natural and intrinsic difference as a basis for the classification is readily discernible, whereas in the Brady Case no sufficient reason existed or could be conceived for the classification there held to be unconstitutional.

[11] The point is suggested rather than argued that the legislation in question is special legislation in that the numerical basis of classification was reduced from 100,000 to 90,000 for the express purpose of admitting Sacramento county into the group of larger counties. It will suffice to say that it does not appear upon the face of the legislation that this was the purpose of the Legislature, and while it may, nevertheless, well be argued that that was the legislative purpose and intent, still the fact remains that the power of determining the numerical basis of the classification rested with the Legislature, and, having the power to fix the limit of population at 100,000, to which, in the first instance, the legislation applied, there can be no doubt, it seems to us, that the Legislature had the power to reasonably reduce the numerical limits of population whenever, in the exercise of a wise discretion, the exigencies of a given situation so required. In other words, "where the discretion so to classify is vested in the Legislature, the selection of a limit is a legislative power which will be judicially reviewed only in a plain case of abuse." Matter of the Petition of Burke, supra.

[12] Incidental to the main point presented in support of the petition, it is argued that sections 204a to 204e of the Code of Civil Procedure are violative of article 1, § 21, of the Constitution, in that the appointment of a jury commissioner and the listing of juries by him is made optional with the judges of the superior courts in the various counties wherein the provisions of these sections purport to have operation and effect. The constitutional provision last above referred to has to do and deals only with special privileges or immunities, and we fail to perceive, and counsel for the petitioner has not pointed out, how or in what manner the appointment of a jury commissioner as a part of the judicial system of the state to serve certain designated courts can be construed and counted a special privilege or immunity within the meaning of those constitutional provisions. The most that we can make out of the contention of the petitioner in this particular is that the creation of the office of jury commissioner is tantamount to the creation of a county office, and, being optional with the judges of the courts wherein such appointment may be made, runs counter to the uniformity of the system of county government prevailing throughout the state. The case of Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120, is cited in support of the contention thus apparently made. That case is readily distinguishable from and has no application to the situation here. There it was held in effect that a legislative enactment giving to boards of supervisors the power, at their option, to appoint a county engineer in the place and stead of the county surveyor permitted the creation of a county office contrary to the constitutional provisions (article 11, § 4), which contemplate and command a uniform system of county government. The provision of the statute under consideration in the instant case which provides for and permits the appointment of a jury commissioner, in certain designated counties, to assist the judges of the superior courts of those counties in making selections of trial and grand jurors, does not create a state or county office, and the jury commissioner, when appointed, like other attachés of the judicial system of the state, is no more than an adjunct of that system acting in the capacity of a mere employee to enable the court to transact its judicial work in an orderly and expeditious manner, and is an adjunct "which the Legislature, we do not doubt, has the right to provide for when it deems necessary." Noel v. Lewis, 35 Cal. App. 658, 662, 170 Pac. 857, 859.

The writ of habeas corpus heretofore issued in the Chapman Case is dismissed, and the petitioner remanded to the custody from whence he came.

RILEY, State Controller, v. FORBES et al., State Board of Accountancy. (S. F. 10947.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1924.)

1. States 🔑62—Act prohibiting payment of accountancy board's expenses from state treasury held not repealed or modified.

St. 1905, p. 382, § 1, amending St. 1899, p. 110, § 1, did not repeal or modify St. 1901, p. 645, § 2, subdivision 4 of which prohibits payment of accountancy board's expenses from state treasury, so as to require board to pay fees collected by it into state treasury on controller's demand, in view of Pol. Code, § 454.

2. Statutes 🔑219—Contemporaneous construction by executive officers persuasive.

Contemporaneous construction of statutes by officers charged with duty of executing them is persuasive.

3. Statutes 🔑162, 225½—General held not to repeal prior special act, unless irreconcilably inconsistent; special act prevails as against later general act treating of same subject.

General statute, treating of same subject as prior special statute, will not be held to have repealed latter, unless irreconcilably inconsistent, but special act will prevail, so far as subject-matter is within its particular provisions.

4. States 🔑76—Fees collected by state board of accountancy held not "moneys belonging to state" within act requiring payment into state treasury; "public moneys."

Moneys collected and disbursed by state board of accountancy under St. 1901, p. 645, § 2, subds. 4, 7, for expenses, are not "moneys belonging to the state" required to be paid into state treasury by St. 1905, p. 382, amending St. 1899, p. 110, § 1, though they are "public moneys" in sense that they cannot be charged or collected without legislative authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Money.]

5. States 🔑58—Act authorizing state board of accountancy to charge and collect fees held not impliedly repealed.

Budget amendment (Const. art. 4, § 34), and St. 1923, pp. 242, 247, § 1, appropriating money for support of state board of accountancy, and providing that amounts therein appropriated shall govern, did not impliedly repeal St. 1901, p. 645, § 2, subdivision 4 of which authorizes board to charge and collect fees to meet expenses which must be paid from current receipts.

6. States 🔑132—Appropriation for support of state accountancy board held not available to it.

As budget bill (St. 1923, pp. 242, 247, § 1), appropriating sum for support of state board of accountancy, did not repeal or disturb operations of board as self-supporting board under St. 1901, p. 645, creating it, such appropriation from general funds of state is not available to such board.

In Bank.

Application by Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, for writ of mandate to compel John F. Forbes and others, as members of and constituting State Board of Accountancy, to pay money into state treasury. Peremptory writ denied.

Ralph W. Smith and Wesley E. Marten, both of Sacramento, and Louis B. Diavila, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Allen G. Wright, of San Francisco (Wright & Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHENK, J. The petitioner, as controller of the state of California, instituted this proceeding in mandate to compel the respondents, as members of and constituting the state board of accountancy, to account to the petitioner for and to pay into the state treasury all moneys received by the respondents and alleged by the petitioner to be moneys belonging to the state during the months of July, August, September, October, and November, 1923.

There is no dispute as to the facts. The only question for determination is as to the legal obligation of the respondents to account for the moneys so received and to pay the same over as demanded. The petitioner bases his claim first on the provisions of section 1 of an act of March 17, 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 110), as amended in 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 382). The section as originally enacted required that—

> "All moneys belonging to the state, received from any source whatever, by any commission or commissioner, by the board of trustees, board of managers, board of directors, or executive officer, as the case may be, of any state hospital, asylum, prison, school, or harbor, supported by or under the control of the state, shall be accounted for at the close of each month to the state controller, in such form as the controller may prescribe, and at the same time, on the order of the controller, be paid into the state treasury, and credited to a fund to be known as the contingent fund of the particular institution from which such moneys are received, and the same shall be expended under the same laws and provisions as now govern the expenditure of moneys appropriated for the support of such institutions. * * *"

As amended in 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 382), the foregoing section was made to read as follows:

> "All moneys belonging to the state received from any source whatever by any officer, commission or commissioner, board of trustees, board of managers or board of directors, shall be accounted for at the close of each month to the state controller, in such form as the controller may prescribe, and at the same time, on the order of the controller, be paid into the state treasury; provided, in the case of any state hospital, asylum, prison, school or harbor, supported by or under control of the state said money shall be credited to a fund to be known as the contingent fund of the particular institution from which such money is received, and may be expended under the same laws and provisions that govern the expenditure of money appropriated for the support of such institutions. * * *"

This section was again amended in 1906 (Stats. 1906, p. 43), but in no way affecting the questions now under consideration. It is contended by the petitioner that the general language of the amendment of 1905 brought the respondent board within the scope of its provisions.

The respondent board was created by an act approved March 23, 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 645). Section 1 of the act provides for the appointment of five members of the board by the Governor. In section 2 it is provided that the board shall have its offices in the city and county of San Francisco, and prescribes its powers and duties in examining and certifying applicants to practice as certified public accountants. Subdivision 4 of this section provides that the board shall have power, and it shall be its duty, "to charge and collect from all applicants such fee, not exceeding twenty-five dollars, as may be necessary to meet the expenses of examination, issuance of certificates and conducting its office; provided, that all such expenses, including not exceeding five dollars per day for each member while attending the sessions of the board or conducting examinations, must be paid from the current receipts, and no portion thereof shall ever be paid from the state treasury." Subdivision 7 of the section requires the board "to report annually to the Governor, on or before the first day of December, all such certificates issued or renewed, together with a detailed statement of receipts and disbursements; provided, that any balance remaining in excess of the expenses incurred may be retained by the board and used in defraying the future expenses thereof." The respondent board was organized pursuant to the provisions of said act of 1901, and has continued to function as such thereunder. It has received and disbursed its own funds, and has made its annual report to the Governor as required. No demand was made upon the respondent to account to the controller for moneys received and pay the same into the state treasury until after the enactment of the budget bill in 1923.

[1] It is apparent from the general language of the act of 1899 as amended in 1905 that the Legislature did not intend to reach out and commit to the general funds of the state the revenues of the respondent board under the act of 1901. There is no provision of that amendment which would permit the payment of such revenues into any but the general fund of the state. The general fund consists of moneys received into the treasury and not specially appropriated to any other fund. Section 454, Pol. Code. The amendment of 1905 makes specific provision for crediting moneys received from any state "hospital, asylum, prison, school or harbor" to a special or contingent fund for the support of the particular institution mentioned, and a familiar rule of construction would exclude the creation of special funds under the act for the support of other boards or institutions paying money into the treasury under the general terms of the act. If the respondent board had complied with the requirements of the act of 1905 from the time of its enactment, and paid the moneys received by it into the state treasury, we find no provision of law by virtue of which such moneys could have been withdrawn for the support of the respondent board. Furthermore, the terms of the act of 1901, in language appropriate to the subject, would have precluded such payment, for it is provided in subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act that all expenses of the board must be paid from its current receipts, "and no portion thereof shall be paid from the state treasury." In other words, if the respondent board had acceded to the requirements of the general language of the amendment of 1905 from and after its enactment, and had paid its revenues into the state treasury, and had sought a controller's warrant on the treasury of the state for its expenses, the controller would have been confronted with the specific inhibition of the statute against any payment for such purposes from the state treasury. We cannot conclude that the general language of the amendment of 1905 had the effect of repealing or modifying the act of 1901, as contended by petitioner.

[2] This construction of the statutes in question seems to have been followed by both the respondent board and by the state controller during all the time from 1905 to 1923, a period of over eighteen years. Such contemporaneous construction is persuasive in support of the contention of the respondent. In United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52, 7 Sup. Ct. 413, 30 L. Ed. 559, it was said:

> "A contemporaneous construction by the officers upon whom was imposed the duty of executing those statutes is entitled to great weight; and since it is not clear that that construction was erroneous, it ought not now to be overturned."

To the same effect see United States v. Johnston, 124 U. S. 236, 8 Sup. Ct. 446, 31 L. Ed. 389; Railroad Comm'rs v. Market Street Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 677, 64 Pac. 1065; and Comstock v. Davis, 44 Cal. App. 275, 186 Pac. 380.

[3] The evident purpose of the act creating the respondent board was to make it self-supporting. It treats of but one subject, and as against the general language of the amendment of 1905 the respondents have invoked, and we think properly so, the rule of construction that, "where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions." Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal. 580, 44 Pac. 238; Estate of Brewer, 156 Cal. 89, 103 Pac. 486; Matter of Petition of Johnson, 167 Cal. 142, 138 Pac. 740. We find no irreconcilable inconsistency between the two acts. When read together they would mean that under the general language of the amendment of 1905 all state departments and agencies properly coming within its terms and receiving money belonging to the state shall account for and pay the same into the state treasury, but as to the state board of accountancy the expenses for its maintenance and support and compensation to its members for official services rendered shall be paid from fees collected from applicants for certificates to practice as certified public accountants, and none of said expenses shall ever be paid from the state treasury. Judge Cooley has stated the rule thus:

> "The repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the one later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation, except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect." Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (6th Ed.) p. 182.

[4] It is also insisted by the respondent that the amendment of 1905 is not applicable to the board for the reason that the moneys collected and disbursed by it under the act of 1901 are not "moneys belonging to the state," in the sense in which this phrase is there used. The petitioner resists this contention, but cites no authority in support of his position. On the other hand, the respondents have called attention to several cases in other jurisdictions which seem to be directly in point. In Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218, the Supreme Court of Missouri had under consideration an act of the Legislature creating a board of examiners for barbers, providing for the issuance of licenses to barbers upon the payment to the board of certain specified fees, and providing that the members of the board should receive a compensation of $3 per day and railroad and traveling expenses to be paid out of any moneys in the hands of the treasurer of the board. The petitioner in that case was arrested for engaging in the occupation of a barber without a license, and on habeas corpus proceedings contended that the act in question was in violation of the provisions of section 43 of article 4 of the Constitution of Missouri, which provided that all moneys received by the state from any source whatever should go into the state treasury and not be withdrawn therefrom except pursuant to a regular appropriation under the law. The contention was held not well founded for the reason, as stated by the court, "that section 43 of article 4, applies only to money provided for and received by the state. The money authorized to be collected under this act is not state revenue, but is simply a provision to make the board of examiners self-supporting."

In State v. Clausen, 51 Wash. 548, 99 Pac. 743, the Supreme Court of the state of Washington had under consideration an act passed by the Legislature of that state in 1891 providing for the location and maintenance of the state college of Washington. The institution derived its revenues in part from the general and state governments, in part from the students for rent, and in part from the sale of agricultural products. During the year 1908 the treasurer of the board of regents lawfully received from sources other than the general and state governments something over $7,000 which he deposited in the state treasury under the belief that he was required to do so. The respondent state auditor refused to honor the demand on behalf of the regents of the college to withdraw the sum so deposited, basing his refusal on an act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 179), which provided in part as follows:

> "That it shall be the duty of each state officer or other person (other than county treasurers) who is authorized by law to collect or receive moneys belonging to the state or to any department or institution thereof, to transmit to the treasurer of the state each day, all moneys collected by him on the preceding day, together with a statement of the source from which each item of said money was derived, and to transmit to the state auditor a duplicate of said statement." Section 1.

The question involved was whether such funds were "the finances of the state" or "moneys belonging to the state," as contemplated by the act of 1907. It was held that, while the "finances of the state in its broad sense would probably include the money deposited by the college with the state treasury," still it was "apparent that the Legislature did not intend by this general language to reach out and include the fund in controversy."

In People v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 367, 44 N. E. 146, 32 L. R. A. 344, the Court of Appeals of New York decided that an act of the Legislature of that state providing that two-thirds of the revenues derived from licenses authorized to be issued under the act should belong to the city or town in which the same was collected, to be used in defraying the expenses of the local government, was not an appropriation of "public moneys," and did not violate the provisions of the state Constitution forbidding the appropriation of such moneys for local purposes without a two-thirds vote of the Legislature.

It may well be assumed that the moneys collected by the respondent board are "public moneys" in the broad sense of the term. They are funds over which the Legislature has control in the first instance; that is to say, they may not be charged or collected without legislative authority. But, when the Legislature has acted with reference thereto, and has directed that the same shall be collected and disbursed in a particular way for a particular purpose under the circumstances here shown, and not in accordance with the general statutes concerning the collection and disbursement of funds paid into the state treasury, it may reasonably be concluded that the Legislature intended that such funds should be devoted to the support of the respondent board until otherwise specifically ordered by the lawmaking power, and should not be deemed "moneys belonging to the state," as contemplated by the general language of the amendment of 1905.

[5] It is next contended by petitioner that, even if the act of 1905 did not disturb the operation of the respondent board under the act of 1901, the adoption of the budget amendment to the Constitution (Const., art. 4, § 34) and the provisions of the budget bill (Stats. 1923, p. 242) had the effect of repealing the act of 1901 in so far as the latter act constituted an authorization to the respondent board to retain and disburse such revenues in accordance with its provisions.

The budget amendment to the Constitution requires the Governor to submit to the Legislature a budget containing a complete plan and itemized statement of all proposed expenditures of the state provided by existing law or recommended by him "of all its institutions, departments, boards, bureaus, commissions, officers, employees and other agencies, and of all estimated revenues," and to submit with the budget an appropriation bill covering the proposed expenditures. The budget bill enacted pursuant to the constitutional amendment contains an appropriation relating to the state board of accountancy in the following language: "For support, state board of accountancy, five thousand thirty dollars." Stats. 1923, p. 247. The budget bill contains the following language relative to the effect of appropriations therein contained on existing statutory provisions for items of salary or support included in the act: "In all cases in which statutory provisions or appropriations have been made for items of salary or of support included in this act the amounts herein appropriated shall govern, and such other appropriations shall not be deemed in addition hereto," (section 1) and it is contended by petitioner that, inasmuch as the Legislature has made the appropriation hereinbefore referred to, all authority for expenditures for compensation to the members of the board and expenses provided for by the act of 1901 has been abrogated. This contention is not well taken unless a repeal of said act, either expressly or by necessary implication, has been accomplished by the budget bill. It is not contended that an express repeal has taken place, but it is insisted that there is such a conflict between the budget bill and the act of 1901 as to constitute a repeal of the latter by implication. The effect of the budget amendment and the provisions of the budget bill on certain existing statutes providing for the disposition of moneys collected and disbursed under the authority of such statutes has been construed by this court in numerous so-called "budget cases." Railroad Commission v. Riley, 218 Pac. 415; Keiser v. State Board of Control, 218 Pac. 1016; Jamme v. Riley, 218 Pac. 578; Western Shore Lumber Co. v. Riley, 218 Pac. 761; Board of Osteopathic Examiners v. Riley, 218 Pac. 1018.

It was held in Railroad Commission v. Riley, supra, that the budget constitutional amendment did not repeal by implication any prior appropriation bill validly enacted by a previous Legislature, and that the budget bill did not operate as an implied repeal of all appropriations provided for by statutes preceding the budget bill nor do away with all special funds and convert such funds into a part of the general funds of the state. It was said in that case:

> "In the absence of some specific provision in the budget bill requiring that the special funds be transferred to the general fund, it would seem that the legislative intention is clearly shown to be that such special funds shall remain intact as special funds."

This construction of the constitutional amendment and of the budget bill was followed and approved in the other budget cases above cited.

The situation here presented is still stronger for respondent. Here we are not dealing with any special fund in the state treasury but with a fund of a self-supporting agency of the state concerning which the Legislature in effect has stated in the act of 1901 shall not be paid into the state treasury.

[6] It is urged by the petitioner that, if the respondent board is to continue, notwithstanding the budget bill, to collect and disburse the funds as provided for in the act of 1901, the said board "would not be limited for its operating expenses, charges and salaries to the fees and commissions alone, but would also receive the fund set apart in the budget bill for materials, supplies, services and expenses." But, since the provisions of the budget bill did not repeal or disturb the operations of the respondent board as a self-supporting board under the act of 1901, we conclude that the items of appropriation in the budget bill purporting to set apart moneys from the general funds of the state for the support of the respondent board are not available to said board so long as it continued to function under its own act. It should be said, however, that in this proceeding we are not called upon to consider or determine the question of whether or not the amounts specified in the budget bill and relating to the respondent board constitute a limitation upon the expenditures which said board may make during the fiscal years mentioned in said budget bill.

The peremptory writ is denied.

RILEY, State Controller, v. THOMPSON et al., Board of Pilot Commissioners. (S. F. 10946.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1924.)

1. Pilots 🔑4—Percentage of pilots' fees paid to pilot commissioners not "moneys belonging to the state" to be accounted for and paid into state treasury.

While members of board of pilot commissioners are state officers (Pol. Code, § 368), and authorized to license pilots (section 2457), fees collected by licensed pilots, as authorized by sections 2465, 2466, and percentage paid to commissioners, as required by section 2460, are not "moneys belonging to the state," within St. 1899, p. 110, § 1, as amended by St. 1905, p. 382, § 1, requiring that all such moneys be accounted for and paid into state treasury.

2. Statutes 🔑219—Contemporaneous construction by executive officers entitled to great weight.

Contemporaneous construction of statutes by officers charged with duty of executing them for many years is entitled to great weight, and should not be overturned, unless clearly erroneous.

3. Pilots 🔑4—Act requiring payment of part of fees to board of pilot commissioners for salaries and expenses held not impliedly repealed.

Pol. Code, § 2460, requiring licensed pilots to pay 5 per cent. of fees collected to board of pilot commissioners for payment of salaries of employees and members and incidental expenses, was not impliedly repealed by budget amendment to Constitution (Const. art. 4, § 34) or budget bill (St. 1923, p. 247, § 1), appropriating money for salaries of employees and support of such board.

In Bank.

Application by Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, for writ of mandate to compel Andrew Thompson and others, as Commissioners and Board of Pilot Commissioners for Ports of San Francisco, Mare Island, and Benicia, to account for money received. Writ denied.

Ralph W. Smith and Wesley E. Marten, both of Sacramento, and Louis B. Diavila, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco (F. D. Madison and M. D. L. Fuller, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHENK, J. The petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the respondents, as members of and constituting the board of pilot commissioners for the ports of San Francisco, Mare Island, and Benicia, to account to him as controller of the state of California for and to pay into the state treasury all moneys received by the respondents pursuant to section 2460 of the Political Code during the months of September, October, and November, 1923.

The respondent board was created by an act of the Legislature approved March 22, 1870 (Stats. 1869–70, p. 344). In 1872 this act in all its essential respects was codified and is found in sections 2429–2470 of the Political Code. Section 12 of the act was substantially re-enacted in section 2460 of the Political Code, the pertinent part of which is as follows:

> "Every pilot of the harbor of San Francisco, Mare Island, Vallejo, and Benicia must, once in each month, upon blanks to be furnished them by the board of pilot commissioners, render a verified account to the board of all moneys received by him, or by any other person for him, or on his account, and pay five per cent. thereof to the board, in full compensation for its official services, for the services of its secretary and treasurer, and all incidental expenses. * * *"

This section was amended in 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 6), but in no way affecting this controversy. For nearly 53 years the respondent board has received these moneys from pilots in accordance with the provisions of said statute, and has disbursed the funds so received for expenses and for compensation to the members of the board for official services rendered.

After the adoption of the budget amendment (article 4, & 34, Const.), and the enactment of the budget bill (Stats. 1923, p. 242), the petitioner made demand on the respondents to render an account to petitioner of the moneys received from pilots as provided in said section 2460 of the Political Code. The petitioner bases his right to such accounting on section 1 of an act approved March 17, 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 110), as amended on March 20, 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 382), and on June 14, 1906 (Stats. 1906, p. 43), on the budget amendment to the Constitution and on certain provisions of the budget bill.

Section 1 of the act of March 17, 1899, required an accounting to the state controller and payment into the state treasury of "all moneys belonging to the state" received by the board of trustees, board of managers, board of directors or executive officer in charge of any "state hospital, asylum, prison, school, or harbor." The amendment of March 20, 1905, assumed to make the requirement general in its application as follows:

> "All moneys belonging to the state received from any source whatever by any officer, commission or commissioners, board of trustees, board of managers or board of directors, shall be accounted for at the close of each month to the state controller, in such form as the controller may prescribe, and at the same time, on the order of the controller, be paid into the state treasury."

The amendment of June 14, 1906, did not change the wording of the section in the quoted portion nor in any other respect involving the question here under consideration.

It is contended by the petitioner that the moneys received by the respondents pursuant to said section 2460 are "moneys belonging to the state," as contemplated by the act of 1905. This contention is advanced upon the theory, as stated by counsel for petitioner, that the state board of pilot commissioners is a state agency; that the power to collect pilot fees is only by reason of governmental authority, and that, when a board or commission is created by legislative action, and is empowered by the lawmaking power of the state to charge and collect fees or commissions the moneys collected are a part of the state revenues and funds belonging to the state, and "can only be diverted by a specific appropriation by the Legislature."

[1] The members of the board of pilot commissioners are officers of the state. Section 368, Pol. Code. The board is authorized to license pilots. Section 2457, Pol. Code. When so licensed pilots are authorized to charge and collect fees from owners of vessels in accordance with rates provided by the statute. Sections 2465, 2466, Pol. Code. Money so charged and collected by pilots may not be said to be "moneys belonging to the state" when in the hands of the pilots. They are in the nature of fees or compensation for services rendered the same as is charged and collected by other officers, such as port wardens (section 2510, Pol. Code), notaries public (section 798, Pol. Code) and commissioners of deeds (section 815, Pol. Code). Pilots are required by said section 2460, Political Code, to account to the respondents for all moneys received by them, and to pay five per cent. thereof to the respondents for the purpose of paying the salaries of employees of the board, the incidental expenses of the board, and as compensation to members of the board for official services rendered. Does this payment by the pilots of five per cent. of their fees or pilotage for the purposes specified in said section 2460 convert the moneys so paid to the respondents into "moneys belonging to the state" as contemplated by section 1 of the act of 1905? We cannot conclude that it does. Such moneys may be public funds in the sense that they are acquired by the respondents under legislative authority and may be disbursed only for the uses and purposes specified in said section 2460, but they do not constitute moneys, an account of which must be made to the petitioner and which must be paid into the state treasury as required by the act of 1905. The evident purpose of section 2460 was to make the respondent board self-supporting. If the board may not disburse the funds so received under said section 2460, it is difficult to see how it could function as an agency of the state. We find no legislative authority for the payment of compensation to the members of the board or salaries for the employees of the board or incidental expenses of the board from the state treasury, unless, of course, as petitioner contends, the budget amendment or the budget bill constitutes such authority.

Petitioner has cited no authorities in support of his contention that the moneys so paid by pilots to respondents under the circumstances here shown are "moneys belonging to the state," and apparently there are none in this state. On the other hand, respondents have cited many cases in other jurisdictions which lend support to their contention that moneys received and disbursed under similar circumstances do not constitute "moneys belonging to the state." Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 215; State v. Clausen, 51 Wash. 548, 99 Pac. 743; People v. Murray, 149 N. Y. 367, 44 N. E. 146, 32 L. R. A. 344. These cases were cited and discussed in Riley v. Forbes (S. F. No. 10947) 191 Cal. —, 227 Pac. 768, and need not be further commented upon.

[2, 3] The respondent board has continued to collect from pilots the percentage of pilotage provided for in section 2460 of the Political Code and prior enactments for nearly 53 years. The act of March 20, 1905, was in effect more than 18 years before the state controller made his demand upon the board of pilot commissioners for an accounting. We therefore have a contemporaneous construction of the statutes here under consideration by executive officers of the state extending over a long period of years which is entitled to consideration. As was said in United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52, 59, 7 Sup. Ct. 413, 417 (30 L. Ed. 559):

> "A contemporaneous construction by the officers upon whom was imposed the duty of executing those statutes is entitled to great weight; and since it is not clear that that construction was erroneous, it ought not now to be overturned." Railroad Comm'rs v. Market Street Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 677, 64 Pac. 1065; Comstock v. Davis, 44 Cal. App. 275, 186 Pac. 380; Riley v. Forbes, supra.

We apprehend that the question now presented would not have arisen if it had not been for the enactment of the budget amendment of 1922 and the budget bill in 1923, the effect of which will next be considered.

The budget amendment to the Constitution requires the Governor to submit to the Legislature a budget containing a complete plan and itemized statement of all proposed expenditures of the state provided by existing law or recommended by him "of all its institutions, departments, boards, bureaus, commissions, officers, employees and other agencies, and of all estimated revenues," and to submit with the budget an appropriation bill covering the proposed expenditures. The budget bill enacted pursuant to the constitutional amendment contains an appropriation relating to the state board of pilot commissioners in the following language:

> "For salaries of employees of state board of pilot commissioners, two thousand four hundred dollars. For support, state board of pilot commissioners, one thousand one hundred dollars." Stats. 1923, p. 247.

The budget bill contains the following language relative to the effect of appropriations therein contained on existing statutory provisions for items of salary or support included in the act: "In all cases in which statutory provisions or appropriations have been made for items of salary or of support included in this act the amount herein appropriated shall govern, and such other appropriations shall not be deemed in addition thereto," and it is contended by petitioner that, inasmuch as the Legislature has made the appropriation hereinabove referred to, all authority for expenditure for salaries and expenses provided for by said section 2460 has been abrogated. This contention is not well taken, unless a repeal of said section, either expressly or by necessary implication, has been accomplished.

It is not urged, and, of course, could not be properly contended, that an express repeal has taken place. It is insisted, however, that there is such an irreconcilable conflict between the budget bill and section 2460 of the Political Code as to effect a repeal of the latter by implication. This contention cannot be sustained. The effect of the budget amendment and the provisions of the budget bill on certain existing statutes providing for the disposition of moneys collected and disbursed under the authority of such statutes has been construed by this court in numerous so-called "budget cases." Railroad Commission v. Riley, 218 Pac. 415; Keiser v. State Board of Control, 218 Pac. 1016; Jamme v. Riley, 218 Pac. 578; Western Shore Lumber Co. v. Riley, 218 Pac. 761; Board of Osteopathic Examiners v. Riley, 218 Pac. 1018; Riley v. Forbes, supra.

It was held in Railroad Commission v. Riley, supra, that the budget constitutional amendment did not repeal by implication any prior appropriation bill validly enacted by a previous Legislature, and that the budget bill did not operate as an implied repeal of all appropriations provided for by statutes preceding the budget bill nor do away with all special funds and convert such funds into a part of the general funds of the state. This construction of the constitutional amendment and of the budget bill was followed and approved in the other budget cases above cited.

It should be noted that section 2460 of the Political Code is not a measure appropriating funds in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, nor does it create a special fund in the state treasury applicable to the purposes therein contemplated. It does, however, constitute statutory authority for the collection and disbursement of funds over which the Legislature has control. By its authority the board of pilot commissioners receives the money direct from the pilots and disburses the same in paying the salaries of the secretary and treasurer of the board, in defraying the necessary expenses of the board and as compensation to the members of the board for official services rendered, and is in effect a "statutory provision" for items of salary and support as contemplated by section 1 of the budget bill. It will also be noted that the appropriations in the budget bill make no provision for the item of salary or other compensation to members of the board of pilot commissioners for official services rendered, and it is impossible to segregate the moneys which the board is authorized to collect and disburse under said section 2460 so as to determine what portion is for compensation to the members and what portion is to be applied to the salaries of employees and incidental expenses, for the reason that the revenues of the board are dependent upon pilotage collected, and are not subject to definite ascertainment. The salaries of employees of the board and incidental expenses must first be met, and the members of the board receive for their compensation only the residue. An examination of the appropriations in the budget bill for the various departments of the state government discloses that a distinction is made between items for salary or compensation to members of boards and other officers and expenditures otherwise required for conducting the official business of the state departments. Whenever an appropriation is intended as compensation to the members of a board or other officers, it is so designated under the head of "salaries." Other items appear under the heading "support." The sole items mentioned in connection with the respondent board are for "salaries of employees" of the board and for "support." It cannot be assumed that the Legislature intended to deny compensation to the members of the respondent board as provided for in said section 2460 of the Political Code. The case of State v. Jorgensen, 31 N. D. 563, 154 N. W. 525, involved the effect of an appropriation for salaries of tax commissioners in the budget bill of 1915 of the state of North Dakota on a prior legislative enactment fixing the salaries of such officials at a specified amount. The budget item provided for the salary of but one member, whereas the prior statute provided for a salary for each of the three members of the board. The court decided that it could not be concluded that the Legislature in the enactment of the budget bill intended to deprive the other two members of the board of all compensation, and held the appropriation as made an inadvertence and a nullity. So here, the budget bill having made no provision for compensation of the members of the respondent board, it cannot be assumed, in the absence of language evidencing the purpose so to do, that the Legislature intended to deprive the members of the board of compensation for official services rendered. It is also apparent that the situation here disclosed is one contemplated at least in part by the saving clause included in the budget bill, wherein it is provided in section 1:

> "Appropriations for purposes not otherwise provided for herein which have been heretofore made by any provision of the Constitution or of any existing statute shall not be affected by this act but shall continue to be governed by the constitutional or statutory provision applicable thereto."

All of the purposes of section 2460, Political Code, particularly that portion relating to compensation to members of the board for official services rendered, are "not otherwise provided for" in the budget bill. We think it clear from an inspection of the budget bill not only that appropriations in the strict sense under existing statutes, but also that moneys collected under existing statutes, should be disbursed under the provisions of those statutes when not otherwise effectively provided for in the budget bill.

Inasmuch as the attempted appropriation for the respondent board is ineffectual to cover the items provided for in said section 2460, and as said section has not been repealed, it would follow that the respondent board would continue to operate under said section 2460 until otherwise provided by the Legislature.

The peremptory writ is denied.

BOARD OF FISH AND GAME COMMISSIONERS OF CALIFORNIA v. RILEY, State Controller. (S. F. 11042.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1924.)

1. States 🔑131—Fish and game preservation fund held not affected by budget amendment to Constitution and budget bill.

St. 1909, p. 392, St. 1911, p. 807, St. 1913, p. 986, St. 1915, p. 685, St. 1917, pp. 470, 688, and St. 1921, p. 470, creating and regulating fish and game preservation fund, constituted continuing appropriation, which was not abrogated or affected by budget amendment (Const. art. 4, § 34), or budget bill (St. 1923, pp. 242, 253, § 1), as originally enacted or as later modified by Governor, under Const. art. 4, § 16.

2. States 🔑133—Board of control may authorize expenditures from fish and game preservation fund on exhaustion of appropriation.

Under Pol. Code, § 680, appropriation in budget law (St. 1923, pp. 242, 253, § 1) for fish and game commission having been exhausted, board of control, with Governor's consent, could legalize further expenditures, from fish and game preservation fund provided for by St. 1909, p. 392, St. 1911, p. 807, St. 1913, p. 986, St. 1915, p. 685, St. 1917, pp. 470, 688, and St. 1921, p. 470.

Application by Board of Fish and Game Commissioners of the State of California for writ of mandate to compel Ray L. Riley, State Controller, to aprove and draw warrant on state treasury. Writ granted.

R. D. Duke, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein seeks a writ of mandate to compel the respondent as state controller to approve and draw his warrant for the claim of the petitioner for the sum of $301.56, which, according to the petitioner's contention, is now payable out of the fish and game preservation fund. The facts upon which the petitioner's said claim is predicated and which are not disputed on this proceeding are as follows: In the year 1909 the state Legislature (Stats. 1909, p. 392) adopted an act providing for the creation of a special fund to be kept in the state treasury and be applicable to the payment of the expense of propagating, protecting, restoring, and introducing game fish into the public waters of this state, and also to the propagation, protection, restoration, and transferring of game birds and animals in, and to their introduction into, this state, which fund was to be designated as the "fish and game preservation fund." The administration of said special fund was by an amendment to said act, adopted in 1911

(Stats. 1911, p. 807), placed in the hands of the board of fish and game commissioners, and was made applicable to the payment of the expense of promoting the objects of its creation upon the approval of said board. From time to time thereafter this special fund was repleted from various sources, but chiefly from the issuance of licenses for the exercise of the privilege of fishing or hunting and from fines collected for the violation of the fish and game laws of the state. Stats. 1913, p. 986; 1915, p. 685; 1917, pp. 470, 688; 1921, p. 470. From the time of the original creation of the special fund in 1909 down to the date of the adoption of the so-called budget amendment to the state constitution and to the passage pursuant to its terms of the budget act of 1923 no further act of appropriation by the Legislature was made or was apparently deemed necessary to the full use of the money from time to time collected and deposited in this special fund, the foregoing acts being apparently deemed sufficient to create and provide for a continuing appropriation of the moneys in this fund to the purposes for which it was created. There is at present in this fund, according to the averment of the petition herein, a sum in excess of $280,000 applicable to the purposes of its creation.

At the general election of 1922 the so-called budget amendment to the state Constitution was adopted (Const. art. 4, § 34), and thereafter and pursuant to its terms the Governor presented to the Legislature of 1923 the budget provided for in said amendment, accompanied by an appropriation bill covering the proposed expenditures provided for in said budget and known as the budget bill. In the course of its said session the Legislature passed the act known as the budget act purporting to make the appropriations as outlined in said budget bill with such changes in and additions thereto as were deemed proper by the members of said Legislature. In so doing, and in dealing with the matter of providing funds for the functioning of the fish and game commission, the Legislature undertook to appropriate "for salaries, support and permanent improvements for the fish and game commission, such sum or sums as are provided in chapter two hundred fifty-six, statutes of nineteen hundred nine and all amendments thereto, such payments to be made from the fish and game preservation fund created thereby." Stats. 1923, pp. 242, 253. The Governor, in the exercise of his constitutional power (Const. art. 4, § 16), objected to certain of the items of appropriation embraced in said budget bill as enacted by the Legislature, and appended to the said bill at the time of signing it a statement of the items to which he thus objected. Among these was the aforesaid item embracing the appropriation for the fish and game commission. His objection thereto was in the following form:

> "I object to the item on page 14 [253] under the heading 'Developmental,' reading as follows: 'For salaries, support and permanent improvements for the fish and game commission, such sum or sums as are provided in chapter two hundred fifty-six, statutes of one thousand nine hundred nine and all amendments thereto, such payments to be made from the fish and game preservation fund created thereby,' and reduce the same to 'For salaries of officers and employees of the fish and game commission, four hundred thirty-eight thousand three hundred seventy dollars. For support of the fish and game commission, three hundred seventy-one thousand one hundred fifty dollars,' for the reason that the last-named sums are ample. The amendments proposed by the Legislature might leave the fish and game commission without any appropriation at all."

The appropriation thus objected to and thus modified became a law, and thus the general allowance made by the Legislature to the fish and game commission of the full amount of money in the special fish and game preservation fund, created by the act of 1909, above referred to, and the amendments thereto, was by the Governor's said action limited to the particular sums for salaries and support of the fish and game commission specified in his said objection. It is to be noted, however, that the Governor did not in his said objection and specification as to the specific funds to be available during the biennium to the commission change the statement of the statute as to the particular fund from which the amounts therein provided for the salaries and support of the commission were to be paid.

[1] In the several cases which have been brought before this court since the adoption of the budget amendment to the Constitution and the passage and modification of the budget bill and law we have had occasion to interpret both of these organic and statutory forms of law. In the case of Railroad Commission v. Riley, Controller, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 415, it was held that the effect of the budget amendment and of the budget bill was not to work a repeal, either expressly or by implication, of the provisions of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, p. 115) creating the "Railroad Commission Fund" and appropriating the same to the uses of the commission, but that said act and said fund remained and were valid existing provisions of law. In the case of Jamme v. Riley, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 578, it was held that the effect of the budget amendment and budget bill was not to repeal the act of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 980), providing for the better education of nurses and creating a special fund for the purpose upon which warrants by the state controller were to be drawn, but was that of placing a limitation upon the amounts available for such purposes from such existing and special fund. In the case of Western Shore Lumber Co. v.

Riley, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 761, it was held that the adoption of the budget amendment and enactment of the budget bill did not repeal the act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1281) creating a special fund for the enlargement of California Redwood Park and making a continuing appropriation therefor to be placed in a special fund upon which warrants for such purposes were thereafter to be drawn. In the case of Osteopathic Examiners, etc., v. Riley, etc (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 1018, it was held that the initiative law of 1922 (St. 1923, p. xciii), providing for the formation of a board of osteopathic examiners and for the creation through a system of fees and collections of moneys for the support of said self-sustaining board which were to be deposited in the state treasury in a special fund upon which warrants were to be drawn for the salaries, costs, and expenses of said board was not repealed or modified in this respect by the provisions of the budget amendment or budget bill. In this case also the appropriation provided for in said initiative law as well as the special fund into which the moneys derived from its operation were to be placed was in the nature of a continuing appropriation of such moneys to such purposes and to such special fund. In the case of Riley, etc., v. Forbes, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 227 Pac. 768, it was decided that the provisions of the act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 645), creating the state board of accountancy, providing for the charge, collection, and expenditure of fees in the course of its functioning to pay the current expenses of such self-sustaining board, was not repealed by the provisions of the budget amendment nor abrogated by the provision of the budget bill (Stats. 1923, p. 247) making a specific appropriation for the support of the state board of accountancy but not specifying any particular fund upon which the warrants for such appropriations should be drawn, and that the state board of accountancy, notwithstanding the foregoing specific appropriation in the budget bill or any other provision contained therein, had a right to have its said fund retained in the form of its original creation and expended to the limit of said appropriations, but otherwise unaffected by the provisions of the budget amendment and budget bill. In the still more recent case of Riley, etc., v. Thompson, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 227 Pac. 772, it was held that the petitioner as state controller was not entitled to a writ of mandate to compel the payment into the general fund in the state treasury of the moneys charged in fees and collected by the board of pilot commissioners under earlier acts and later sections of the Political Code creating said board, providing for the collection of such fees and for the disbursement as heretofore of a certain portion thereof directly by said board; and that as to such disbursements section 2460 of the Political Code providing therefor was unaffected by the provisions of the budget amendment or budget bill. The effect of the foregoing decisions by this court upon the situation presented by the instant case is to establish as settled law the proposition that the statutes of 1909 and 1911 creating the special fund in the state treasury known and designated as the fish and game preservation fund, as well as the several later enactments providing the sources of its accretion and the purposes of its disbursement under the direction and approval of the fish and game commission, created and constituted both a continuing fund and a continuing appropriation of the moneys deposited therein pursuant to said enactments, and that said special fund so created and so to be disbursed was not abrogated or otherwise affected by the provisions of the budget amendment or budget bill either as originally enacted or as later modified by the action of the Governor above referred to, except in so far as the Governor's said action carried into the budget law might be held to impose a limitation upon the amount of money available to the commission during the biennium provided for in said budget bill. The effect of these rulings upon the instant situation would seem to compel the conclusion that the special fund created by the act of 1909 and subjected to the control of the fish and game commission under the amendment to said act made in 1911 and known and designated as the "fish and game preservation fund" still exists, and is still applicable to the uses and necessities of the fish and game commission, and that the appropriation of the moneys collected therefor and deposited therein under the various acts of the Legislature relating thereto constitutes a continuing appropriation of such moneys to such uses and necessities; that the applicability of the moneys deposited in such fund to such uses and necessities has not been affected by the provisions of the budget amendment or budget bill or by the action of the Governor in his modification of the terms of said budget bill, but that the present availability of whatever balance remains and is in said special fund has been limited by and to the specific sums set forth in the Governor's said modification to said budget bill and which became in due course a part of the present budget law.

[2] This conclusion brings us to the particular situation presented by the instant proceeding. The petitioner herein alleges in effect that on the 28th day of January, 1924, there existed in the fish and game preservation fund a sum of money in excess of $280,000, consisting of moneys received from sales of hunting and fishing and other licenses and from fines and forfeitures imposed under and by virtue of the various acts of the Legislature providing for such accretions to such fund; that on the said 28th day of January, 1924, there existed a deficiency in the funds presently available to the fish and game commission due to the exhaustion of the support appropriation for the fish and game commission for the seventy-fifth fiscal year as appears from the contents of Exhibit A appended to and made a part of its petition. The support appropriation thus referred to has reference evidently to the amounts allowed to the fish and game commission in the budget bill as modified by the Governor's action thereon, and which amount had upon said date been equaled or exceeded by the expenditures of the commission since the going into operation and effect of the provisions of the budget law. The petition proceeds to allege that upon the 28th day of January, 1924, the board of control, acting under the provisions of section 680 of the Political Code and with the approval of the Governor as provided for in said section, authorized the creation of a deficiency to the extent of $5,695 in said appropriation upon the finding by said board of control that said appropriation had been exhausted and that there existed an actual and unavoidable necessity for the creation of such deficiency in order to meet the expenses of the commission for the balance of said fiscal year. The action of the board of control and of the Governor in so finding and in so doing is set forth in the resolution of that body with the Governor's approval indorsed thereon appended to said petition. The petitioner alleges that thereafter and pursuant to such action it duly issued and presented its duly audited claim for the sum of $301.56, representing a proper expenditure by said commission for supplies incident to its activities, which said claim, after being duly audited and approved by the board of control, was presented to the state controller, the respondent herein, in order to have a warrant therefor drawn upon the state treasury for the payment of said claim; that the said controller refused to draw his warrant therefor upon the ground, as set forth in his letter of refusal appended to set petition, that no appropriation has been made by the Legislature for the payment of said claim. Wherefore the petitioner herein applies for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to draw his warrant upon the proper fund in the state treasury for the payment of said claim. The immediate question which is presented for our consideration upon the foregoing state of facts is that of the interpretation to be placed upon and the effect to be given section 680 of the Political Code and to the action of the board of control thereunder and with the approval of the Governor as provided for therein. Section 680 of the Political Code was first enacted in its present form in the year 1911, and in the course of a revision by the Legislature of article 18 of title 1, part 3, of said Code, by which revision the board of control was created and invested with the powers and duties which it has since exercised. It may be stated incidentally, but not unimportantly, that the board of control was created and proceeded to function coincidentally with the creation and functioning of a goodly number of other boards and commissions which, in that or the immediately following sessions of the Legislature, were invested as agencies of the state with a variety of powers and duties which involved the collection and expenditure of public money derivable through their varied activities and to be expended in their diversified activities. Section 680 of the Political Code reads as follows:

> "The board, with the consent of the Governor, shall have power to authorize the creation of deficiencies in any appropriations of money made by law in cases of actual necessity, and shall authorize the payment of deficiencies out of any money which may be appropriated for such purpose. No deficiency shall be authorized except upon the written authority, first obtained, of a majority of the members of the board and of the Governor. Any indebtedness attempted to be created against the state in violation of these provisions shall be null and void and shall not be allowed by the board of control or the controller."

The portion of said section which first requires interpretation is that wherein the board of control, with the consent of the Governor, is invested with power "to authorize the creation of deficiencies in any appropriations of money made by law in cases of actual necessity." The evident intent of the Legislature in the use of this language was that of empowering the board of control with the Governor's consent to validate or render legal, in so far as lay within its power to do so, the expenditure of money by boards or officers of the state in excess of the sum or sums available for their respective expenditures by virtue of appropriations made by the Legislature, and in cases of actual necessity requiring such additional expenditures in order to the proper functioning of said respective agencies of the state. This is an entirely reasonable interpretation to be given to said clause in said section, and applying it as thus interpreted to the immediate case before us it would mean that the appropriation which had been made by the Legislature of 1923 in the budget law for the functioning of the fish and game commission for the seventy-fifth fiscal year, having been exhausted, and an actual necessity for further expenditures in excess of that appropriation having arisen, as found by said board of control, that body was granted power by the terms of said section of the Political Code and with the consent of the Governor, to legalize a further expenditure of money by the fish and game commission in excess of the specific amount provided for in said appropriation. Thus far the interpretation to be given the section of the Code in question is apparently plain sailing. The effect, however, of the exercise of the foregoing power by the board of control with the Governor's consent is to be determined by the succeeding clause in said section which provides that the board of control, having exercised the power to legalize the creation of deficiencies through the means of expenditures beyond the limit of a particular appropriation, "shall authorize the payment of deficiencies out of any money which may be appropriated for such purpose." It is the contention of the respondent herein that this clause in said section, read in conjunction with the clause which preceded it, means no more than that the board of control, which has thus authorized a particular board or officer of the state to create an indebtedness in excess of the limitations of the specific appropriations applicable to its expenditures, can only be granted authority to have such expenditure liquidated by the act of some subsequent Legislature consenting to make an appropriation "for that purpose." It is undoubtedly true that such would be the effect of the action of the board of control, with the Governor's consent, in authorizing the creating of an indebtedness by any state agency in excess of its specific appropriation if there were no other available means by which such excess indebtedness could be liquidated, except by a future legislative act making an appropriation for such purposes; but it would seem that, if that were the full extent of the meaning to be given to this second clause in said section in the Code, it would have been unnecessary to include it in the section at all, since the legalizing of an expenditure by such board of an amount in excess of its specific appropriation would in itself be sufficient to create a legal obligation against the state. It is true, it would not be an enforceable obligation in the absence of an act of the Legislature providing for its payment, but it would still be sufficient to create a moral obligation upon the Legislature to make such appropriation, and would also suffice to furnish such a consideration for its action in that regard as would serve to avoid the constitutional prohibition against the gift of public money. It would thus seem that the said second clause in said section, if deemed necessary to the section at all, must be given a broader meaning than that which the respondent herein would have us assign to it. The clause reads that the board, etc., "shall authorize the payment of deficiencies out of any money which may be appropriated for such purpose." It would appear at first glance that this clause, which is phrased subjunctively as to its mood, is not phrased in the future tense, and hence that without doing any violence to its grammatical construction it may be given a meaning which would render applicable to the payment of said deficiency indebtedness any money which either may have been or which may thereafter be appropriated for that purpose. This interpretation would also supply a reason for the inclusion of this clause in said section of the Code, since as to any moneys which had theretofore been appropriated, but were not in the absence of such authorization available, some such authorization would be required, while, as we have seen, it would not be required or necessary to justify or legalize a future legislative appropriation. The respondent, however, contends that the concluding phrase in said cause reading, "for such purpose," is to be given the limited meaning which would confine the appropriation mentioned to an appropriation made for the purpose of providing for such deficiency, thus of necessity limiting the applicability of said cause to future appropriations. We think, however, the phrase "for such purpose" can be given a broader meaning and one more in harmony, not only with what we deem the spirit and purpose of the section as a whole, but also more in keeping with our interpretation of the other clauses and portions thereof already passed under review. The "purpose" apparently intended by this phrase is that contemplated by the objects for the furtherance of which the particular board or officer was engaged in functioning and for which the specific appropriation had been made, and in the course of which its limitation in the matter of expenditures had been, or, in the judgment of the board of control, should be exceeded. Such an interpretation would be entirely in harmony with our construction of this clause in said section as a whole, since whatever existing appropriation might by the action of the board of control with the Governor's consent be authorized to be applied to the payment of such legalized indebtedness would of necessity be an appropriation which had been made for the purpose of paying those expenditures which the activities of the particular state agency seeking such relief had required.

The practical wisdom of this interpretation of said section will be apparent when we consider that the policy of our law is to discourage, if not forbid, except in cases of actual necessity, or of expenditures in permanent public improvements in excess of existing revenues, the creation of interest-bearing burdens upon the state or any of its operative agencies. Again applying these conclusions to the facts of the instant case and to the state of the law relating to the special fund in the state treasury known and designated as the fish and game preservation fund and to its condition and applicability to the purpose of the payment of the proper expenditures of the fish and game commission, whenever such expenditures, though in excess of the amounts provided for the support and expenses of said commission by the specific limitations of the budget law, have been legalized and thus made available for such purpose, we are of the opinion that the action of the board of control, taken with the consent of the Governor under the aforesaid provisions of section 680 of the Political Code, has been to effectuate an authorized and thus legalized expenditure by said commission, and for the purposes of its functioning, of the sum named in the resolution of the board of control authorizing the same. The action of the board of control as thus interpreted is not legislative in character, since its effect is not to make an appropriation, but is merely to render available, to the extent of its allowance, an appropriation already made.

It is our conclusion that such expenditure, being thus authorized, is payable out of said special fund upon which a claim, properly drawn and audited, has been presented to the state controller, and that he should be and is hereby directed to draw his warrant upon the state treasury and upon said special fund for the payment therefrom of said claim.

Let the writ issue accordingly.

CARNEY v. HEISCH. (Civ. 2801.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1924.)

Landlord and tenant 🔑86(2)—Notice of election to renew must state intention to renew on terms specified in lease.

If lessee has option to renew for a two-year period, notice of election to renew for one year is not binding upon lessor; such notice being an offer to make another lease and not to renew.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by John J. Carney against H. W. Heisch. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.

Frank L. Coombs and Nathan F. Coombs, both of Napa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action for unlawful detainer. The plaintiff leased certain lands to defendant "for a period of one year commencing on November 1, 1922, and ending on October 31, 1923." The lease contained the following provisions:

> "It is understood that the said property is for sale, and this lease is executed with that knowledge. That party of the second part hereby agrees that, in the event that a sale of the said property be made during the term of this lease, he will quit and surrender the possession of said property at the end of any annual period of said lease, after written notice by him received. * * *
> "It is further stipulated and agreed that, in the event that said property be not sold at the expiration of the term hereof and that the party of the second part shall have fully complied with all the terms, covenants, and agreements of this lease, that then he shall be entitled to a renewal thereof for a further period of two years."

The complaint, which was filed November 19, 1923, alleged the execution of the lease, the entry of the defendant thereunder, that the term thereof had expired, and that defendant was unlawfully continuing in possession of the premises. The answer denied the termination of the lease, and alleged, among other things, that "under the terms of said lease the privilege was granted to defendant to renew the same and to occupy the said premises under the terms thereof for a further period of one year from and after the 31st day of October, 1923, and that the defendant exercised said privilege, and by due notice thereof renewed the same for said additional period, and now lawfully occupies said premises under and by virtue of said renewal, and is entitled to said possession under the terms of said lease until the 1st day of November, 1924."

The court found all the allegations of the answer to be true, and adjudged "that the defendant was on the 1st day of November, 1923, ever since has been, and now is, in lawful possession of the premises described in plaintiff's complaint under a renewal of the lease as set forth in said answer." It is thus adjudged that the defendant exercised his option to renew the lease, not for "a further period of two years," as provided for in the lease, but for a period of one year only. Under the judgment the defendant may quit the premises, without incurring any liability therefor, on the 31st of October, 1924, while, under the terms of the lease, the exercise of his right of renewal would impose upon him the legal obligation to hold the premises and perform the covenants of the lease until October 31, 1925. In other words, the defendant's option was to renew the lease for a further period of two years, not for one year only.

> "A notice of an election to renew in order to be binding upon the lessor must state an intention to renew on such terms and for such a period as are specified in the lease. If the lessee has an option to renew for a period particularly specified, or at a particular rental, a notice by him that he will renew for a different period or at a different rental is nugatory, and it may be ignored by the lessor. In fact, such a notice of an election to renew the lease on different terms is an offer, not to renew, but to make another lease, and it will be regarded by the law as an implied election not to renew the old lease." Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, p. 1381.

See, also, Mershon v. Williams, 62 N. J. Law, 779, 42 Atl. 778.

If it be conceded that the evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant, in effect, notified plaintiff of the former's election to renew the lease for a further term of two years, the court has not found in accordance with such evidence, and the judgment is inconsistent with the rights of the parties under the lease. Since the evidence on a retrial of the case may not be the same as that contained in the record, a review of the evidence herein would serve no useful purpose.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Lichtig & Rothwell, Inc., against Wesley Ruggles. From a judgment for it, but deemed insufficient, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd Wright, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald, Frederick W. Williamson, and Alexander Macdonald, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff is a corporation engaged in acting as agent and broker for actors, directors, and others following the theatrical and moving picture business. The defendant is a moving picture director, and during the first part of October, 1920, he applied to the plaintiff and asked the latter to obtain employment for him. Mr. Lichtig, the president of plaintiff, thereafter had several conversations with Mr. Vieiller, the production manager of the Metro Pictures Corporation, regarding the employment of defendant, and on October 6, 1920, he introduced the defendant to Mr. Vieiller at the Metro Studio. As a result of this meeting the defendant, on October 6, 1920, entered the employ of the Metro Pictures Corporation at a salary of $850 per week. His first employment with this company was in the production of the picture known as "The Greater Claim." This picture was finished on November 30, 1920, and the defendant then began the production of a second picture, and, later on, of a third picture. Defendant was employed continuously on the production of these pictures from October 6, 1920, to March 30, 1921, at the same salary as mentioned above. On October 6, 1920, the defendant wrote plaintiff a letter, which, omitting the formal parts, was as follows:

> "I recognize that your office was instrumental in securing the engagement for me at the Metro Studios, as the result of your call of recent date. For your efforts in this direction, I agree to pay you the customary agent's fee of ten per cent. weekly of the money I receive for this engagement."

Defendant made several payments to plaintiff on account of the commission due from him to plaintiff, aggregating the sum of $467.50. The last of these payments being for $170, and was made on or about December 21, 1920. On December 23, 1920, the plaintiff made written acknowledgment of this last payment and inclosed to defendant a statement of account for commission of 10 per cent. on defendant's salary from October 6, 1920, to and including the week ending December 18, 1920, less such payments as had been made thereon. Defendant made no written reply to this statement, but after its receipt spoke to Mr. Lichtig regarding the same.

This action was instituted to recover from defendant commission on his salary during the entire period of his employment by the Metro Pictures Corporation; that is, from October 6, 1920, to March 30, 1921. The court found that plaintiff obtained an engagement for the defendant with the Metro Pictures Corporation, and that said engagement endured from October 6, 1920, to and including November 30, 1920, and no longer, and upon this finding awarded judgment in favor of plaintiff for 10 per cent. of the salary received by defendant during this engagement, and denied judgment for any further amount. Plaintiff appeals from that portion of said judgment which denied recovery for the full amount of its demand.

[1] It is plaintiff's contention that the evidence shows without contradiction that the understanding between the parties, at the time of defendant's employment was that defendant was engaged to direct the production of an indefinite number of pictures, and that this engagement was to continue so long as his services were satisfactory to the Metro Pictures Corporation. Plaintiff therefore attacks the finding of the court "that the engagement endured from October 6, 1920, to and including November 30, 1920, and no longer," on the ground that there is no evidence to support said finding.

Turning to the evidence, we find that the testimony of the defendant was to the effect that he was employed to produce one picture only, and after the approval of this picture by the officers of the company, he was employed to produce a second picture, and later on he was employed on a third. Mr. Lichtig, the president of plaintiff, testified that at the time of defendant's employment Mr. Vieiller said to defendant:

> "I know, Mr. Ruggles, that you can do this picture, the first that we are going to make. I have some others afterwards, all going to be specials. We have this story, and we wish you to do it."

To which the defendant replied:

> "I will be glad to do this story."

As far as the evidence shows, nothing was said at this time towards employing the defendant to produce these other specials. Mr. Engel, the general manager of the Metro Pictures Corporation, testified:

> "Mr. Ruggles was engaged on a picture—was engaged for one picture, and then continued for two more. * * * A director is engaged with the right to dismiss him after the first picture if we want to, and with the right on his part to seek other employment after the first picture if he wants to."

[2] In our opinion this evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the court that the defendant's first employment with the company was for the production of one picture only. Counsel for appellant has called our attention to other testimony in the case which is strongly in favor of the position of the appellant, and insists that this evidence shows that the defendant's employment was one continuous engagement from October 6, 1920, to March 30, 1921. But, conceding that this testimony is all that is claimed for it by the appellant, the best that can be said in favor of appellant is that there is a conflict in the evidence, and, according to the well-established rule applicable to appellate courts, the finding of the trial court must prevail when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence in support of such finding.

Plaintiff insists that the failure of the defendant to reply to the statement sent him by plaintiff on December 23, 1920, wherein the plaintiff claimed commission beyond the period covered by the time employed on the first picture, is a strong circumstance against defendant's contention that his engagement was only for the first picture. The evidence shows that the defendant made no written reply to this statement or the letter accompanying the same. It does show, however, that he made a verbal reply to the president of the plaintiff, but just what this verbal reply was does not appear from the record. It must be conceded that this circumstance is strongly in favor of the plaintiff, yet this evidence must be taken in connection with all of the other evidence in the case, and if the evidence taken as a whole shows there is a substantial conflict therein upon any particular issue, and this issue is found against the appellant, such finding must be sustained by the appellate court.

[3] Plaintiff further claims that, even if the defendant's original engagement was for the production of one picture only, and that he was subsequently employed to produce two other pictures, these subsequent engagements were as much due to the direct results of plaintiff's efforts in bringing the parties together in the first instance as was the first engagement, and therefore plaintiff was entitled to a commission on the salary received by defendant during the two subsequent engagements. In support of this contention the plaintiff has cited the recent case of Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 189 Pac. 117, which holds that a broker is entitled to a commission on sales when his efforts are the producing cause thereof, and when through his agency the purchaser is brought into communication with the seller, although the parties negotiated in person and without the presence of the broker.

In the case of Haun v. Rosenmayer the assignors of plaintiff were brokers, and on November 19 the defendant wrote them that he would be able to ship later all the cauliflower that the brokers could sell. The brokers immediately got into communication with Libby, McNeill & Libby, and as a result of the brokers' efforts the representative of Libby, McNeill & Libby called upon the defendant on November 22 and purchased 5 carloads of cauliflower. On the next day he purchased 30 carloads, and on the day following 50 carloads more. The defendant paid the brokers' commission on the first 5 carloads but refused to pay any commission whatever on the 80 carloads sold on the two following days. The lower court found that the efforts of the brokers were the producing cause of the sale of the 80 tons of cauliflower, and on appeal the appellate court held that this finding was supported by the evidence. In the case at bar the facts are entirely different from those in the case of Haun v. Rosenmayer. In addition to the evidence already referred to, it was shown that before the defendant had finished the first picture for the Metro Pictures Corporation he applied to the company for further employment and was informed by the manager that it would be necessary for certain officers of the company to see the first picture and approve it before they could consider employing defendant on a second picture. It further appears that after the first picture was finished it was reviewed by the officers of the company and approved by them and they then gave defendant further employment. This second employment was agreed to some six weeks after defendant was introduced to the officers of the company by plaintiff. From these facts the court found that the efforts of the plaintiff were not the producing cause of the subsequent employment of the defendant. We think this finding of the court is undoubtedly sustained by the evidence. While we readily assent to the rule laid down by the court in the case of Haun v. Rosenmayer—that is that the broker is entitled to his commission on sales when his efforts are the producing cause, even though the parties negotiated in person and without his presence—we find that the facts in the case before us, as found by the court, do not permit of the application of this rule.

Appellant finally contends that, if denied recovery upon the contract, yet it should have been given judgment for the full amount of its claim upon the count of quantum meruit set forth in the second cause of action of its complaint. In answer to this contention, it is sufficient to say that the complaint nowhere sounds in quantum meruit, nor was there any attempt at the trial to prove the reasonable value of the services rendered by plaintiff.

We find no error in the record, and are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

PEOPLE v. BOYD. (Cr. 1037, 2709.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1924. Rehearing Denied June 12, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 14, 1924.)

1. False pretenses 🔑5—Intent to defraud essential element.

Intent to defraud is essential element of crime of obtaining money by false pretenses.

2. False pretenses 🔑51—Accused's fraudulent intent is question of fact for jury.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, accused's fraudulent intent is question of fact for jury.

3. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Evidence held to warrant conviction.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses by misrepresenting land in obtaining a loan, evidence held to warrant conviction.

4. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Objections to exhibits first made on appeal not considered.

Objections to admission of exhibits made for first time on appeal cannot be considered.

5. Criminal law 🔑393(1), 1169(1)—Admission of accused's testimony at previous trial for same offense held not harmful and not compulsory self-incrimination.

Admission of accused's testimony at previous trial for same offense was not objectionable as compelling accused to testify against himself, and, where it contained no confession nor admission and should therefore probably have been excluded, its admission was no ground for reversal, since accused was not harmed thereby.

6. Criminal law 🔑548—Witnesses 🔑393(1)—Statements of witness at previous trial admissible merely to impeach witness, and do not create conflict.

Statements of witness made at previous trial of same case are admissible merely to impeach him, and do not even create conflict of evidence.

7. Criminal law 🔑1167(1)—Variance between proof and pleading as to one charge would not require reversal.

Variance between proof and pleading as to charge of false representations of value of land would not require reversal, where other false representations were charged, especially where the evidence, though not showing representation of value alleged, showed gross overvaluation.

8. Criminal law 🔑438—Photographs of portions of land held admissible in prosecution for obtaining money by falsely representing value.

In prosecution for obtaining loan by false pretenses as to value of land, photographs of portions of land were admissible.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

9. Criminal law 🔑406(4)—Accused's offer in open court to plead guilty held admissible.

Accused's offer in open court prior to trial to plead guilty to one charge if granted continuance was admissible; its weight and sufficiency being for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Howard L. Boyd was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harold Ide Cruzan, of Los Angeles (E. H. Richards, of Pomona, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses. He was specifically charged with having falsely represented to one Julia C. Cother that he owned 320 acres of fertile land in the state of Nevada, containing numerous artesian wells, with an abundant supply of water; that the value of said property was $7,000, and that his title was good and valid. The information then charges that none of such representations was true, but that the said Julia C. Cother believed them to be true, and was thereby induced to deliver to the defendant the sum of $1,500.

The grounds of this appeal are: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the verdicts; (2) that certain evidence was improperly admitted; and (3) variance between the allegations of the information and the proof.

[1-3] In connection with the first proposition appellant asserts that there was no evidence to show an intent to defraud. To establish the offense charged in the information such an intent must be proved, for it is an essential element thereof. However, this is a fact which from its nature must usually be established inferentially. The question of intent is one of fact to be determined by the jury; they have reached the conclusion which the verdict indicates, that Boyd made the representations alleged in the information, that they were false, and that he knew them to be false; it was entirely competent for the jury to draw the inference that the false representations were made with intent to defraud. Although defendant's own testimony, and that of other witnesses supporting it, was to the effect that he did not know that the statements made by him were false, the jury acted within its province in rejecting such evidence, since that to the contrary was ample. This was to the effect that, when appellant solicited the loan of $1,500 from the Cothers, he stated that he had a "clear deed" to 320 acres of land in Nevada, which stood him $7,000, and that there was not a dollar against it; that he was going to plant it to canteloupes, and needed the money for seed and implements; that there were artesian wells on the land, and that by plowing furrows he could lead water for irrigation from wells located on the upper part of the land; that his property was level or rolling, productive soil, and was located about 3 miles from a railroad station.

Witnesses thoroughly familiar with the land, and some of them having resided nearby for 20 years, testified that it was not level, or rolling, but was hilly, rough, rocky, and unfit for cultivation; that it was of a broken gypsite formation in which nothing could be made to grow, and that it was absolutely worthless; that there was no water on the property, but that the nearest water was a mile and a half distant therefrom, and 150 feet below it, rendering gravity flow impossible; that there were no artesian wells nearer than 50 miles, at Las Vegas, and that the railroad ran past it at a distance of nine miles. It was admitted, and shown by documentary evidence, that appellant's only interest in the land was a half interest in a contract to purchase from the state of Nevada at $1.25 per acre, but 25 cents of which had been paid by Rush, defendant's grantor, and that they had 50 years within which to pay the balance. It further appears that, long after having made such representations, appellant wrote Williams, a Nevada surveyor, that he had represented the property to be worth $5,000, and inquiring whether or not wells could be dug on the land for irrigation, and if gravity flow could be used on any portion of the tract.

In view of this proof it cannot be said that the jury were not warranted in concluding that Boyd made the representations to the Cothers as charged in the information, and that such statements were untrue, and known to him to be untrue; or, if not known by him to be untrue, made in a reckless disregard of their truth in an effort to secure the loan which he sought.

[4] It is objected that Exhibits 12, 13, and 14 were erroneously admitted in evidence. However, it appears that no objection was interposed to their admission, and hence appellant cannot be heard to make complaint for the first time on appeal.

[5] Next, appellant asserts that it was error for the trial court to permit the district attorney to read the testimony which the defendant voluntarily gave at a former trial on the same charge. This was done as a part of the people's case in chief. This procedure is not subject to the objection made that the defendant was thereby compelled to testify against himself. People v. Barrios (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 58. As was said in People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 460, 150 Pac. 389, where a similar situation was presented, it does not appear that the ruling complained of worked any injury to the accused. The testimony of the defendant given upon the first trial contains no confession of guilt or admission tending to establish guilt. The introduction of the testimony to which objection is so strenuously made would seem to have served no useful purpose, and should therefore probably not have been admitted; yet, since it cannot be said to have been harmful to the rights of the defendant, it will not be a ground for reversal.

[6] In appellant's opening brief he states that "at the time of the trial numerous witnesses were produced on behalf of the people, testifying that the land was not level, was worthless, and could not be farmed or used for agricultural purposes, and that there was no water upon the land." After having made this frank concession, a considerable part of appellant's briefs is devoted to argument concerning the weight of evidence upon these issues, and others, which can ordinarily receive no consideration by an appellate court. It is pointed out that the complaining witness and her husband, Robert H. Cother, testified on the trial that they would not have paid their money to Boyd except in reliance upon his statements as to the various matters charged in the information; it is said that on the first trial these witnesses testified contrary to this evidence. It is apparent that the record thus discloses no issue which can be given consideration upon appeal. The statements made by the witness upon the first trial, introduced in evidence at the second trial upon cross-examination, are merely for impeachment, do not even create a conflict of evidence, but could only be considered by the jury as tending to impeach the testimony given by the witnesses at the subsequent trial.

[7] The argument that there was a material variance between the pleading and the proof in regard to the representation that the property was worth $7,000 is without merit. The defendant on cross-examination testified that he told the complaining witness that the land in question was "conservatively worth $5,000." This testimony, if believed, was sufficient to justify the conclusion that the defendant grossly misrepresented the value of the property, since the testimony of the people's witnesses was to the effect that the property was entirely worthless for agricultural purposes, and practically so for any purpose. Besides, there were allegations of other representations charged to have been false, and a variance between the proof and the pleading as to one would not require a reversal.

[8] Certain photographs purporting to be likenesses of a portion of the land claimed to have been owned by Boyd were admitted in evidence, and it is argued that the trial court committed error in overruling the objections made to them. At the time they were received a proper foundation had not been laid for the admission of these exhibits. However, this was probably supplied later, but the question of lack of foundation is not presented, since during the trial appellant made no objection upon that ground. The only objection offered was that the evidence would be irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and that a photograph could not possibly picture more than a small portion of the entire tract of 320 acres. These objections were without merit.

The most serious question presented is that resulting from the overruling by the trial court of an objection to the admission in evidence of an offer upon the part of the defendant to plead guilty to one offense charged in the information. Prior to the trial Boyd stated in open court that he would, if granted a continuance of the case until June 1, plead guilty to obtaining money under false pretenses. It appears that the trial of the case had been set for April 27, 1923. The evidence to which objection is made consists of the record of proceedings at that time introduced upon the trial over defendant's objection. This record reads in part as follows:

"The Court: Now, People against Boyd.

"Mr. Lincoln: In that Boyd case, your honor, appearing for defendant, I will say there have been several continuances, and we are in the position now so that, if your honor and the district's attorney's office would consent to a continuance at this time until, say, the 1st of June, the plea which has been heretofore interposed will be withdrawn and another different plea will be made.

"The Court: Is that correct, Mr. Boyd?

"The Defendant: It is.

"Mr. Costello: By that other plea, you mean a plea of guilty?

"Mr. Lincoln: Yes, sir.

"Mr. Costello: Mr. Boyd, is that your intention, at that time, to plead guilty to one of these offenses charged in this information?

"The Defendant: Yes.

"Mr. Costello: To wit, obtaining money under false pretenses?

"The Defendant: Yes.

"Mr. Costello: You will at that time plead guilty to obtaining money under false pretenses?

"The Defendant: Yes, sir."

If this evidence was admissible, it must have been the theory that the statements made by the defendant's counsel within the hearing of the accused, and apparently with his authority, constituted a confession of guilt. An offer to plead guilty under similar circumstances was treated as a confession in the case of Commonwealth v. Callahan, 108 Mass. 421. The objection urged by the defendant to this testimony is that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, and he cites People v. Ryan, 82 Cal. 617, 23 Pac. 121, and Dean v. State, 72 Tex. Cr. R. 274, 161 S. W. 974. The Texas case is directly in point, the court there saying:

> "While it is true, if an agreement had been entered into it ought to have been lived up to, yet if the appellant did not desire to enter a plea of guilty, as her counsel agreed she would do, it was her right not to do so, and let the state prove her guilt if it could do so, and the court correctly held that this agreement of counsel was not admissible in evidence."

In People v. Ryan, a plea of guilty had been entered, but subsequently was withdrawn, and our Supreme Court said:

> "We cannot agree that, upon principle, where a plea is withdrawn, and another legally substituted therefor, the one withdrawn can be introduced in evidence to nullify any defense under the last plea, which would be the practical result in this case of such a doctrine."

It also appears from the testimony that during the time when the motion for said continuance was being presented to the court a recess was taken, and the defendant and his counsel left the room; the district attorney followed them into the hallway, and said to defendant's counsel, in the presence and hearing of defendant, that the case would be transferred into another court, adding:

> "You know what that means. You talk over with your client and see what he is going to do, and if he pleads guilty to the charge of taking money under false pretenses we will dismiss the charge of grand larceny, and I will recommend probation."

That the district attorney left them, and soon returned, saying:

> "Hurry up—hurry up—hurry up, Monroe's clerk is in there now, and they want to know whether you are going to take your case into his court."

The defendant testified that he knew that if the case were transferred to the other court he would not be permitted to file an application for probation in the event of being convicted. He further testified:

> "I tossed up a nickel, and I said, 'If it comes heads, I will go in and stand trial, but if it comes tails, I will go over.' Luckily it came heads, and I said, 'I will go in and plead guilty under these conditions and take my chances.' I said, 'It is just simply a case of making the best of a bad proposition.'"

The statement of the district attorney clearly implied that it would be dangerous to the defendant to permit the case to be transferred, but that, if the plea of guilty were promised and entered, such steps would receive a reward; but, waiving the question of the voluntary character of the offer to plead guilty, it must be regarded as constituting only a hypothetical admission which, as explained in Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529, is not admissible in evidence. Defendant was, in fact, offering to plead guilty upon condition that the matter would not be transferred out of that court. The defendant did not thereby admit any distinct fact. He said in effect that for the limited purpose of avoiding the transfer of his case to be passed upon by a certain other judge he would enter a plea of guilty to one of the charges contained in the information; it being understood further that the other charge should be dismissed, without regard to its merits. The accused did not admit his guilt. He merely agreed that under certain conditions he would make an admission of guilt. There is no reason why the same rule which excludes hypothetical admissions of this character in negotiations for settlement of a civil suit from being received in evidence should not apply equally to a criminal proceeding. We conclude that the overruling of appellant's objection to this evidence was error. However, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution provides:

> "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

From a careful reading of the entire transcript, including the evidence, in the instant case, we are convinced that under the constitutional provision above quoted a reversal should not be granted. The conclusion is inevitable that appellant misrepresented the condition of his interest in the property, as well as the character of the land which he pretended to own; and that he did so knowingly and with intent to defraud. Some of these misrepresentations are charged in the information, although not all were included in it. For instance, it is charged that the defendant represented that the land in question was "fertile," whereas the testimony was overwhelming to the effect that it was stony and practically worthless. Three witnesses testified that he said the artesian wells were upon the land, while it was shown without contradiction that no wells existed thereon; it was further testified that he said he had a good and valid title to the land, whereas he had no more than a half interest in a contingent right to purchase from the state within 50 years. While it may be that the statement admitted by the defendant to have been made to the complaining witness that the land had "stood him" $5,000 is not an admission of the alleged representation that it was worth that amount, still without doubt it was intended that the Cothers should be led to believe that the value of the property was sufficient to be ample security for the loan that was sought, and in determining whether or not a miscarriage of justice may have resulted from any error appearing in the record it is worthy of consideration that the defendant knowingly made the representation, which was of course utterly false, that the land stood him $5,000. There are other matters of a similar character which are delineated in another part of this opinion. We have considered other points argued by appellant, but find no error justifying a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition to have this cause heard in the Supreme Court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, is denied.

[9] We deem it proper, however, to say that we disagree with that portion of the opinion which holds that it was error for the trial court to overrule the objection of the defendant to the admission in evidence of the offer on his part to plead guilty to one offense charged in the information. The action of the defendant in that regard was an admission on his part of the truth of the charge that he obtained money under false pretenses, which, with the other evidence, was properly left to the consideration of the jury. People v. Jacobs, 165 App. Div. 721, 151 N. Y. Supp. 522. Such an admission was not, of course, conclusive evidence against the defendant. It was competent evidence merely; its weight and sufficiency being proper subjects for consideration by the jury. State v. Bringgold, 40 Wash. 12, 17, 82 Pac. 132. When the fact was established that the admission had been made by the accused, the admission was not before the jury as testimony by him establishing the truth of all or any part of the allegations of the information, but the fact that he had made it was before them, and was relevant as being inconsistent with his claim to the jury that he did not obtain any money under false pretenses from the complaining witnesses, and was not guilty. State v. Carta, 90 Conn. 79, 96 Atl. 411. The defendant's own admission, voluntarily made, was clearly competent evidence against him. That he made the admission in court can detract nothing from its relevancy or its competency. Ehrlick v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 742, 102 S. W. 289, 128 Am. St. Rep. 269; People v. Gould, 70 Mich. 240, 38 N. W. 232, 14 Am. St. Rep. 493.

The opinion of this court in People v. Ryan, 82 Cal. 617, 23 Pac. 121, in which it was held to be error to introduce in evidence a plea of guilty after it had been withdrawn by permission of the court and a plea of not guilty substituted, seems to be out of harmony with what we believe to be the correct and the better rule. It should be noted, however, that the court was there dealing with a case in which there could have been no conviction without the plea of guilty being considered as a "confession," and the conviction was accordingly reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 26, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 21, 1924.)

1. Drains 🔑54—No formal action necessary to make agreement for dredging of ditches.

Where trustees of reclamation district formally declared intention of having ditches dredged, formal action concerning agreement by one of trustees with one who subsequently dredged the ditches was unnecessary, a contract to pay for services being implied in absence of any formal agreement, in view of Pol. Code, § 3454, subds. 3, 9.

2. Contracts 🔑168—Include what is necessarily implied from language.

A contract includes not only what is expressly stated, but also what is necessarily to be implied from language used.

3. Drains 🔑54—Dredging being left entirely to contractor, he was authorized to do work reasonably necessary under circumstances.

Where it was left entirely to dredging contractor to dredge canals in reclamation district, whatever was reasonably necessary under circumstances to be done, in order to perform services, was included, such as deepening of canal so that dredging machine could be moved through; Civ. Code, §§ 2309, 2310, and section 1624, subd. 4, being inapplicable.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑84—Contract for dredging held not to come under statute, though value of service more than $200.

A contract for dredging services for reclamation district did not come under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4, though value of services was more than $200.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by W. W. Hutchinson against Reclamation District No. 1619 and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Albert Picard and E. A. Bridgford, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. F. Bray, of Martinez, Matthew Ward, of Antioch, and J. E. Rodgers, of Martinez, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. In this action plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for the sum of $2,116 for and on account of certain dredger work done and performed by the plaintiff for the defendant district, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

The action is upon two counts: One upon an express contract; the other upon quantum meruit. The trustees of the district were included as defendants, but their motion for a nonsuit was sustained by the trial court and the cause of action as against them dismissed. On the 26th day of November, 1919, at a meeting of the trustees of the defendant district, the following motion was adopted, to wit:

> "Upon motion duly made and unanimously carried, it was ordered that the drainage canal running across the district should be cleaned, beginning on Sand Mound Slough and extending down to at least the bridge across said canal on the Hotchkiss land."

This motion appears to be the only record made by the board of trustees of said district in relation to the contemplated work. It appears from the transcript that prior to this date and on or about the 21st day of November, 1919, William T. Sesnon, one of the trustees of the district, had written a letter to the plaintiff which letter is substantially as follows:

> "At a meeting a day or so ago with Mr. Hotchkiss, it was decided to proceed at once with the work of cleaning out the main drainage canal, and particularly the one running through my ranch, and which I endeavored to have cleaned last spring."

After receipt of this letter by the plaintiff, the plaintiff and the said Sesnon had a conversation over the phone as to the costs and expenses of performing the work. This conversation appears to have been had prior to the adoption of the motion wherein it was resolved to proceed with the work in question. The terms agreed upon for doing the work, in the conversation referred to, were the sum of $3 per hour and certain incidental expenses for taking the dredger, belonging to the plaintiff, to the canal upon which the work was to be performed. The plaintiff on or about December 19, 1919, towed the ditcher or dredger, owned by him, to the place where the work was to be performed, took it over the levee, around the lands of the district and on the 23d day of December, 1919, began the work of deepening and cleaning the canal in question. It further appears that at the time of the beginning of the work and for a considerable period thereafter there was not sufficient water in the canal to float the dredger. In order to perform the work of cleaning and moving the dredger forward, the captain of the dredger increased the depth of the canal by about five feet in the center and four feet on the sides. Work was continued from the 23d day of December, 1919, to the 8th day of January, 1920, when, on account of necessary repairs being required to the machinery of the dredger, work was suspended until about the 15th day of March, 1920, when it was again resumed. It does not appear that any of the trustees of the district were within the district during the progress of the work. It further appears from the transcript that, within a few days after the 15th of March, a son of one of the trustees of the district visited the scene of operations and notified the captain of the dredger that he was not doing the work rightly; that all they wanted was the cleaning of the ditch and not any deepening; that the deepening could be obviated by bringing water into the canal through a siphon. The captain claimed that he had no authority to turn water into the canal. Through an arrangement made by the said Mr. Hotchkiss, water was turned into the canal through a siphon which appears to have been previously installed and used by the district for such purposes when desired, and after so doing the deepening of the ditch by the dredger was discontinued and much more rapid progress was made. After the 8th day of January, when work was discontinued, and before the resumption of work on March 16th, trustee Sesnon left the state and did not return until after all the work had ceased. Prior to the leaving of trustee Sesnon, as above stated, a bill for the December work performed by the plaintiff for the district was presented for payment, the receipt of which was acknowledged by trustees Sesnon in a letter dated January 6, 1920, and is as follows:

"Mr. W. W. Hutchinson, P. O. Box 173, Antioch, California. Dear sir: I am just in receipt of your bill against the Sand Mound Reclamation District and have forwarded same to Judge Bridgford, the secretary. I will endeavor to get in touch with the judge in the next day or two so that he can call a meeting and order payment of the bill. Please accept the assurance of my appreciation of your courtesy in doing this work so promptly."

Whether any meeting was called, as contemplated, does not appear. No payment, however, was made of the bill in question at that time. All work was finally ended and the dredger moved out of the district on or about the last of April, 1920. Thereafter, the plaintiff, having filed each month during the continuance of the work separate bills or statements of the work as it progressed, filed a general claim for the total amount of work, and during the month of May, 1920, the board of trustees issued to the plaintiff on account of said work two warrants, one in the sum of $400 and the other in the sum of $1,500. No further payments having been made, this suit was instituted to recover the balance alleged to be due. It does not appear from the transcript that any conditions were attached to the two warrants issued, as above stated; that is, whether at the time of the issuing of said warrants the trustees claimed that that was the total amount due and was made in full settlement. In other words, the testimony simply shows the issuance of the two warrants on account of said work and nothing more. The transcript further shows that trustee Sesnon had a conference with W. J. Hotchkiss, a trustee of the district, relative to the doing of the work and the terms submitted by the plaintiff; that it was tacitly agreed that Sesnon should proceed to have the work done; that trustee Bridgford was ill at the time; that no conversation was had with him; and that he took no action further than the resolution passed by the board of trustees indicates. That the bills for work were forwarded to him is stated by the letter written by trustee Sesnon. Knowledge that the work was being done in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the board was thus brought home to all of the trustees shortly after it was begun (if not previously to all of them). Upon this statement of the facts it is contended by the appellant that the district is not liable for any sum whatever, although one of the trustees and counsel for the district, during the course of the trial, appears to have made the statement that the district was liable for the reasonable value of the work done. The bone of contention is really the extra cost of digging out the canal by the dredger in order to permit its progress in cleaning the canal instead of turning water into the canal through a siphon, hereinbefore referred to, and obtaining flotation of the ditcher by that method. The defendant in its answer, after denying the cause of action of any contract, etc., states its defense as follows:

> "Deny that the ditching work done upon said lands of reclamation district No. 1619, or the use of said ditcher, or said work and the use of said ditcher, was or is of the value of $4,322.00, or of the value of any greater sum than $1,900.00; and allege that said value, to wit, the sum of $1,900.00, has been fully paid before the filing of the complaint of plaintiff herein."

The court found the value of the work as alleged by the plaintiff and gave judgment for the amount thereof. The court also found that the work was done at the special instance and request of the reclamation district and for its use and benefit. Is the defendant district liable for the value of the work upon the facts stated? Subdivision 9, section 3454, Political Code, authorizes the board of trustees of the reclamation district—

> "to employ such labor and to purchase and operate or hire such tools, machinery, material and equipment and to make and enter into such contracts and agreements as they shall deem necessary in order to accomplish the proper construction, maintenance, repair or operation of the works of reclamation of the said district."

[1] Subdivision 3 of the same section specifies that the board of trustees shall elect a secretary whose duty it shall be to have charge of the office of the board of trustees, to keep its minutes, attest all documents requiring the signature of the president, keep true and accurate accounts of all expenditures made in behalf of the district and that all accounts and contracts that may be made by said board of trustees shall be open to the inspection of the board of supervisors and every person interested. There does not seem to be anything in the statute requiring any formal action by the board of trustees in entering into a contract or making an agreement with any one relative to the hiring of machinery or the performance of work for the uses and benefits of the district. The board in this instance appears to have formally declared its intention of having the work done, but no formal action concerning the agreement with the plaintiff was taken or had. The work to be done was one of maintenance. No plans were necessary and there is no prescribed form in the statute to be followed by the trustees in having the work done. Nor is there anything in the statute requiring the recording or entering upon the minutes of the district the agreement or hiring of the plaintiff to do the work in question. Thus the rule found in section 491, 14 Corpus Juris, 376, would seem to apply:

> "Charter or statutory provisions as to recording the acts of a corporation or its officers must be complied with; but in the absence of any such requirement it is not necessary that the by-laws, resolutions, contracts, or other acts of a corporation or its officers shall appear on the records of the corporation or be evidenced by any writing at all, if it would not be necessary in the case of an individual, and if no record is kept, or if the particular matters do not appear on the record, they may be proved by parol evidence."

It further appears in the transcript in this case that the practice in the district in relation to work of the kind here involved has been, after the work was authorized to be done in the district, to delegate to some one of the trustees authority to have the work done, but that this was the first time that Mr. Sesnon had undertaken to negotiate for such services. That there was no formal contract in this case the facts, of course, establish; but, in the absence of any particular provision of the law requiring formal steps or proceedings, such action does not appear necessary. If the authority exists to do the work, to enter into the agreement or to make the employment, a contract will be implied to pay for the services, or, in other words, the reasonable value thereof. In the case of Buck v. City of Eureka, 124 Cal. 61, 56 Pac. 612, a case involving the employment of an attorney, the court disposes of the contention that formal action is necessary as follows:

> "Nor is it necessary, as is contended by appellant, that the knowledge or assent of the council be evidenced by some formal corporate act, as by ordinance. Implied contracts, within the scope of the powers of the council, may be deduced by inference from authorized corporate acts, without either a vote, or deed, or writing."

And further:

> "It was recently held by this court, in a case where the facts as to the knowledge of the board and its assent to the employment of the attorney were not unlike the facts here, that no resolution of the board authorizing the services was necessary. Power v. May, 123 Cal. 147."

The language of the court in Power v. May, supra, on this subject is as follows:

> "It is true that there was no previous formal resolution of the board authorizing plaintiff to perform the service; there was an understanding to that effect, which for some unexplained reason was not entered upon the minutes of the board. While in all matters of such importance we think the board should act formally by resolution spread upon the minutes, still, as they had the power to act and the services were performed, and the board did in fact subsequently approve the bill for the services and order it paid, we know of no reason why the subsequent ratification and order of payment should not be treated as equivalent to previous authority regularly given."

In the case at bar the board of trustees of the district ordered issued to the plaintiff two warrants in partial payment for the services rendered and to this extent ratified the agreement made by trustee Sesnon with the plaintiff.

In Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 Pac. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260, the distinction is clearly pointed out between contracts requiring formal procedure and cases where action may be maintained upon an implied contract for the value of the services performed. It is there stated:

> "Where the statute prescribes the only mode by which the power to contract shall be exercised the mode is the measure of the power. A contract made otherwise than as so prescribed is not binding or obligatory as a contract and the doctrine of implied liability has no application."

Again, in the case of Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 Pac. 189, it was held that:

> "Where the city * * * received and retained the benefit of a water supply, although there was no previous express contract as to the price, the city is liable in assumpsit for its reasonable value, and is estopped to deny the validity of the claim, on the ground that it had not passed a lawful ordinance therefor."

In this case a number of other cases are cited showing the circumstances under which corporations will be liable for the value of the services performed, even though no formal contract of employment has been entered into. The decisions to which we have referred and the cases in those decisions establish the principle that, where the statute requires no formal proceeding, a corporation will be held liable as upon an implied contract for services performed when the same rule would be applied to individuals, and that corporations cannot obtain and receive and retain the benefit of services without paying the reasonable value therefor, unless there is some prohibitive rule of law which renders the agreement invalid in its inception. In other words, if there is nothing requiring technical formalities, the absence of technical procedure will not, in and of itself, exempt it from liability. This does not in any wise conflict with the rule that a corporation must act by and through its board of trustees. If the circumstances are such as to lead to the conclusion that it has acted through its board of trustees, then, and in that case, we find nothing in the law which prevents a corporation such as the one under consideration from being held upon an implied contract for services performed for its use and benefit. In stating this we are not overlooking the language of the court in the case of Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 108, 81 Am. Dec. 105, where it is said:

> "The mere retention and use of the benefit resulting from the work, where no such power or freedom of election exists, or where the election cannot influence the conduct of the other party with reference to the work performed, does not constitute such evidence of acceptance that the law will imply therefrom a promise of payment."

[2] The language just quoted must be read in view of the circumstances and facts being considered and the illustration given of services performed where there have been no negotiations therefor of any kind whatsoever. It must also be borne in mind that the trustees of the district, defendants herein, had knowledge of the progress of the work, of the bills being presented, but did not take it upon themselves to go upon the premises and ascertain just how the work was being performed or whether it was being performed to the best advantage of the district or in the most expeditious manner. All these matters were left to the judgment of the contractor or the captain in charge of the dredger:

> "A contract includes not only what is expressly stated but also what is necessarily to be implied from the language used." 13 C. J. 558.

[3, 4] Under this rule, it being left entirely to the contractor to do the work and no directions being given by the trustees, it would appear that whatever was reasonably necessary under the circumstances to be done in order to perform the services would be included. There was no authority given the plaintiff or his captain to turn water into the canal. The captain, in his testimony, stated that that was a hazard to the district which he did not feel like placing upon the shoulders of his employer. This is not his language, but is the substance and meaning thereof. Upon this question, the court having found the reasonable value of the work to be as alleged, we think the defendant is bound. The appellant raises the further objection that there can be no implied contract herein by reason of the provisions of sections 2309 and 2310 of the Civil Code, in that the authorization in the first place must have been in writing and the ratification thereof could only be had by an instrument in writing. This is based upon the further contention that, under subdivision 4 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, the value of the services being more than $200, the agreement must be in writing. This contention is untenable. A contract for services or employment does not come under this section. Wilson v. Morton, 85 Cal. 598, 24 Pac. 784; Ryan v. Walker, 35 Cal. App. 116, 169 Pac. 417; and Flynn v. Dougherty, 91 Cal. 669, 27 Pac. 1080. In view of what we have said, we think the language of this court in Commercial S. Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 Pac. 964, applicable.

"It would be deemed a hard rule * * * if the courts could not * * * hold that a corporation is bound by a contract made under such circumstances as characterized the making of the contract in the present case. But the books are replete with cases holding that where it appears that a corporation is but the instrumentality through which an individual for convenience transacts a particular kind of business, 'not only equity, looking through form to substance, but the law itself, would hold such a corporation bound.'"

And further:

"And where authority to do some particular act, which is included in the ordinary affairs of such a corporation, is not specifically given to any particuler officer, and the performance of which is not specifically inhibited to the person authorized to manage its affairs generally, the intention of the board of directors to confer upon the person or officer in whom is vested the immediate direction or control or management of the affairs of such corporation authority to perform such particular act will be inferred from the general authority so given."

In the instant case there is nothing which takes the defendant from under the general rule as to implied contracts or the general rule relating to informal contracts, where the services had been rendered and the benefits received with knowledge thereof or the means of receiving knowledge thereof, that an implied contract should be inferred and the right to maintain an action for the reasonable value of the services should be upheld.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

194 Cal. 49

Ex parte WOOD. (Cr. 2658.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1924.)

1. Injunction 🔑103—Criminal acts endangering property rights will be enjoined.

Although generally acts merely criminal will not be enjoined where no property rights are endangered, the fact that acts are criminal will not prevent their being enjoined, where property rights are endangered.

2. Injunction 🔑103—Can be used to protect property rights of many citizens.

Where property rights of many citizens are involved, it is proper for the government on their behalf to enjoin injury to such rights by criminal acts.

3. Injunction 🔑103—Injunction against acts forbidden by Criminal Syndicalism Act held not to supersede the act.

An injunction to prevent acts forbidden by the Criminal Syndicalism Act is not error as superseding the act, since it rather supplements it.

4. Injunction 🔑103—Acts creating nuisance and assailing property rights may be enjoined, although they are crimes.

Acts violative of public policy, creating a nuisance or assailing rights of property, although specific crimes, and punishable as such, may be enjoined.

5. Injunction 🔑103—Enjoining teaching, advocating, etc., criminal syndicalism held proper.

Where a person procured new members for the Industrial Workers of the World, whose purpose was the overthrow of organized government by sabotage, arson, and other crimes of violence, his mere arrest and punishment under the Criminal Syndicalism Act will not afford adequate protection to property, and enjoining his violation of such act was proper.

6. Habeas corpus 🔑92(3)—Indefiniteness of complaint for injunction not open to inquiry in habeas corpus proceedings by one imprisoned for violation of injunction.

In habeas corpus proceedings by one imprisoned for contempt of court through violation of an injunction against activities denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism Act, the indefiniteness of the complaint for the injunction is not open to consideration.

7. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Criminal Syndicalism Act held valid.

The Criminal Syndicalism Act is constitutional and valid.

8. Injunction 🔑219—Erroneous injunction must be obeyed until reversed.

An erroneous injunction must be obeyed by the parties thereto until reversed, even though the error be in the assumption of the validity of the law going to the merits of the case.

9. Constitutional law 🔑70(1)—Injunction against acts forbidden by Criminal Syndicalism Act held not an interference with Legislature.

An injunction against acts forbidden by the Criminal Syndicalism Act did not constitute an invasion of the province of the Legislature, since it made no new law, nor did it supersede, repeal, or modify any existing law, but only aided in the better enforcement of the law already enacted.

10. Injunction 🔑103—Publication threatening irreparable injury to property rights will be enjoined.

Although a publication cannot be enjoined solely because of its libelous character, where it threatens irreparable injury to property rights and other grounds of equitable jurisdiction exist, it will be enjoined, regardless of its character as libelous or otherwise.

11. Contempt 🔑54(4)—Affidavits on which citation for constructive contempt is issued constitute complaint.

In a proceeding involving constructive contempt, affidavits upon which the citation is issued constitute the complaint, and, unless they contain a statement of facts showing a contempt, the court is without jurisdiction.

12. Injunction 🔑230(2)—Affidavits charging contempt in organization of criminal syndicalism society held sufficient.

In a proceeding for contempt for disobedience of an injunction against acts forbidden by the Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, denouncing organizing any society to promote criminal syndicalism or sabotage, affidavits charging that one had been active in obtaining persons to become members of such an organization were equivalent to charging that he assisted in organizing, extending, and increasing it.

13. Habeas corpus 🔑92(3)—Sufficiency of facts charged to constitute an offense not examined on writ of habeas corpus after conviction.

In a proceeding for habeas corpus after conviction, if the indictment or information purports and attempts to state an offense of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, whether the facts charged were sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into, although, if the pleading totally failed to charge an offense known to the law, the petitioner would be discharged.

14. Habeas corpus 🔑4—Cannot be made to serve purpose of writ of error or an appeal.

A writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the purpose of a writ of error or an appeal.

15. Injunction 🔑230(2)—Averment of knowledge of existence of injunction held sufficient.

Affidavits charging contempt for violation of an injunction against acts forbidden by the Criminal Syndicalism Act, averring that the accused was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, and that acts by him in organizing a criminal syndicalism society were done with knowledge of the issuance and existence of the injunction, sufficiently alleged knowledge of the injunction.

16. Injunction 🔑230(3)—Failure of accused to deny charges admits truth thereof.

Where one accused of contempt in violating an injunction against acts forbidden by the Criminal Syndicalism Act failed to deny truth of the charges on the hearing, he admitted the truth thereof.

In Bank.

In the matter of the application of R. Wood for writ of habeas corpus. On application of R. Wood for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the sheriff of Sacramento county. Petitioner remanded.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, and L. B. Schlingheyde, of Modesto, for petitioner.

J. M. Friedlander, City Prosecutor, of Los Angeles, W. V. Cowan, of Sacramento, and U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. The petitioner is in the custody of the sheriff of the county of Sacramento by virtue of an order made by the superior court of that county adjudging him in contempt of court, imposing a fine, and providing, in default of payment, for imprisonment at the rate of one day for each $2 of the fine. The conduct which was charged as a contempt was the alleged violation of an injunction pendente lite issued out of that court in an action wherein the state of California, on the relation of the Attorney General, was plaintiff and the Industrial Workers of the World et al. were defendants. The injunction commanded the defendants, and each of them, their servants, agents, solicitors, attorneys, and all others acting in their aid or assistance, to "desist and refrain from further conspiring with each other to carry out, and from carrying out, or attempting to carry out, their conspiracy to injure, destroy, and damage property in the state of California, and to take over and assume possession of the industries and properties in said state as well as the government thereof; and from knowingly circulating, selling, distributing, and displaying books, pamphlets, papers, or other written or printed matter advocating, teaching, or suggesting criminal syndicalism, sabotage, or the destruction of property for the purpose of taking over the industries and properties of all employers, or otherwise, and from advocating, by word of mouth or writing, the necessity, propriety, and expediency of criminal syndicalism or sabotage, direct action, willful damage or injury to physical property, and bodily injury to person or persons, and justifying or attempting to justify criminal syndicalism, the commission or attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism with the intent to approve, advocate, or further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism, as said terms 'criminal syndicalism' and 'sabotage' are defined in chapter 188 of the Statutes and Amendments to the Code of the state of California, for 1919, and from organizing or aiding or assisting to organize or extend or increase any society, assemblage, or association of persons which teaches, advocates, aids, and abets criminal syndicalism or the duty, necessity, or propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, or any unlawful method of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change, and from doing any acts to carry out the doctrines, theories, and acts of criminal syndicalism, and from in any manner whatsoever conspiring or confederating together for the carrying out of said purposes, or either thereof. * * *" The petitioner was arrested, charged with being a member and delegate of the Industrial Workers of the World, was served with a citation to show cause upon affidavits charging him with having knowingly violated the injunction and order of the court, and appeared in response to the citation upon the return day thereof, when a hearing was had thereon. He was found guilty of the acts charged in the affidavits, adjudged in contempt of court, and in default of the payment of the fine imposed was committed to the custody of the sheriff. It is petitioner's contention that his imprisonment is illegal upon the grounds, first, that the injunction is invalid and that petitioner, therefore, cannot be held for disobedience thereof, and, secondly, that the affidavits upon which the citation was issued are insufficient.

[1] In support of petitioner's contention that the injunction herein is void he asserts that a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction and cannot enjoin the commission of a crime; that the issuance of the injunction herein was an infringement of the province of the Legislature, and that a court of equity will not and cannot enjoin a publication.

It is to be noted that the acts forbidden by the terms of the injunction here in question are, substantially speaking, the precise acts which are denounced as crimes by the provisions of the Criminal Syndicalism Act (Stats. 1919, c. 188). Petitioner's contention in this behalf, speaking broadly, is that jurisdiction in equity is and has always been limited strictly to the civil side of jurisprudence; that this jurisdiction exists and may be invoked solely for the protection of private property rights; that the enforcement of criminal statutes is and has alway been beyond the scope of equity jurisdiction; that the sole purpose and effect of the injunction here in question is to take away from one charged with the commission of these particular crimes his constitutional right to a trial by jury; and that the injunction is therefore void as being wholly in excess of the jurisdiction of the court which issued it.

[2] It is doubtless true that jurisdiction in equity is primarily concerned with the protection of civil property rights in those cases wherein the law has failed to provide an adequate remedy. But it is not and never has been strictly limited to this field. As far back as the reign of Henry 1 it was recognized that the select council (predecessors of the chancellor) would act "on all applications to obtain redress for injuries and acts of oppression wherever from the heinousness of the offense or the rank and power of the offender, or any other cause, it was probable that a fair trial in the ordinary courts would be impeded, and also wherever by force and violence the regular administration of justice was hindered." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) pp. 35, 36. The power and jurisdiction of equity to enjoin the maintenance of a public nuisance have always been recognized, even where the same was abatable by indictment or information, and where the maintenance thereof constituted a statutory crime. It is true, as a general rule, that an injunction will not be granted to restrain an act merely criminal, where no property rights are endangered thereby, but, where property rights are endangered, the fact that the acts are criminal will not prevent a court of equity from exercising its jurisdiction. Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70–73, 103 Pac. 324. It is not in all cases essential that the property rights so endangered be private property rights of the party plaintiff.

> "As a public nuisance concerns the public generally, it is the duty of the government to take measures to abate or enjoin it. Hence it follows that the government can obtain an injunction to restrain a public nuisance without showing any property right in itself. The duty of protecting the property rights of all its citizens is sufficient to warrant issuing the injunction." 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) p. 4296.

See, also, People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 397, 402, 48 Pac. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183; Weis v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 730, 159 Pac. 464. We think that the correct rule is well stated by Professor Pomeroy in the following passage from section 1894:

> "While the right of the government to obtain an injunction to restrain criminal acts is not confined strictly to cases of nuisance, it would seem that it should be limited to cases closely analogous. Such relief, if applied to criminal acts in general, would supersede the criminal law and deprive parties of the right to a jury trial. Where the property rights of many citizens are involved, it is proper for the government, on their behalf, to invoke the powers of equity, and it would seem that only in such a case should the jurisdiction be assumed."

[3, 4] Petitioner asserts that, "if the superior court of Sacramento county can issue an injunction to supersede the criminal syndicalism law, it can enjoin the violation of any other penal statute. It might issue an injunction forbidding the commission of burglary within the county." This assertion involves both a false premise and a non sequitur. The injunction herein does not supersede the Criminal Syndicalism Act. It rather supplements it. That act remains in full force and effect, in no way modified, qualified, limited, or superseded by the injunction. It does not at all follow that, if equity may properly enjoin the acts denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism Law, it may also enjoin the commission of burglary. It may be conceded that a court of equity would have no power to enjoin the commission of a burglary merely because it is a crime. But it is well settled that an injunction may issue to restrain the commission of acts which are violative of public policy, which create a nuisance or assail the rights of property, although such acts are specific crimes and punishable as such. Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, supra; People v. Truckee Lumber Co., supra; Herald v. Glendale Lodge No. 1289, 46 Cal. App. 325, 189 Pac. 329; People v. Peterson, 45 Cal. App. 457, 187 Pac. 1079; Weis v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 730, 159 Pac. 464; Farmer v. Behmer, 9 Cal. App. 773, 100 Pac. 901; Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652; People v. Stafford Packing Co. (Cal. Sup.) 227 Pac. 485.

> "Something more than the threatened commission of an offense against the laws of the land is necessary to call into exercise the injunctive powers of the court. There must be some interferences, actual or threatened, with property or rights of a pecuniary nature, but when such interferences appear the jurisdiction of a court of equity arises, and is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by or are themselves violations of the criminal law." In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092.
> "It is now clearly settled that a court of equity will enjoin the criminal intimidation of workingmen, in order to protect the property interests of their employers. Similarly, the court will enjoin strikers from committing criminal acts of violence, and, likewise, it will restrain a criminal conspiracy of any number of people to injure property. These applications of the rule, while recent, are still in accordance with well established equitable principles." 5 Pomeroy, § 1891.

[5] We will not take the space here to state in detail the objects, aims, and purposes of the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, or the methods followed by it. They have been set forth at some length in the opinion of this court in People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85. It will suffice to say that, in our opinion, the case presented to the superior court of Sacramento county and upon which the injunction herein was issued comes fairly within the line of cases described by Professor Pomeroy as "closely analogous" to a public nuisance. Petitioner argues that, conceding inadequacy of the legal remedy to be a proper ground for equitable relief, no such inadequacy existed in the present case, and that therefore the equitable remedy was unwarranted. He bases this argument upon the contention that the Criminal Syndicalism Act, unlike other criminal statutes, is preventive in character. As he says, "One does not have to commit criminal syndicalism or sabotage before he may be taken into custody. All he needs to do is to advocate such acts." He argues that this act is itself of an injunctive character, in that under it persons may be punished for engaging in a conspiracy to commit the crimes therein mentioned in advance of the commission of any overt act in furtherance thereof. From this he reasons that the act itself, together with the enforcement thereof by the criminal courts, affords a complete and adequate remedy. Upon reflection it will be found that this is not so. For example, it appears in the instant case that the petitioner is a member and delegate of the Industrial Workers of the World, one of the purposes of which is the overthrow of organized government by unlawful means, among which are sabotage, arson, and other crimes of violence and oppression. It also appears from the affidavits upon which the citation was issued herein that ever since the issuance of the injunction herein, and up to and including the very day of his arrest, petitioner has been busily engaged in procuring new members for this organization. It appears inferentially thereform that he had obtained at least twenty-four new members for this organization since the injunction and prior to his arrest. It is apparent, therefore, that the mere arrest and punishment of this petitioner will not afford adequate protection to the property of citizens from threatened injury and destruction so long as the remaining members of the conspiracy are left at large to carry on its criminal purposes, and together with them the twenty-four new members who have been procured by petitioner in contemptuous violation of the injunction. We are satisfied that the injunction here in question, as applied to the peculiar and particular facts of this case, involved a legitimate and proper exercise of equitable jurisdiction and is not void. Whether or no the trial court may have erred in granting it is a question with which we are not concerned upon this collateral attack.

If further authority be needed in support of our conclusion, the case of State ex rel. Hopkins v. Industrial Workers of the World, 113 Kan. 347, 214 Pac. 617, is precisely in point. That case involved the validity of an injunction issued at the suit of the state, upon the relation of the Attorney General, enjoining the defendants, the Industrial Workers of the World and others, from committing substantially the same acts here enjoined, in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of Kansas. The case arose there upon appeal from the order granting the injunction, and accordingly many grounds of attack were there available which could not be urged upon the collateral attack herein. The Supreme Court of Kansas affirmed the judgment in a brief opinion, resting its decision upon the case of State v. Howat, 109 Kan. 376, 198 Pac. 686, 25 A. L. R. 1210. That case also involved upon appeal the validity of an injunction granted at the suit of the state, on the relation of the Attorney General, restraining defendants, as officers and members of a labor organization, from calling a strike of miners and mine workers in the Kansas coal fields, in violation of the provisions of the Kansas law creating a court of industrial relations. Substantially all of the points made by petitioner herein were there considered and dealt with at length in a scholarly and well-reasoned opinion, concluding with the complete affirmance of the validity of the injunction appealed from. Petitioner asserts that the Howat Case is to be distinguished from the case at bar by the circumstance that the state of Kansas was the owner of some of the lands and buildings threatened with injury by the contemplated action of the defendants. The decision of that case was not, however, predicated upon this circumstance. That court in its opinion referred to this circumstance, and then said:

> "The authorities are in substantial accord that this special interest authorized the state to apply for, and authorized the district court to grant, the injunction; but this court holds that, aside from this indisputable ground, and without aid of the statute expressly authorizing actions of injunction in the name of the state to suppress public nuisances, * * * the district court was possessed of power to grant the injunction."

[6-8] Moreover, it is alleged in the complaint for injunction here in question "that, if the purposes of said defendants are accomplished, real and personal property owned by the residents and citizens of the state of California and by the state of California itself and the municipalities therein will be injured or destroyed by said defendants for the purpose of carrying out their said plans and theories. * * *" It may be that this allegation is indefinite or uncertain or otherwise defective, but that is a question not open to consideration in this collateral proceeding. Petitioner also argues that, inasmuch as the decision in the Howat Case rested upon the validity of the Industrial Court Act, which has since been held invalid (Court of Industrial Relations v. Charles Wolff Packing Co., reported in 262 U. S. 522, 43 Sup. Ct. 630, 67 L. Ed. 1103), to use petitioner's language, "the Howat Case loses its foundation and the Kansas injunction against the Industrial Workers of the World must go down in the same crash." This does not at all follow. If the reasoning and conclusion of that decision were valid, though based upon the false premise of an invalid law, then if such reasoning and conclusion be based upon the sound premise of a valid law, as is the situation in the case at bar, the result is a perfectly sound structure. The constitutionality and validity of the California Criminal Syndicalism Law are no longer open to question. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 Pac. 78; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85. Moreover, as was pointed out in Howat v. State of Kansas, 258 U. S. 181, 42 Sup. Ct. 277, 66 L. Ed. 550, the validity of the injunction was not wholly dependent upon the constitutionality of the Industrial Court Act, and, even if it had been, the invalidity of that act would have served but to render the injunction erroneous, not void. Such an injunction must be obeyed by the parties thereto until reversed, however erroneous the action of the court in issuing it may have been, even though the error be in the assumption of the validity of a law going to the merits of the case.

[9] We find no merit in the contention that the issuance of the injunction here in question constituted an interference with the province of the Legislature. That injunction made no new law. Neither did it supersede, repeal, or modify any existing law. It operated solely to aid in the better enforcement of the law which had been theretofore enacted by the Legislature.

[10] It may be conceded to be a recognized rule of equity that an injunction will not issue to restrain a publication solely upon the ground of the libelous character thereof. (A valuable and instructive review and criticism of this rule is to be found in an article by Professor Pound in 29 Harv. Law Review, 640 et seq.) But it does not follow that an injunction will in no case issue to restrain a publication. This court applied that rule in Dailey v. Sup. Ct., 112 Cal. 94, 44 Pac. 458, 32 L. R. A. 273, 53 Am. St. Rep. 160. That decision was grounded upon the conclusion that such an injunction would violate section 9, article 1, of the Constitution of this state, providing that "every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. * * *" That case is not to be regarded as authority in support of petitioner's contention herein, for the reason that it has since been determined that the right of free speech guaranteed by the Constitution does not include the right to advocate the destruction or overthrow of government or the criminal destruction of property or the other matters proscribed by the Criminal Syndicalism Act. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. at page 375, 203 Pac. 78. The existence and validity of the rule invoked by petitioner may be conceded, but that rule is nevertheless subject to the limitation that, where the proposed publication threatens irreparable injury to rights of property and the other grounds of equitable jurisdiction exist, a court of equity will not hesitate to restrain such publication, regardless of its character as libelous or otherwise. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 31 Sup. Ct. 492, 55 L. Ed. 797–804; Loewe v. Cal. State Fed. of Labor (C. C.) 139 Fed. 71; Jordahl v. Hayda, 1 Cal. App. 696–699, 82 Pac. 1079; 32 Corp. Jur., 174.

[11, 12] We will next consider the claimed insufficiency of the affidavits herein to support the judgment. It is true, as asserted by petitioner, that in a proceeding involving a constructive contempt the affidavits upon which the citation is issued constitute the complaint, and, unless they contain a statement of facts which show that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed in the matter. Frowley v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 220, 110 Pac. 817; Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 81 Pac. 409; Hotaling v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 73, 29 A. L. R. 127. Petitioner asserts that the affidavits herein state conclusions of law rather than the facts which would constitute the offense. As we understand his contention it is that the facts constituting the charge against the petitioner are not stated in the affidavits with that degree of certainty, particularity, and definiteness which would be required in an information charging him with these offenses in a criminal prosecution therefor. The second section of the Criminal Syndicalism Act contains five subdivisions, each enumerating a different group or class of offenses. The first proscribes advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of criminal syndicalism or sabotage. The second forbids justifying or attempting to justify the same. The third proscribes printing, publishing, or circulating literature advising criminal syndicalism. The fourth denounces organizing or assisting in organizing any organization, society, or group organized to advocate, teach, or aid and abet it. The fifth forbids the commission of crime advocated by the doctrine of criminal syndicalism. It was held in the Steelik and Taylor Cases, supra, that in a criminal prosecution under this act, where the charge is based on subdivisions 1, 2, 3, or 5, the acts charged must be pleaded with a degree of particularity that will impart to the accused precise information which, with the evidence adduced to sustain such charge, upon conviction thereof, will operate as a bar to another or further prosecution for the same specific acts, but that, where the charge is the violation of subdivision 4, the statement thereof in the language of said subdivision is sufficient. It would be sufficient for the purposes hereof to point out that the affidavits herein charged that petitioner "had been active in the county of Sacramento and elsewhere throughout the state of California in obtaining persons to become members of said organization." This was equivalent to charging that he assisted in organizing, extending and increasing said organization. In addition to this he was charged with the circulation and distribution of various articles of literature, verbatim copies of which were included in the affidavits.

[13, 14] Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that upon a collateral attack such as this the scope of inquiry into the sufficiency of an indictment or information is limited. It is true that the petitioner would be entitled to be discharged, if the pleading totally failed to charge an offense known to the law. But it is well settled that, if the indictment or information purports and attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into upon habeas corpus after judgment of conviction. 13 Cal. Jur. pp. 232, 233, and cases cited. Whether or not the foregoing rule should be given full application to a case involving a prosecution upon a charge of constructive contempt need not be determined here. It will suffice to say that in no event can the writ of habeas corpus be made to serve the purpose of a writ of error or an appeal. Id., pp. 236, 237.

[15] Petitioner asserts that the charging affidavits wholly failed to allege that petitioner knew of the injunction at the time he is charged with violating it. He supports this assertion by quoting the following language from one of the charging affidavits: "That said R. Wood stated to affiant that he knew that said order of injunction had been issued by said superior court." If this were the only averment upon the subject in the affidavit, petitioner's point would be well taken, because there is nothing therein to fix the time when petitioner is alleged to have acquired this knowledge. In the concluding paragraph of said affidavit, however, it is averred "that during all of said times said R. Wood was and is a member of said Industrial Workers of the World, and all of his said acts aforesaid were done by him * * * with full knowledge on the part of said R. Wood of the issuance and existence of said order of injunction." This averment was entirely sufficient upon this point. Mitchell v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 423, 125 Pac. 1061; Hedges v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 405, 7 Pac. 767.

[16] It is not claimed here, nor was it claimed in the court below, that the evidence was insufficient to establish the truth of the charges. In fact, petitioner admitted the truth thereof by his failure to deny the same upon the hearing. Mitchell v. Superior Court, supra. He made no effort to purge himself of the contempt, but relied solely upon the claimed unconstitutionality of the law. We have considered all of the contentions made in his behalf upon this proceeding, and find no merit in any of them.

It is ordered that the writ be discharged and the petitioner remanded.

194 Cal. 63

Ex parte MORRIS. (Cr. No. 2657.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1924.)

1. Contempt 🔑38, 40—Statute making contempt a misdemeanor held remedial; question of double jeopardy does not arise as respects punishments for contempt, under Penal Code and Code of Civil Procedure.

Pen. Code, § 166, subd. 4, making disobedience of process or order lawfully isued by court a misdemeanor, in view of sections 11, 657, 658, is remedial statute, and the remedy provided thereby is in addition to the remedies provided by Code of Civ. Proc. §§ 1209–1222, relating to contempt; and the offenses denounced in the former code provision are separate and distinct from those denounced in the latter, and the question of "once in jeopardy" does not arise thereunder.

2. Contempt 🔑40—Criminal contempt and civil contempt are to be investigated and punished under same procedure and rules.

Both civil and criminal contempts are contemplated and provided for in Code of Civ. Proc. §§ 1209–1222, and are to be investigated and punished in the same manner and in accordance with the same rules.

3. Contempt 🔑3—Statute held to make contempt criminal offense.

Penal Code, § 166, making enumerated contempts of court misdemeanors, attaches to each of them the definite quality of a criminal offense.

4. Contempt 🔑64—Attachment prior to warrant of commitment not required for commitment issued on conviction of offense pursuant to the Penal Code.

The provisions of Code of Civ. Proc. § 1212, that no warrant of commitment for contempt can be issued without previous attachment to answer or notice or order to show cause, refers to warrant of commitment issued pursuant to the procedure prescribed in that title of the Code of Civil Procedure rather than to commitment on conviction of a criminal offense pursuant to provisions of the Penal Code.

5. Constitutional law 🔑55—Contempt 🔑31—Statute making contempt misdemeanor constitutional.

Pen. Code, § 166, subd. 4, providing that willful disobedience of a process or order of a court shall be a misdemeanor is not unconstitutional as taking away the power of the court contemned to punish for contempt but provides an additional remedy.

In Bank.

In the matter of an application by Louis J. Morris for a writ of habeas corpus to the Police Court of the City of Los Angeles. Petitioner remanded.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, and L. B. Schlingheyde, of Modesto, for petitioner.

J. M. Friedlander, City Prosecutor, of Los Angeles, W. V. Cowan, of Sacramento, and U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. This matter comes before us on a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was charged, tried, and convicted in the police court of the city of Los Angeles, was sentenced to pay a fine of $250, and, in default of payment, to suffer 90 days' imprisonment in the city jail. He was charged with a misdemeanor under section 166, subdivision 4, of the Penal Code, which is as follows:

> "Every person guilty of any contempt of court, of either of the following kinds, is guilty of a misdemeanor: * * *
> "4. Willful disobedience of any process or order lawfully issued by any court. * * *"

He was specifically charged with the willful disobedience of an order and injunction issued out of the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento in an action wherein the people of the state of California, on the relation of the Attorney General, was plaintiff against the Industrial Workers of the World et al., defendants. The petitioner disputes the constitutionality of the penal code section as interpreted by the prosecution, denies the jurisdiction of the police court over the proceeding here in question, and attacks the validity of the injunction which he is charged with violating. All of the questions raised by petitioner in his attack upon the validity of the injunction were raised and considered by this court and resolved against petitioner's contentions in the case of In re Wood (Cal. Sup.) 227 Pac. 908, this day filed, which involved the same injunction here in question.

[1, 2] Petitioner contends that section 166 of the Penal Code should be construed as simply declaratory of the common law which designated criminal contempts as misdemeanors, and that, if it be construed as a remedial statute, it must be held unconstitutional, because it deprives the superior and appellate courts of the power to enforce their judgments and orders and to punish infractions of their dignity and authority. In support of his first contention petitioner calls attention to the circumstance, which has long been recognized, that contempts are of two kinds, which have been designated respectively as "criminal contempts" and "civil contempts." From this he deduces the conclusion that the dual procedure for the punishment of these two kinds of contempts is reflected in the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 1209 to 1222, Code Civ. Proc.) as applicable to civil contempts, and the Penal Code section as applicable to criminal contempts. Herein petitioner fails to recognize the difference between the classification of contempts known to the common law as "criminal contempts" and "civil contempts" on the one hand, and the classification thereof which might be made with reference to the provisions of our codes whereby contempts referred to in the Code of Civil Procedure might be termed "civil contempts" and those enumerated in the Penal Code "criminal contempts." Summary proceedings for the punishment of contempt upon a rule or citation have always been recognized as sui generis, frequently arising in connection with civil actions, often partaking somewhat of the character of civil remedies, and always partaking largely of the character of criminal prosecutions. Hotaling v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 73, 29 A. L. R. 127, and cases there cited. These proceedings at the common law were spoken of as "criminal contempts" when they were directed primarily to the maintenance of the dignity and authority of the court, and as "civil contempts" when their primary object was the protection of the private rights of parties litigant. This distinction is clearly pointed out in Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U. S. 324, 24 Sup. Ct. 665, 48 L. Ed. 997, wherein it is said:

> "The exercise of this power [to punish for contempt] has a twofold aspect, namely: First, the proper punishment of the guilty party for his disrespect to the court or its order, and the second, to compel his performance of some act or duty required of him by the court, which he refuses to perform. * * * Proceedings for contempts are of two classes, those prosecuted to preserve the power and vindicate the dignity of the courts and to punish for disobedience of their orders, and those instituted to preserve and enforce the rights of private parties to suits, and to compel obedience to orders and decrees made to enforce the rights and administer the remedies to which the court has found them to be entitled. The former are criminal and punitive in their nature, and the government, the courts and the people are interested in their prosecution. The latter are civil, remedial and coercive in their nature, and the parties chiefly in interest in their conduct and prosecution are the individuals whose private rights and remedies they were instituted to protect or enforce."

For an exhaustive review of the cases upon this subject see State v. Magee Pub. Co., (N. M.) 224 Pac. 1028.

[3] Both of these classes of contempts are contemplated by and provided for in the provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure, above cited, and are to be investigated and punished in the same manner and in accordance with the same rules. It is the plain intent of section 166 of the Penal Code, however, to give another and different aspect to the contempts there enumerated and to expressly attach to each of them the definite quality of a criminal offense. This intent is made certain when we refer to other sections of the same Code. Section 11 thereof provides that—

> "This code does not affect any power conferred by law upon * * * any public body, tribunal, or officer, to impose or inflict punishment for a contempt."

Section 657 provides:

> "A criminal act is not the less punishable as a crime because it is also declared to be punishable as a contempt."

Section 658:

> "When it appears, at the time of passing sentence upon a person convicted upon indictment, that such person has already paid a fine or suffered an imprisonment for the act of which he stands convicted, under an order adjudging it a contempt, the court authorized to pass sentence may mitigate the punishment to be imposed, in its discretion."

[4] A reading of section 166 in the light of the other sections quoted leaves no room to doubt that it was intended as a remedial statute. The provision in section 1212, Code of Civil Procedure, that "no warrant of commitment can be issued without such previous attachment to answer or such notice or order to show cause," obviously refers to a warrant of commitment issued pursuant to the procedure prescribed in that title of the Code of Civil Procedure rather than to any commitment issued upon conviction of a criminal offense pursuant to the provisions of the Penal Code.

[5] Petitioner's contentions that the penal code section construed as remedial is unconstitutional and that the police court was without jurisdiction of this proceeding are so interwoven that they may well be considered together. Petitioner concedes that the Legislature might prescribe two remedies for the punishment of contempt, "provided, of course, that only the court whose order was contemned had jurisdiction." The quoted proviso contains the kernel of his argument. It is, briefly stated, that the power to punish for contempt of its authority inheres in every court of record as an essential element of the jurisdiction vested in it by the Constitution, without which it could not adequately function as a court; that by reason of the fundamental nature and purpose of this power it must be vested in each instance in that particular court whose order or authority has been contemned; that the Legislature has no authority to take from the courts this essential power; that the attempt of the Legislature to confer upon a police court the jurisdiction to punish a contempt consisting in the violation of an order of the superior court is in effect an attempt to take from the superior court an essential portion of its constitutional authority and is therefore void. From these premises petitioner deduces the conclusion that the jurisdiction to punish as a contempt the violation of an order issued by the superior court of Sacramento county is vested solely and exclusively in that court. If we were to regard petitioner's act solely as an offense against the dignity and authority of that court, we would agree with this conclusion, and the cases so hold. Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wall. 364, 19 L. Ed. 214; Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U. S. 324, 24 Sup. Ct. 665, 48 L. Ed. 997; People v. County Judge of Placer County, 27 Cal. 152; Farmers' State Bank v. State, 13 Okl. Cr. 283, 164 Pac. 132, L. R. A. 1917E, 551; Greene v. Edgington (Idaho) 214 Pac. 751. But these cases do not hold that, when an act which is a comtempt of court is at the same time a specific criminal offense, denounced as such in the Penal Code, it will not be punishable as such. It was the plain intent of the Legislature expressed in the cited code sections to give a double aspect to the wrongful acts there enumerated. In one aspect they are to be regarded as offenses against the dignity and authority of the court, remediable in accordance with the rules prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure. In the other aspect they are to be regarded as offenses against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California, and remediable as such in accordance with the rules prescribed in the Penal Code. It is apparent upon reflection that the same act may at the same time take on a third aspect in which it is to be regarded as an offense against private rights, and remediable as such by an ordinary action at law. Plainly the Legislature did not intend to take away from the court contemned the power to punish a violator of its orders, but intended rather to provide an additional remedy which should be in a sense cumulative, and which should be available in the courts possessing the appropriate criminal jurisdiction. These remedies were not intended to be concurrent, but rather cumulative in character, though not strictly so, because each remedy is for a different offense, though the two offenses arise out of the same act.

Petitioner asserts that, regardless of the legislative intent, if we hold that jurisdiction herein was vested in the police court, the inevitable effect thereof will be to deprive the superior court of the power to punish its own contemners. He asserts that he, having been placed on trial in the police court, if thereafter haled before the superior court at Sacramento to answer for the same act as a contempt of that court, could then interpose a plea of once in jeopardy as a complete defense to that proceeding. He argues that the effect thereof would be to deprive the superior court of the power to punish for a violation of its own orders, because the violator, by the simple expedient of procuring himself to be charged in a police court or justice's court, and there assessed a small penalty, could render himself immune to punishment by the court which he had contemned. The reasoning is sound, but it rests upon a false premise. The defense of once in jeopardy would not lie in such case because the two offenses are distinct and different, even though the act out of which they arise be the same. We find no authority which holds contrary to this conclusion. The cases cited by petitioner (In re Breen, 30 Nev. 186, 93 Pac. 1004; McGovern v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 280 Fed. 73; State v. Clancy, 30 Mont. 193, 76 Pac. 10), do not so hold. Petitioner quotes from 8 R. C. L. 136, 137, but overlooks the following language at pages 137, 138:

> "Sometimes, however, a criminal act involves an injury to property rights, and when this is the case the act may be enjoined, if the party would not have an adequate remedy at law. Sometimes also statutes authorize injunctions against criminal acts, and when such an injunction has been issued, whether on the ground of preventing irremediable injury to property, or by statutory authority to prevent crime, the rule as to former jeopardy cannot be invoked on the ground that the same act is punishable both as a contempt of court and as a crime. The two offenses are not the same."

In Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., supra (194 U. S. 330 [24 Sup. Ct. 667]), the Supreme Court of the United States readopted a summary of its conclusions, arrived at in Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092, in the following language:

> "That the proceeding by injunction is of a civil character and may be enforced by proceedings in contempt; that such proceedings are not in execution of the criminal laws of the land; that the penalty for a violation of injunction is no substitute for and no defense to a prosecution for any criminal offenses committed in the course of such violation." (Italics added.)

The case of Ex parte Allison, 99 Tex. 455, 90 S. W. 870, 122 Am. St. Rep. 653, is direct authority for our conclusion herein. The question of "twice in jeopardy" in relation to an injunction forbidding the commission of a crime was there directly presented for decision, and the court said:

> "Nor do we think that the act in question infringes that provision of the bill of rights which declares that 'no person for the same offense, shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty.' It is true that, if he commits the act which he is enjoined from committing and such act be a violation of the penal laws, * * * he may under this statute be punished for the contempt and also for the violation of the criminal law. But these are not 'the same offense.' In the former case he is punished for a violation of the orders of the court, and in the latter for an offense 'against the peace and dignity of the state.'"

In the note to this case (2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1111), the annotator sums up the authorities in the statement "that a statute authorizing the issuance of an injunction against an act which is also punishable as a violation of criminal law is not open to objection, as twice putting a person in jeopardy for the same offense, seems never to have been questioned." In People v. Mead, 92 N. Y. 415, the defendant was indicted in one court upon a misdemeanor charge of contempt, consisting in the willful disobedience of an order which had been issued by another court. The indictment was based on section 143 of the New York Penal Code, which is identical with our section 166. All of our penal code sections bearing on the questions here under consideration were borrowed from the corresponding sections of the New York Penal Code based on Field's draft. That case is therefore on all fours with the one at bar. The Court of Appeals held that the defendant was subject to prosecution in that manner, saying:

> "It was not necessary to the validity of the indictment that the accused should first have been adjudged in contempt by the court whose process he disobeyed. The two proceedings are wholly independent of each other. One who disobeys the lawful order of a court not only offends against the dignity of the particular tribunal, but also against the public law. The particular court may pass over the contempt and suffer its order to be spurned, but the offense against the people remains. Their authority has been contemned, the administration of public justice assailed, and its power despised. For such an offense the guilty [party] may be punished by indictment, although the court whose order has been disobeyed may take the indignity in silence. The statute has made such disobedience, when willful in its character, an offense against the people, and not left it dependent upon the action or nonaction of the specific judge or court. The statute contemplates that both remedies, or either may be pursued."

In State v. Clancy, 30 Mont. 193, 76 Pac. 10, cited by petitioner herein, the court said:

> "When prosecuted under the Code of Civil Procedure, a contempt of court is not to be regarded as a criminal offense, to be prosecuted only by complaint, information, or indictment, as laid down by section 8 of article 3 of the state Constitution, but, rather, as a special proceeding of a criminal character. * * * Furthermore, the same acts which may be punished in the summary proceeding are characterized by the lawmaking power as criminal, and the additional remedy by an ordinary criminal action is provided for in Pen. Code, § 293."

This is the same as our Penal Code, § 166. The Montana Code also contains sections identical with our 657 and 658. See, also, State ex rel. Duensing v. Roby, 142 Ind. 168, 41 N. E. 145, 33 L. R. A. 213, 51 Am. St. Rep. 174; State ex rel. Zehner v. Vankirk, 27 Ind. 121.

The precise question here under consideration does not appear to have been directly decided by the courts of this state, but the answer thereto is forecasted in the language of some of the decisions. In Ex parte Acock, 84 Cal. 50, 23 Pac. 1029, this court said:

> "The fact that the petitioner may be prosecuted in criminal and civil actions does not prevent a prosecution for contempt. A party may be liable civilly and criminally for an assault upon an officer in open court, and at the same time may be punished for the indignity laid upon the court."

In Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 411, 181 Pac. 652, 656, the court said:

> "Nor can the statute [the redlight abatement act] be assailed on the theory that it conflicts with section 1218 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section cannot be said to purport to fix the penalty for all contempts. Indeed, the next succeeding section provides a different punishment for certain classes of contempts, while a still different punishment is provided in the Penal Code for the contempts enumerated in section 166 thereof."

In Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, 383, 117 Pac. 447, 449 (Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334) the following language was used:

> "The Penal Code declares, in effect, that the provision that no act shall be punishable as a crime except such as may be made a crime by statute, and then only in the manner prescribed or authorized by statute (section 6), shall not apply to contempts punishable under section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 11). It necessarily follows that the Penal Code has no application to a civil contempt, and that, the question whether the particular act is punishable as a criminal contempt or not, under section 166 of the Penal Code, is immaterial to any inquiry arising in a contempt proceeding under section 1209. If, after such punishment in such civil proceeding, a person is convicted of the same act as a crime under said section 166, the former punishment may mitigate the severity of the sentence upon the subsequent conviction. Pen. Code, § 658."

We conclude that section 166 of the Penal Code is a remedial statute; that the remedy thus provided is intended to be cumulative, or, rather, in addition to the remedies provided by the title of the Code of Civil Procedure on contempts; that the offenses denounced in the former code provision are separate and distinct from those denounced in the latter, and the question of "once in jeopardy" does not arise thereunder.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

67 Cal. App. 468

INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE CO. v. NATIONAL RADIO CO. (Civ. 4690.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 27, 1924.)

1. Corporations 🔑406(2)—President of corporation held to have no power to make contract for advertising.

Where a corporation was merely experimenting with a product to be manufactured and had not yet manufactured any, the president under by-laws giving him general powers usually vested in his office did not have power to bind the corporation by contract for advertising involving a large expenditure of money and extending over a year.

2. Corporations 🔑426(12) — Ratification of contract must be made with full knowledge of facts.

Ratification of a contract of the president of a corporation by the corporation must be made with full knowledge of the facts.

3. Corporations 🔑406(2)—Reliance on ostensible authority of president is an essential element of liability of company.

In an action by a magazine company against a corporation to recover for advertising according to a contract made by defendant's president, the fact that plaintiff relied upon the general exercise of authority by the president and that it knew thereof was an essential element of the liability of defendant.

4. Corporations 🔑520—On showing in plaintiff's evidence that president of corporation had not authority to contract for it, nonsuit proper.

Where, in an action against a corporation on contract by defendant's president, plaintiff's proof contained affirmative evidence that defendant's by-laws did not give its president power to make such contract, and that there had been no special authorization by the board of directors, granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by the International Magazine Company against the National Radio Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph A. Garry, Joseph M. Trusty, and Frank J. Golden, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against it, entered after defendant's motion for a nonsuit had been granted, in an action brought to recover $1,000 alleged to be due from the defendant as the price of five one-page advertisements in a magazine known as "Motor Boating," a publication owned by plaintiff.

The record discloses that on or about July 17, 1920, Joseph B. Ruegg was the president of the defendant corporation, and on that day signed a writing in the name of the corporation, by himself as president thereof, agreeing to pay a specified sum for each insertion of a one-page advertisement in said magazine for a period of one year. The writing was not signed by either the secretary or manager, nor was it under the seal of the corporation. It also appeared in evidence, affirmatively, that there was no resolution of the board of directors of the corporation authorizing its president to sign this contract, nor was there any resolution ever passed by said board referring in any way to the said contract or the advertising to be done thereunder. The by-laws were introduced in evidence and the only portion thereof having any bearing upon our problem is the following:

> "The president * * * shall have the general powers and duties usually vested in the office of the president of a corporation."

It also appeared that the corporation had a general manager at the time the contract was signed by its president; that the advertisement which was published in the magazine in conformity with said contract referred to a manufactured product which the defendant corporation was incorporated for the purpose of producing, but that at the time the contract was signed the corporation was merely experimenting with said product and no sales had been made of the same and the article was not being produced for sale; that the contract provided for advertising for a period of a year at an expense of $200 per month.

[1] We think it is apparent that the president of this corporation had no actual authority to make the contract. The section of the by-laws above quoted giving to him "the general powers usually vested in the office of president" is ineffectual to confer authority to make a contract for the corporation such as here involved, for such power is not usually vested in the president. It was said in the case of Black v. Harrison Home Co., 155 Cal. 121, 99 Pac. 494:

> "It is an elementary principle of corporation law that the president of a corporation has no power merely because he is president to bind the corporation by contract. The management of the affairs of a corporation is ordinarily in the hands of its board of directors, and the president has only such power as has been given him by the by-laws and by the board of directors and such other power as may arise from his having assumed and exercised the power in the past with the apparent consent and acquiescence of the corporation. The general rule in this regard is stated in 2 Cook on Corporations, section 716, as follows: 'The president of a corporation has no power to buy, sell, or contract for the corporation, nor to control its property, funds or management. This is a rule which prevails everywhere, excepting possibly in the state of Illinois. * * * It is true that the board of directors may expressly authorize the president to contract; or his authority to contract may arise from his having assumed and exercised that power in the past; or the corporation may ratify his contract or accept the benefits of it, and thereby be bound. But the general rule is that the president cannot act or contract for the corporation any more than any other one director.' See Alta Silver Min. Co. v. Alta Placer Min. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 632, 21 Pac. 373; Bliss v. Kaweah, etc., Co., 65 Cal. 502, 4 Pac. 507; Salfield v. Sutter, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 546, 29 Pac. 1105; Blood v. La Serena, etc., Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252; Barney v. Pfoor, 117 Cal. 56, 58, 48 Pac. 987; Northwestern, etc., Co. v. Whitney, 5 Cal. App. 105, 108, 89 Pac. 981."

The same rule is announced in California Jurisprudence, vol. 6, § 474, p. 1102:

> "Powers of President. Although the president of a corporation is the presiding officer of the board of directors, he has merely by reason of holding such office and regardless of conferred or ostensible authority, no more power of management or disposal over the property and affairs of the corporation than any other single member of the board. He has no power, merely because he is president, to bind the corporation by contract, but rather, only such power as has been given him by the by-laws and by the board of directors, and such other powers as may arise from his having assumed and exercised authority in the past with the apparent consent and acquiescence of the corporation, or which are in the ordinary course and conduct of its business."

In the instant case, the contract involved a considerable expenditure of money and extended over a period of a year. Under the special facts and circumstances of this case, where the corporation was merely experimenting with the product to be manufactured and had not yet manufactured such articles for sale, the important matter of starting out on an expensive advertising campaign, to extend over the period of a year, was, assuredly, a problem to be considered by the board of directors, the managing body of the corporation, and would not be within the general duties of the president of the corporation.

Added to this, we have in the record the testimony of the secretary of the corporation, the plaintiff's witness, as follows:

> "Q. You say you are the secretary. What power has Mr. Ruegg as president of the National Radio Company? What are his various duties by resolution? A. There are not any resolutions giving him any general powers, but each time it was necessary to sign any contract or instrument binding the corporation, there was a resolution specially passed conferring that authority and power, such as signing notes and borrowing money for the corporation."

The case of Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 514, 185 Pac. 388, is relied upon by appellant to maintain its contention that its proof in the instant case made out a prima facie case. But the Grummet Case presented a situation where an employee was suing for wages alleged to be due him. It appeared that the plaintiff had been engaged as assistant manager of the corporation by the president and manager of the same; that he performed services for the corporation and his employment continued for nearly two years; that his name appeared as assistant manager in the advertising of the defendant corporation; and that the books of the corporation showed that he was to receive a fixed compensation for his services, $710 of which had been paid to him and the balance of $2,340 had been credited to his account upon the books of the corporation. We think the facts of the two cases are not comparable.

[2] Upon the question of ratification, plaintiff showed that it had mailed copies of its magazines, containing the advertisement, to defendant from time to time. It appeared, however, that they had not been mailed to the proper address of the defendant and there was no showing made that any of them had ever been received by the defendant nor seen by any of its officers. There is also testimony that statements of account were mailed from time to time to the defendant and that some statements of similar import upon the stationery of plaintiff were afterwards seen in the files of the defendant company. There is no proof, however, that these statements were brought to the attention of any officers of the company and no showing that the corporate officers had any knowledge of the existence of the contract relied upon. A ratification must be made with full knowledge of the facts. Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 267, 271, 48 Pac. 54; 6 Cal. Jur. § 57, pp. 93, 94.

[3] There was no substantial evidence upon which to predicate ostensible authority of the president; for while the record contained the statement of the president that he had "O. K.'d bills and various kinds of papers * * * whatever came up in the regular routine of business of the corporation," there is no proof that the plaintiff relied upon this exercise of authority or that it even knew thereof. And this is an essential element of liability based upon the ostensible authority of an agent. 1 Cal. Jur. pp. 737 et seq., §§ 38, 39, 40.

[4] It is important to point out that the present case does not present a situation where the plaintiff simply proved the making of a contract on behalf of the defendant by its president, and thereafter the motion for nonsuit was made. Had such a situation existed the plaintiff would have made out a prima facie case under the rule of Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., supra, and it would have devolved upon the defendant to take up the question of the absence of special authorization as a defense—that matter not entering into a prima facie showing. But in the instant case the plaintiff went further than a showing that the contract was made by the president of the corporation on its behalf. The plaintiff's proof included affirmative evidence that there was no provision in the by-laws giving the president power to make contracts and that there had been no special authorization by the board of directors. These facts were brought out by the plaintiff's witnesses. It would seem, therefore, that the plaintiff's case must fall of its own weight.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. IRBY. (Cr. 1060.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 27, 1924.)

1. Witnesses 🔑391—Admission of evidence of conversation for impeachment purposes erroneous.

Court erred where state was attempting to impeach accused as to certain conversation in permitting to be asked of accused, "Did you ever tell S. that?" and in permitting S. to testify that at a time other than the conversation involved certain things were said.

2. Criminal law 🔑369(1)—Admission of guilt of another crime inadmissible.

A statement of accused while under arrest, amounting to an admission of arrest for sodomy, was inadmissible in prosecution for robbery.

3. Criminal law 🔑706—Conduct of prosecuting attorney held reprehensible.

Conduct of prosecuting attorney in persistently instilling into case evidence as to another crime was reprehensible, and deprived defendant of a fair trial.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—What is technical error not resulting in miscarriage of justice.

Where, from examination of the entire cause, court is unable to determine whether appellant would or would not have been convicted but for errors of court and misconduct of prosecutor, provisions of Const. art 6, § 4½, warranting reversal only where error has "resulted in a miscarriage of justice," may not be availed of.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Macon F. Irby was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed.

Chauncey Gardner, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was convicted of robbery under an information in two counts. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not necessary, for the purposes of the decision which we are about to render, to state even in a general way the facts involved in the second count of the information, and we shall recite but briefly, as a preface to certain portions of the record which we must state circumstantially, the facts upon which the first count is based.

The name of the prosecuting witness is Solovich. At the time of the occurrences upon which the information rests he had resided at a certain apartment house, with one Harrigan as a roommate for nine years. Solovich's story is that on a certain evening he was on his way home and stopped to look at a show window near the apartment house in which he lived; that he was there accosted by appellant, who made the assertion that they had met before, although Solovich says they had not; that appellant persuaded Solovich to spend the night with him at a hotel about a block distant from Solovich's place of residence, and that when they got into the room at the hotel appellant beat Solovich severely and robbed him.

Appellant, who took the witness stand in his own behalf, says that he met Solovich at the show window, but denies that he pretended that they had ever been acquainted before that meeting. He says that Solovich asked him to procure a room at some hotel where they might spend the night together, claiming that he (Solovich) was without funds to procure a night's lodging for himself; that appellant finally consented to do so; that they went together to the hotel mentioned by Solovich in his testimony; that they undressed and went to bed; that thereafter Solovich attempted an obscene familiarity with appellant, leading the latter to believe that Solovich intended to satisfy an unnatural sex desire upon him, and that he then jumped out of bed and administered to Solovich the beating described by the latter in his testimony. Appellant denies specifically the statements of Solovich as to the alleged robbery.

Upon the cross-examination of appellant the following transpired:

"Mr. Costello (a deputy district attorney): Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. No, sir. Q. You say you called Mr. Solovich a degenerate? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you ever called one? A. No, sir. Q. You are sure you have never been called one, or accused of being one? Mr. Gardner (counsel for defendant): I object to that as not cross-examination, and misconduct. The Court: Objection sustained. Mr. Gardner: We ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks of the district attorney. Mr. Costello: I have been pretty liberal to you. Mr. Gardner: I think that is highly prejudicial your honor. The Court: Stricken out, and the jury instructed to disregard it."

Later in the cross-examination appellant said something about his desire to force Solovich "to get out of Los Angeles," in which city the events mentioned in the testimony transpired. The following then occurred:

"Q. (By Mr. Costello): Why did you want him to get out of Los Angeles? A. Because he is a degenerate, sir. Q. You are not one, are you? Mr. Gardner: Objected to as not cross-examination, prejudicial; and we ask the court again to instruct the jury to disregard the district attorney's remarks, which we assign as misconduct. The Court: The jury are instructed to disregard the remarks of the district attorney."

The persistency of the district attorney was again made evident during the cross-examination of appellant. The witness was asked by Mr. Costello:

"Just what is your understanding of a degenerate? * * * A. My opinion of a degenerate is a man that will want another man to go directly against the laws of nature, and have sexual intercourse with another man, instead of a person of the opposite sex. Mr. Costello: Did Mr. Solovich try that with you?"

It is unnecessary to set down the answer. The examination proceeded:

"Q. Did you try to do it to him? A. I hit him because he wanted to. Q. I am asking you—did you? Mr. Gardner: Just a moment. He has answered the question. The Court: No, he has not answered it. A. Did I try to do it to him? Q. Yes. A. No, sir. Q. You never tried that on any young man in your locality. A. No, sir; absolutely not. Q. Never have been accused of it? Mr. Gardner: Objected to as immaterial, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it, and assign the question as misconduct. The Court: The jury will eliminate the question from your minds, and pay no attention to it."

The same subject came up yet again on appellant's cross-examination. On direct he testified that on the way to the hotel where he and Solovich took the room he noticed that Solovich had certain effeminate mannerisms. He asked how they were acquired, and Solovich said he acted in that manner because he had been a female impersonator on stage and screen. On cross-examination appellant answered a certain question thus, in part:

"I was paying more attention to Mr. Solovich's actions at that time, rather than his words, * * * and I questioned him as to why he acted that way."

Mr. Costello's cross-examination then proceeded:

"Q. How did he act? A. Why, I probably could demonstrate it but—Q. All right; let's have you demonstrate it—will you? Mr. Gardner: We object to all that, your honor; not cross-examination. The Court: Overruled. * * * A. When he was walking down Ninth street towards Main, he had one hand on his hip that way (indicating), and was walking something like this (indicating). Mr. Costello: You felt then you were right in clover, didn't you? Mr. Gardner: Objected to as misconduct, not cross-examination, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. The Court: Objection sustained, the jury instructed to disregard the question."

Appellant was arrested at the Majestic Hotel, in Los Angeles, two or three days after the happening of the events upon which the information is based. The arresting officer was one Stelzriede. On the redirect examination of appellant his counsel asked him to state a conversation which occurred between him and Stelzriede at the time of the arrest. Appellant did so, but the conversation given bore no relation whatever to any matters similar to those we have set forth in the foregoing extracts from the testimony. The recross-examination of appellant then occurred, the opening portion of it being as follows:

"Mr. Costello: Is that all the officer said to you? A. Not all. Q. Now, tell us all the officer said to you, will you? Mr. Gardner: At that place. Mr. Costello: I am cross-examining. Mr. Gardner: I am here to look out for the defendant. The Court: I assume it will be confined to that conversation."

The witness then related some matters unconnected with the subject-matter of our present statement. The recross-examination then proceeded:

"Q. Did Mr. Stelzriede ask you if you were ever arrested before? Mr. Gardner: Objected to on the ground that the witness has stated that he didn't remember any other part of the conversation. The Court: He has the right to ask the question. Overruled. A. No, sir; he didn't. Q. Did Mr. Stelzriede ask you if you were ever arrested before, and you said 'Yes,' and he asked you what for? Mr. Gardner: Hold on; we object to that—I know what is coming. Mr. Costello: I know what is coming, too. The Court: You will address the court, gentlemen. Mr. Gardner: There was another trial of this case, your honor, and I am in a little better position to know what is in counsel's mind than your honor, and it is clearly incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; and if he wants to ask it, I ask that the jury be excused until we can argue the matter. Mr. Costello: You are not afraid are you? Mr. Gardner: I object to counsel's remarks, and assign the same as misconduct. The Court: Yes; don't interrupt him."

Then followed a colloquy showing that the trial judge and both counsel concurred in the untenable view that the people were entitled to show the entire conversation at the time of the arrest, notwithstanding the fact that parts of it may have related to matters not cognate to those brought out on the direct examination. The colloquy ended and the recross-examination proceeded, thus:

"Mr. Costello: I have a right to test his credibility on that conversation. The Court: I think so; if the door is opened, he can go all the way in. * * * Q. Now, then, I will ask you if Mr. Stelzriede, at that time and place, didn't ask you if you were ever arrested before, and you answered 'Yes'? A. He did not. Q. And if he didn't then ask you what you were arrested for, and you told him that six weeks prior to that time you were arrested—— Mr. Gardner: We object to this, because * * * he is trying to elicit testimony that occurred at another conversation some place else. * * * I submit it is dangerous ground. Mr. Costello: I have a right on cross-examination to test his recollection. Mr. Gardner: He is trying to put something in here that is improper. Mr. Costello: I am not responsible for counsel's errors, if he opens the door. The Court: I have no means of knowing if it was this conversation, or some other conversation. Of course, I will ask Mr. Costello to be careful not to mix up two conversations. Mr. Costello (continuing): ——then on suspicion and taken to the district attorney's office for sodomy on a boy sixteen years old? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ever tell Stelzriede that? Mr. Gardner: Objected to as not proper cross-examination. The Court: Overruled. Mr. Gardner: He is asking now did he ever tell him that, your honor. I imagine he is trying to get clear away from that conversation to some other place. Mr. Costello: Will you answer that question? Mr. Gardner: Just a minute. What did your honor rule on it? The Court: I will overrule the objection. A. I never at any time told Mr. Stelzriede any such thing. Mr. Costello: Did you tell him anything in substance or effect like that? A. No. Q. Did you tell him you had been arrested for suspicion of sodomy? A. I didn't; no, sir."

Stelzriede was then called by appellant, and on direct examination testified only as to a search of appellant which he made at the time of the arrest. Mr. Costello plunged into the cross-examination of the witness thus:

"Mr. Costello: Mr. Stelzriede, at the time of the defendant's arrest, did the defendant tell you—did you ask the defendant whether or not he had been arrested before, and he said 'Yes'? A. Subsequent to the arrest he was asked that question, and answered in the affirmative; yes. Q. Did you ask him on what charge? A. I did. Q. And what was his answer? Mr. Gardner: That is at this conversation, or at some other time? A. I said subsequent to his arrest; that is, after he had been brought to the station, as I remember it."

Mr. Gardner then objected to the question addressed to the witness, and Mr. Costello insisted upon it as proper impeachment of the answer of appellant that he had never at any place told Stelzriede that he had been arrested before. Then occurred the following:

"Mr. Gardner: That is the question we objected to on the ground it was not cross-examination. That is a matter he was trying to bring out at a conversation at the Hotel Majestic; then he wanted to ramble all over the field and go somewhere else. Mr. Costello: I am not responsible for your opening the door. Mr. Gardner: You opened the door. I submit it is misconduct, and counsel knows it; and it is dangerous misconduct, too. The Court: I am inclined to think it would be impeachment on a collateral matter. * * * The jury are instructed to disregard the conversation that occurred between Mr. Stelzriede and the defendant at a time other than the time of the arrest."

The appellant having rested his defense, Stelzriede was called in rebuttal. He testified that he had a conversation with appellant at the police station shortly after his arrest; that at the time there was no promise or reward or hope of immunity offered to appellant, and that no force or violence was used toward him, and that the statements made by him were free and voluntary. The examination then proceeded:

"Q. Now, state the conversation? Mr. Gardner: Your honor, I object to that. He is trying to get in the same old matter. I can state I have heard the testimony, and so has counsel, and there is nothing as to a confession, and it is simply an effort to get testimony in that the court has already ruled is incompetent and immaterial. We * * * feel, and we do assign such conduct on the part of the district attorney as misconduct. The Court: I think certain evidence has been brought out here that would make the matter admissible. Objection overruled. You may answer. A. I then asked the defendant if he all together [sic] mentally. He said, 'Yes;' and during the conversation I asked him if he had ever been under arrest for anything previous to this; and he said, 'Yes.' I asked him what the facts were, and he said he had been arrested on suspicion of sodomy. I asked him if he had been found guilty, and he said 'No'; that the case had been dismissed against him. * * * Mr. Gardner: We move to strike out that testimony as something outside of the issues. * * * It has no business here; * * * and it is clearly introduced by the district attorney for the purpose of prejudicing the jury and putting the defendant in a bad light with the jury. He is not on trial for any such offense. The charge here is robbery. The Court: I think it is germane; motion denied. * * * Mr. Costello: Now, will you state all the conversation, please? A. * * * I asked him if he was living in town, or if he was living with anybody—if he had a woman. I asked him several questions along those lines. * * * Mr. Gardner: I move to strike out the testimony of the witness on the ground that it is not rebuttal in any way at all, and it is not within the issues of the case. The Court: Motion denied."

[1, 2] It is contended by appellant that the portions of the record which we have set forth show misconduct on the part of the district attorney, and show that the court erred in permitting the people to introduce the evidence which went in over appellant's objections and which remained in despite his motions to strike. We shall consider first the claim of error as to the rulings of the court. The condition of the part of the record showing the attempt of the district attorney to bring out the alleged complete conversation at the time of appellant's arrest at the Majestic Hotel is most peculiar. Appellant did not object upon the ground that the part of the conversation sought to be elicited was not proper, but only upon the ground that the matter called for was really part of a later conversation. This objection was not tenable, as the questions of the district attorney specifically called for what he was after as being a part of the conversation at the time of the arrest. The fact that the evidence so persistently sought was not a part of that conversation reflects upon the conduct of the district attorney in asking for it, as we shall later have occasion to point out, but there was no error upon the part of the court in permitting the questions in the face of the only objection which was made. The part of the record just mentioned is followed by the question addressed to appellant, "Did you ever tell Stelzriede that?" It was objected that this question was not proper cross-examination, and Mr. Gardner specifically pointed out, in support of the objection, that "He is asking now did he ever tell him that. I imagine he is trying to get clear away from that conversation to some other place"—this latter statement being more than a mere matter of imagination, as the truth of it was obvious from the question propounded. It is plain that the court erred in overruling the objection, so plain that no reason need be assigned for the statement. Another error was committed by the court in allowing Stelzriede to detail the conversation between appellant and him at the police station following the arrest. There is no theory upon which we can conceive that the evidence was admissible. The statement attributed to appellant amounted to an admission on his part that he had been charged with another crime, and the admission bore no relevancy whatever to the crime for the commission of which he was on trial. Mr. Gardner was quite justified in reminding the court, in aid of his objection to the evidence, that appellant was under a charge of robbery, and not of sodomy.

[3] As to the conduct of the deputy district attorney, his course throughout the trial was most reprehensible. Instead of proceeding with a fair and open endeavor to convict appellant upon proper evidence, as was his duty, he subjected him to treatment which was most oppressive, and which deprived him of that trial on the merits which he had a right to expect. We shall select, in support of this statement one of the instances exhibited by the portion of the record which we have quoted. The incident to which we refer was the attempt to show by Stelzriede, as a part of the conversation at the Majestic Hotel, a conversation which occurred later at the police station. Mr. Gardner pointed out forcibly that he knew, and that the deputy district attorney knew, that the conversation which the latter sought did not occur at the hotel, but at another place. He asserted that the fact was so well known for the reason that there had been a previous trial of the cause. A transcript of the earlier trial is on file upon the present appeal. It shows that the first trial commenced but 33 days before the commencement of the trial from which this appeal results, and that Mr. Costello was present at that trial as sole counsel for the people, as he was at the second trial. It does not appear possible that he could have forgotten when the conversation occurred. Stelzriede had not forgotten the true sequence of events, as the final outcome showed. If, however, Mr. Costello had forgotten, he was reminded of the truth by the plain statements of Mr. Gardner, and he should then have relinquished his persistent attempt to ingraft the second conversation upon the first, especially as the trial judge warned him not to mingle the two. Turning now to another phase of the attitude of the deputy district attorney, it might appear at first glance that his questions addressed to appellant and attempting to show an acquiescence by the latter in the alleged unmentionable conduct of Solovich at the hotel were proper. The questions alluded to were such as, for instance, "Did you try to do it to him?" Questions of this sort, we say, might appear, without mature consideration, to have been proper, and this upon the theory that, if the acquiescence of appellant were shown, it would have discredited his story as to the reason for his beating Solovich. We do not decide that the evidence would have been proper, for the reason that the point is not presented by the record. It is apparent that the deputy district attorney was not justified in asking questions along the line indicated. It was not and never has been the theory of the prosecution that the evidence was admissible upon the theory stated. There is no hint in the testimony of Solovich of any acquiescence of appellant in the acts which the latter charges against Solovich, as, indeed, there could not well be under all the circumstances of the case; the deputy district attorney did not contend for its admissibility at the trial on any such ground, and no such contention is made by the Attorney General on this appeal. The asking of the questions referred to was but part of the misconduct of which the deputy district attorney was guilty throughout the trial. We need not pause to inquire to what extent, if at all, that misconduct is palliated by the fact that, finally, the judge ruled with the prosecution and permitted the conversation which occurred at the police station. Laying that final matter aside, it is yet evident that the misconduct of the prosecuting officer is palpable and inexcusable and deserving of the stern rebuke of this court.

[4] We have as yet cited no authority upon the points we have discussed, but such authority is at hand. That the trial court erred and that the prosecutor was guilty of misconduct is made manifest by a perusal of the opinions in such cases as People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 Pac. 78, and People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 196 Pac. 47. In order to determine whether the error of the court and the misconduct of the prosecutor have "resulted in a miscarriage of justice," as that expression is used in section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we have made an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence. From that examination we are unable to determine whether appellant would or would not have been convicted but for the errors of the court and the misconduct of the prosecutor. He may well have been substantially injured by them. Under such circumstances the provisions of section 4½ may not be availed of in order to support the judgment of conviction. See Freeman v. Adams (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 600, and cases cited. The misconduct of the district attorney comes well within the language of the Supreme Court in one of the cases to which we have referred above:

> "It is to be regretted that prosecuting counsel, in the heat of contest and in the desire for victory, sometimes forget that the function of a district attorney is largely judicial, and that he owes to the defendant as solemn a duty of fairness as he is bound to give to the state full measure of earnestness and fervor in the performance of his official obligations. Again and again has this court commented upon the course of prosecutors in this regard, but instances of such conduct are all too common. We have no doubt that in the present case the prosecutor's demeanor and his improper questions deprived the defendant of that fair trial which ought to have been his under the law. For this reason he should not be subjected to the result of a verdict so induced." People v. Tufts, supra.

In solving the question presented under the Constitution we do not find it necessary to state even a summary of the entire testimony in the cause. It is enough to say that if the jury had acquitted appellant the verdict would have found abundant support in the evidence. It is pertinent here to again mention the fact that there was a disagreement of the jury upon the first trial of appellant. It is asserted in the briefs that on that trial the jury stood seven to five, but as to whether the larger number was for an acquittal or for a conviction we are not informed. We are convinced that, because of the court's errors and the deputy district attorney's misconduct, appellant was denied a fair trial.

There are no other points which require consideration.

Judgment and order reversed.

CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

(Civ. 4754.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 4, 1924.)

Certiorari ⚷66—All material evidence assumed in answer setting forth evidence omitted from application, in absence of reply.

Where application for writ does not state all material evidence on point as to which evidence is claimed to be insufficient to warrant conclusion, as required by Supreme Court rule 26, subd. 4, and petitioner files no reply to answer purporting to supply much omitted evidence, Supreme Court may assume that all material evidence on such point is contained in answer.

Application by the City of San Bernardino for writ of certiorari to review the decision of the State Industrial Accident Commission. Writ denied.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In its application for the writ of certiorari petitioner has made no attempt to comply with that rule of the Supreme Court which provides that the application must fairly state "all the material evidence" relating to the point as to which the want of evidence is claimed to exist. Rule XXVI, subd. 4. Nor has petitioner seen fit to file any reply to the Commission's answer, though the time therefor has elapsed, and the answer purports to supply much of the evidence which was omitted by petitioner in its application. We therefore feel justified in assuming that all of the material evidence bearing upon the point raised by petitioner is set forth in the Commission's answer. The evidence so set forth in the answer unquestionably is sufficient to warrant the conclusion of the Commission, and the writ therefore is denied.

Point not presented, with request for ruling thereon, in presenting motion for new trial need not be determined.

4. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Direct evidence of falsity of alleged representations unnnecessary.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, prosecution need not rely on direct evidence to prove falsity of representations, making of which, as charged in information, is not controverted; it being competent for jury to consider defendant's acts at time of, and following commission of, offense charged, in determining truth or falsity of representations.

5. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Direct testimony by prosecuting witness as to reliance on defendant's representations unnecessary.

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, it was unnecessary for prosecuting witness to testify in direct terms that he parted with money, in reliance on defendant's representations; it being sufficient that jury could draw such inference from evidence.

6. False pretenses 🔑49(3)—"False token" or "false writing" held sufficiently shown.

Box, in which defendant pretended to place prosecuting witness' money, and contents found therein, when opened at bank after defendant's departure, held sufficient showing of false token, and entries on register of hotel, to which box was brought, sufficient showing of false writing, within Pen. Code, § 1110.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, False Token; False Writing.]

7. Criminal law 🔑829(7)—Refusal of instructions as to evidence of alibi held not error, in view of instructions given.

Refusal of instructions as to evidence of alibi held not error, in view of instructions requiring findings that defendant committed act charged, on date and in city alleged, and proof of allegations of information beyond reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Peter Perrin was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and appeals. Affirmed.

Saunders & White, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was charged by information with the commission of a felony, he entered a plea of not guilty, and was tried before the court sitting with a jury; the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty as charged in the information; he made a motion for a new trial, and in the motion stated all of the statutory grounds; his motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment of the trial court and its order denying him a new trial.

For many years prior to raisin day, April 26, 1923, Clement A. Larre had resided near Fresno. While residing in that neighborhood he had accumulated sufficient funds to own the small property on which he resided, and to have $4,000 on deposit in the Bank of Italy.

Some of the facts contained in the record are as follows: Prior to the date mentioned Peter Perrin, the defendant, had been working as waiter, bartender, and café attendant in and about Tijuana. At that place he had heard at least one sure-thing man describe the so-called "can-game." Recognizing the possibilities, he determined to make an attempt to work the game on some person whom he might locate. Accordingly, he went to Fresno and was there on raisin day. While standing on the street he observed Larre, and approached and entered into a conversation with him. Finding that Larre was a Basque, he expressed his pleasure, and continued to converse with him for two hours or more. In that conversation he inquired where Larre lived and also as to whether Larre had any money. The prosecuting witness frankly stated that he had about $4,000 in the bank. The second day after raisin day Perrin called at the home of Larre, where he met both Larre and Larre's wife, and visited with them two hours. The next day after that he called again and met the same persons and also their son. On one of these visits he took with him a bottle of wine, and that he worked swiftly in ingratiating himself in the confidence of Larre is evidenced by the fact that on one occasion he made the statement "I love you like my father." On the visit last mentioned he made arrangements to meet Larre at the Free Market in town the next day. Pursuant to that appointment they met, and shortly thereafter Perrin introduced Larre to another man, who is referred to in the record as John Doe. Their new acquaintance asked them if they spoke French and expressed his delight in meeting gentlemen who spoke French. He also stated to them that he had been three days on the train and that he was stopping at the Palace Hotel. He said his father had been an architect in Fresno for a number of years and had become a very rich man, and that an automobile ran over and killed him. Before dying the father told the speaker that $50,000 of his estate should be delivered to a priest in Fresno. Thereupon Perrin interrupted John Doe by saying, "What is the use in giving $50,000 to the priest, why don't you give it to us? We are two Frenchmen and we need the money." John Doe replied that there were lots of tramps around Fresno and he did not care to give the money to tramps, but wanted to give it to some one who had money. He further stated that he had $10,000 more in a valise at the Palace Hotel that he was going to divide. Thereupon they rented a room and registered in what is known as the Arlington Hotel, which consists of some rooms upstairs over "Army Goods Store." John Doe told Perrin to go down and get a box. Later Perrin came back with the box. At that time Larre had drawn his money out of the bank and had the $4,000 in his pocket. While in the room the defendant pretended to place that $4,000 in the box. About the same time John Doe exhibited a purse which was tied beneath his coat and in which he claimed there was lots of money, and shoved around his coat, pretending that he was putting something in the box. Then the box was locked and the two strangers left the box there and told Larre that they were going to the Palace Hotel to get the $10,000. When the two strangers left for the Palace Hotel they cautioned Larre to guard carefully the box until they returned with the additional money. He did so guard it for five or ten minutes, and then he commenced to suspect that something was wrong. He took the box to the Bank of Italy, the bank called a policeman, the box was broken open, and there was inside of it a bandana handkerchief, the leather purse, and five one-dollar bills.

[1-3] The appellant calls to our attention the fact that the information purported to charge the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. Pen. Code, sec. 532. He then reviews the foregoing evidence and contends that the evidence shows that Larre had no intention of passing title to his $4,000, and the offense, if any, was grand larceny, and was not the offense pleaded in the information. In other words, the appellant claims that there was a material variance between the offense charged and the proof introduced. Be this as it may, we do not find anything in the record that presents the point to this court for consideration. This is a court of review; its power extends to reviewing the rulings made by the trial court. We have read the record from cover to cover. In the trial court there was no objection made, and there was no motion made which, on its face, purported to present the point to the trial court. Every presumption is in favor of the regularity of the proceedings in that court. He who would assert that the trial court committed an error must produce a record showing that the error was committed, not that one may have been committed. The utmost that can be said in favor of the appellant is that his application for a new trial covered, among other grounds:

> "* * * 4. That the court * * * erred in the decision of questions of law arising during the course of the trial.
> "5. That the verdict is contrary to the law and contrary to the evidence."

However, the record does not show that in presenting his motion for a new trial the appellant presented the above point or asked the trial court to rule thereon. Under these circumstances we do not feel called upon to determine the merits of the question.

[4] On the trial of the case, the prosecution did not introduce any evidence directly to the point that the representations were false. However, it was not necessary that the prosecution rely on direct evidence to prove the negative. It was entitled to rely on indirect evidence as proving the negative. That the representations were made as charged in the information, is not controverted. It was competent for the jury in determining the truth or falsity of such representations to take into consideration all of the circumstances. In doing so, the acts of the defendant at the time of, and following the commission of, the offense as charged in the information certainly constituted some proof of the falsity of the representations. People v. Ward, 5 Cal. App. 36, 89 Pac. 874.

[5] It was likewise unnecessary for the prosecuting witness to testify in direct terms that he parted with his money, relying on the representations of the defendant. It was sufficient if the jury could draw that inference from the evidence introduced in the case. People v. Hong Quin Moon, 92 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 1096.

[6] The appellant further contends that the evidence introduced by the prosecution did not comply with the requirements of section 1110 of the Penal Code. "* * * the defendant cannot be convicted if the false pretense was expressed in language unaccompanied by false token or writing. * * *" We think there is no merit in the point. The box and the contents found therein, when the box was opened at the bank, are a sufficient showing to constitute a false token and the entries on the hotel register were a sufficient showing to constitute a false writing, within the purview of the statute.

[7] The appellant requested the trial court to give certain instructions regarding the evidence, which the appellant had introduced in his attempt to prove an alibi. The trial court did not give any one of those instructions and the appellant assigns its refusal as error. However, the trial court did instruct the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that in the county of Fresno, at or about the time mentioned in the information, the defendant knowingly and designedly, * * *" etc. The trial court also carefully and fully instructed the jury to the effect that the prosecution must prove the allegations of the information beyond a reasonable doubt. The nature of the defense interposed was to the effect that the defendant did not commit the alleged offense on the date charged at Fresno, because on that date he was at Tijuana, Mexico. It is patent that, if the jury found that he did commit the act on the date alleged at Fresno, he was not on that date at Tijuana, and the converse is equally true. A similar question was presented to the court in the case of People v. Buck, 151 Cal. 667, 91 Pac. 529. At page 673 [91 Pac. 531] Chief Justice Beatty said:

> "No reason occurs to us why so mere a commonplace should not have been allowed to stand, but there seems as little reason why it should have been requested. It must be presumed that a jury always understand that it is their duty to give to any evidence submitted to them the weight to which it seems entitled, and the refusal of the judge to make that comment on any particular item or line of evidence cannot be supposed to prejudice the party offering it."

We find no prejudicial error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

OLIVER v. STAPLES & PFEIFFER.
(Civ. 4735.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 3, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑880(1)—Counsel for appellant partnership cannot object to improper joinder of individual members.

Counsel appearing for partnership appealing from judgment against it and individual members cannot object that latter were not properly sued.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1037—Partnership members, for whom general appearance was made, cannot complain of improper joinder on appeal from judgment against them and firm.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 388, judgment against partnership, for both members of which general appearance was made, will run against both, though not named as defendants, and it does not appear whether both were served with summons, and neither can complain on appeal from judgment against partnership and members that he was not properly sued.

3. Bankruptcy 🔑303(3)—Finding as to amount of debt in action to recover preference sustained.

In action to recover preference under Bankruptcy Act, § 60, subds. a and b (U. S. Comp. St. § 9644), finding fixing antecedent debt in amount of balance of account as agreed on by undisputed settlement between bankrupt and defendants held proper.

4. Bankruptcy 🔑306—Alleged error in finding as to amount of antecedent debt held immaterial.

Error, if any, in finding as to amount of antecedent debt, in action to recover preference under Bankruptcy Act, § 60, subds. a and b (U. S. Comp. St. § 9644), held immaterial, as finding of greater amount would be of no avail to defendants.

5. Bankruptcy 🔑164—Transfer of materials to creditors held "payment," creating recoverable preference.

Transfer by bankrupt to creditors of materials worth amount of debt held "payment," creating recoverable preference within Bankruptcy Act, § 60, subd. a (U. S. Comp. St. § 9644); debt being payable by transfer of cash or property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Payment.]

6. Bankruptcy 🔑303(3)—Finding of reasonable cause to believe that transfer of materials would create preference sustained.

In action to recover preference under Bankruptcy Act, § 60, subds. a and b (U. S. Comp. St. § 9644), evidence held to support trial court's finding that defendants had reasonable cause to believe that transfer of materials to them by bankrupt would create preference.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by A. J. Oliver, as trustee in bankruptcy of the Commercial Brass Foundry, against Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Leon A. Blum and David K. Watkins, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

McKannay & Hunt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued and recovered judgment against the defendants for the sum of $538.49 in an action to recover a preference under the provisions of section 60, subds. a and b, of the National Bankruptcy Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 9644). Plaintiff alleged and the court found that he was the duly appointed and acting trustee in bankruptcy of the Commercial Brass Foundry, a partnership; that the bankrupt owed the defendants, a partnership composed of the individuals named therein, the sum of $538.49 upon a general antecedent debt, and that during the four months preceding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy this debt was paid off by the delivery to the defendants of materials of equal value. In fact, materials in excess of the debt had been delivered, but on the 7th of April, 1921, a short time before the filing of the petition, a settlement was reached between the bankrupt and the defendants by their payment of the sum of $160 to the bankrupt. It also appeared that at the time of the transfer of these materials the bankrupt was badly involved with other creditors, a fact which was well known to the defendants, and that they had been warned of the condition of the bankrupt and that the acceptance of materials in cancellation of their debt would be treated as a void preference.

[1] On this appeal we are at a loss to know just how to treat the appealing parties. The notice of appeal was given by the attorneys who are presenting it before this court, and stated that the "defendants" in the above-entitled action appealed from the judgment rendered against them. They also signed as attorneys for these defendants. Now for the first time they, without any order, change the caption of the cause so as to make it appear that the defendant partnership separately was the only party sued. In the briefs which they have filed they have signed as attorneys for the defendant, using the singular, but whether they are appearing for the partnership or for one of the two individuals composing the partnership does not appear. If counsel are appearing for the defendant partnership, their objection that the individual defendants were not properly sued is, of course, wholly beside the question, because it is of no interest to one defendant that other parties are improperly joined in sharing the burden of the judgment. If counsel were appearing for either of the two individuals, then they might be heard upon the point that such individuals were not properly sued, but they have not elected to so appear.

[2] Treating the point, however, as being properly raised, it appears that counsel made a general and unqualified appearance for all three defendants in the court below. That is, they appeared for the defendants Staples & Pfeiffer, a partnership, and for the two individuals Staples and Pfeiffer. No special appearance was made by any of these defendants for the purpose of raising the question of proper joinder. In fact, the defendant Pfeiffer verified the answer to the complaint as "one of the defendants," and the whole proceeding before the trial court was had upon the theory that all three parties had been properly sued. Counsel for the appellants, without letting us know whom they represent, place their greatest stress upon this point, but we do not consider it of any importance. The statute, section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows:

> "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability."

Though it does not appear in this record whether both of the individuals were served with summons, it does appear that a general appearance was made for both of them, and this, of course, is equivalent to the service of summons. Judgment, therefore, will run against both of these parties in the same manner as if they had all been named defendants in the proceeding, and none of the appellants has suffered any prejudice by reason of the form of the allegations in the complaint.

[3, 4] The appellants attack the finding that the antecedent debt was $538.49 instead of $784.60. The finding was based upon the undisputed facts that a settlement was made between the bankrupt and appellants on April 7, 1921, and the balance of the account was that included in the finding. The whole point is immaterial anyway, because the finding of a greater amount would be of no avail to the appellants.

[5] It is argued that the transfer to appellants was not a "payment" creating a recoverable preference within the bankruptcy law. The whole argument is merely a play upon words. Appellants were creditors of the bankrupt, and received a portion of the materials in settlement of their claim. A debt may be paid by the transfer of cash or property. Section 60, subd. a of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 reads in part:

> "A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has, within four months before the filing of the petition, * * * made a transfer of any of his property * * * to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class."

In support of their argument upon this point counsel for appellants insist that during the course of the trial a stipulation was entered into to the effect that the transfer of these goods was not a payment within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. The whole argument is based upon a misconstruction and misapplication of the record. The parties did not stipulate that the transfer was not a payment, but upon request of counsel for respondent that such a stipulation be made counsel for the appellants refused to consent to the use of the word payment. This is as far as the stipulation went.

[6] Appellants insist that there was no showing of knowledge on their part of the pending insolvency of the bankrupt. The trial court found that the appellants at the time they were taking the transfer of materials from the bankrupts had reasonable cause to believe that such transfer would create a preference within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. The evidence to support this finding was that the appellants had been informed on numerous occasions that the Commercial Brass Foundry and the individual partners composing it were all insolvent and unable to meet the indebtedness which was facing them. They were also informed that, if they accepted these materials and credited them upon their own indebtedness, that act would be treated as a preference, and action would be brought to enforce the rights of the other creditors to the bankrupt assets.

The other points raised by the appellants are trivial, and do not require consideration. The whole appeal is without merit. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

VORBECK v. PATTEN-DAVIES LUMBER CO. (Civ. 4206.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 26, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 21, 1924.)

Master and servant ⚷301(2)—Employee held not authorized to employ driver of truck injuring pedestrian.

Where defendant's employee, whose duties were to load defendant's trucks with lumber, was not authorized to move trucks when loaded nor expressly authorized to employ others to drive such trucks, held that he had no implied authority to employ another to drive loaded truck, and therefore defendant was not responsible for driver's negligence causing injuries to pedestrian.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Marie L. Vorbeck against the Patten-Davies Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. A. Stice and D. A. Stuart, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. While the plaintiff was walking along a public road in Los Angeles county in the evening of October 2, 1920, after dark, she was struck by one of appellant's trucks which was returning to the latter's place of business after delivering lumber to a customer.

It was Saturday, and none of appellant's truck drivers were at its yard when this particular load was placed on the truck. One Baldwin was employed to pile lumber and load trucks, which he testified were taken out by the company's drivers, who were sent from the office. Baldwin was not a driver, was not employed in the office, nor did he do the employing, but was generally under the supervision of a yard foreman, although at the particular time in question he was alone in the yard. A young man named Isherwood, who worked in a bakery next door, came into the yard at about 5 p. m., and assisted in loading the truck. Baldwin remarked that he wished the load could be gotten out so that the customers could work Sunday, to which Isherwood replied, "I will take it." He made the delivery, and before he returned it became dark; the truck was without lights, and Isherwood did not know of respondent's presence upon the road until she was struck.

At the conclusion of the testimony the trial court instructed the jury that the defendant was liable in this case, and that the only question for them to determine was the amount of damages. A verdict was accordingly returned for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment upon the ground that Baldwin had no authority to employ Isherwood, that the latter was not its employee, and that the lumber company was not liable for the consequences of his acts.

Respondent relies principally upon the rule that, if two distinct causes are operating at the same time to produce a given result, and the original negligence is operative until the accident, and is a contributing cause thereto, and its effect is not broken or disturbed by the intervention of the other cause, but is only accelerated or augmented thereby, then either or both parties who created the cause are liable for the damage occasioned thereby. And it is argued that, had the truck been equipped with headlights, the accident would not have occurred; that this truck was kept by appellant for the purpose of delivering lumber to customers, and that Baldwin was in charge of the yard for the purpose of loading trucks and sending them out to deliver lumber; that he sent Isherwood with the load, and gave him instructions, from which it is inferred that Isherwood was appellant's employee, and that it was liable for his acts. The authorities cited by respondent all discuss the rule mentioned, but there seems to be only one question presented, which is the status of Isherwood, because, if he had no authority to move appellant's truck at Baldwin's direction, there is no evidence of intention that it should be operated at that time, and the absence of equipment from an automobile standing in the lumber yard would create no liability.

Baldwin testified that the superintendent of the yard was off for the afternoon, and that there were no drivers there at that time, and that he was alone. He testified in
